Florida Coast—Proposed Adjournment.

H. OF R.

Mr. COOK also submitted the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House any evidence, in the possession of the Department, showing that the uncurrent notes which he received from the banks of Edwardsville, Tombigbee, and Missouri, as mentioned in his report of the 14th ultimo, has been deposited in those banks before the date of the contracts by which they agreed to account for them as cash ; together with the contracts under which those banks were only liable for said notes as special deposits ; if any such contracts there were. And that he also lay before this House, all the monthly returns in the possession of the Department, which were made by the Bank of Missouri ; together with all the correspondence in relation to the latter bank, in the possession of the Department, which has not been heretofore communicated to this House.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Archibald S. Bulloch and others : Whereupon, it was ordered that the said report be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the report of the Committee of Claims on the cases of Hoel Lawrence, Frederick White, and of Thaddeus Clarke and others : Whereupon, it was ordered that the said report be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate, have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts for adjusting the claims to land, and establishing land offices, in the districts east of the island of New Orleans ;" and a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as it respects the choice of President and Vice President of the United States, and the election of representatives in the Congress of the United States ;" in which last mentioned bill and resolution, they ask the concurrence of this House.

FLORIDA COAST.

On motion of Mr. HILL, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of having the coast of Florida surveyed, so as to have an accurate chart thereof made, delineating thereon the entrance of all the rivers and harbors ; the islands, rocks, shoals, and reefs, in the neighborhood of the coast, as well on the side of the Gulf of Mexico, as on the Atlantic side of the peninsula ; and that observations be also made with reference to sites for lighthouses.

[Mr. HILL, in presenting this resolution, observed, that he had hitherto delayed to offer it, in the hope of receiving information from the Corps of Engineers who had recently been directed by the Government to examine the seacoast from the Sabine eastward round the shores of the Floridas ; but, having been informed by some of the gentlemen of that corps who have just arrived at this city, that their examination had been confined principally, if not entirely, to the selection of sites for fortifications, he was compelled, from a sense of duty, to call the attention of Congress to this subject now. Sir, we have had this territory in expectancy for many years, and in actual possession a year ; yet, the truth is, that no man, perhaps, in the nation, actually knows where the best ship harbor is situated ; and an examination is now making in relation to Spiritu Santo, alias Tampa, alias Hillsboro' bay. Another examination has been ordered in relation to certain islands near Cape Florida. These partial expenditures would be avoided ; the coasting trade would be greatly benefited ; the information necessary to the establishment of lighthouses on the coast would be furnished ; and the risk of piratical depredations diminished, by having an accurate chart of the coast. The British Government have recently employed a vessel of war, to take the survey of those shores ; but, whether it will ever be published, so as to be of any advantage to us, is uncertain. And shall we be more improvident toward a country we own than foreign nations ? I hope not, and that the resolution will be adopted.]

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BUCHANAN called for the consideration of the joint resolution from the Senate, to fix a time for the adjournment of the present session, (the first Monday in April next.)

On the question to consider this resolution, the yeas and nays were required by Mr. MERCER. Mr. CONDIOT then moved to lay the subject on the table, (in order to avoid what he considered an interruption, to no useful purpose, of the regular business of the House.) The yeas and nays were ordered also on this motion, which Mr. CONDIOT then withdrew.

[Two questions of order were decided by the SPEAKER on this occasion, worthy of being recorded, being important as precedents.

1. It was questioned by Mr. TAYLOR, whether it was in order to move to lay on the table a motion to consider a proposition now lying on the table. The SPEAKER decided that a motion to lay any proposition on the table is in order.

2. A motion was made by Mr. WALWORTH, to proceed to the orders of the day, with a view to overruling the motion now presented. The SPEAKER said, that he had more than once entertained this motion, as being conformable to the practice of the British Parliament ; but, upon an examination of the rules of the House, with a view to this question, and finding that they direct, that when a question is under debate, that none but certain prescribed motions shall be received, of which the motion now made was not one, he decided that the motion to proceed to the orders of the day, there being another question under debate, was not in order.]

The question on now considering the resolution from the Senate, was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows :

For considering it 63, against it 82.

So the House refused now to consider the said resolution.

Report on Weights and Measures.

MARCH, 1822.

REPORT ON WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the select committee, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of State on weights and measures, made the following report, which was committed to a Committee of the Whole, with the resolutions:

The Committee to whom has been referred "the report on weights and measures," made by the Secretary of State, on the 22d of February, 1821, report:

That so comprehensive a view has been given, in the documents referred to them, of the origin and history of the measures and weights now in use in the United States, and so full an examination of the different proposals which have been made for their improvement, that they deem it scarcely necessary to do more than to submit the resolutions which they think it expedient that Congress should pass at this time. Their object is only to "render uniform and stable the measures and weights which we at present possess."

To effect this, they propose that the President shall cause application to be made to the English Government to allow models of the yard, the Winchester bushel, wine, gallon, and pound, (avoirdupois), to be procured from its offices. For the purpose of easy and perfect comparison, it may be as well that the yard should be traced upon the rod of platina in the possession of the Department of State, on which is traced the French metre. These models should be made with the utmost accuracy which the art and science of England can give, and, if satisfactory to Congress, should be declared the standard yard, bushel, liquid gallon, and pound, of the United States. There is some difference of opinion as to the material of which the standards shall be formed. The committee will not detain the House by a full exposition of the reasons which led them to conclude, that, at least, the standards of length and weight should be of platina, as the material on which time is found to produce the smallest change. The Secretary of State, who adopts an opposite opinion, has said that "the very extraordinary properties of platina, its unequalled specific gravity, its infusibility, its durability, its powers of resistance against all the ordinary agents of destruction and change, give it advantages and claims to employment as a primary standard for weights and measures and coins, to which no other substance in nature has equal pretensions. Should the fortunate period arrive when the improvement in the moral and political condition of man will admit of the introduction of one universal standard for the use of all mankind, it is hoped and believed, that the platina metre will be that standard." But, if the immutability of platina recommend it so strongly as a standard for all nations and all time, it can hardly be amiss to adopt it for the interval which may elapse before the universal adoption of a national standard. This interval the Secretary and the committee may be willing to shorten, but it seems likely to last as long as diversities of laws and language among men. If the standard pound shall be of platina, it must of course, be made equiponderant with the English pound in vacuo, and the same means must be used in making the models of weight which are intended for distribution among the States. The standards of measures of capacity must, probably, be of copper or brass, and the careful preservation of all the standards may be provided for in the law which shall establish them. The committee think it best that they should be kept in the Department of State, and used only to verify the models which may be issued under the authority of Government.

The committee believe that, by distributing accurate copies of these standards among the States, the present inequality of weights and measures will be so far removed as to leave little practical inconvenience in that regard. They propose that the President shall cause to be procured such a number of copies or models of these standards of weight and measure (with their most convenient multiples and divisions) as may be necessary to allow one model of each standard to be lodged with the clerk of each district court of the United States, and one to be given to each State and Territory, to be disposed of as its Legislature may direct. The most convenient material for those copies will probably be copper or brass, but the determination of this question may best be referred to the authority which shall procure them.

It is believed that no other obligation will be required to enforce, on the part of the officers in the service of the United States, the use of weights and measures conformed to the standards established by law, than that which a sense of duty and a dependence upon the Government for their continuance in office must produce. The committee think it best, that Congress, after providing the standards of weights and measures, and furnishing models of them to every State, should leave it to the laws of the several States to enforce their use by persons who are not in the service of the United States. In the custom-house and land offices, the measures and weights may be provided from the same funds, and under the same authority, which have been hitherto employed. The committee suppose it necessary only to provide for such a distribution of models as may make it easy to verify the weights and measures which may be used either by public officers, or in private transactions. It was proposed by a former committee of the House of Representatives, in a report made in January, 1819, that the relations between the different standards should be accurately ascertained and declared in the law which should establish them.

It was observed, that "the determination of the proportions between lineal measures and measures of capacity, and between both these and weights, may have some effect in enabling us to detect, without too difficult a process, the defects of measures of capacity, and possibly of weights in common use. For this purpose it would perhaps be convenient to establish, not merely the cubical contents of the common measures of capacity, but to fix determinate forms for all these, and dimensions whose correctness might be ascertained by the common measures of length." But the relations between the standards cannot be ascertained with that absolute certainty which should be exacted in a law fixing permanent standards. The calculation of the dimensions of vessels of capacity is found, even by the most practical artists, to be so uncertain, that they rely entirely upon the trials by the weight of water which they contain. It is of some importance, that the forms of measures of capacity, which are used in commerce, should be left to depend upon the material, or the art which it is found most convenient in the different parts of our country to employ. And in fine, those relations and dimensions which it is useful to know, will be ascertained by philosophical inquiry, and published in books of easy reference. Indeed, they have been so.

The committee have proposed to establish but one standard of weight. It will be necessary that accurate models of the grain and its usual multiples, should be provided to verify the weights which are used for the precious metals and for medicine. The law which shall establish the standard pound, may declare the grain to be the seven thousandth part of the pound, as frequent and careful examination has shown it to be.

The committee submit the following resolutions :

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested, (if the consent of the Government of Great Britain shall be given thereto,) to cause to be traced on a rod of platina, the yard of the year 1601, which is kept in the British Exchequer ; to cause to be made of platina a pound, of the weight in vacuo of the English avoirdupois pound ; and that he also cause to be made, of whatever material he shall deem best for standards of those measures, a vessel of the same capacity as the standard Winchester bushel, and also a vessel of the same capacity as the standard wine gallon of England.

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause to be made, for distribution among the States and Territories, and for the purpose of verifying the weights and measures used therein, models of the yard, on which shall be traced its divisions of feet and inches ; models of the bushel, half bushel, quarter bushel or peck, thirty-second part of a bushel or quart ; models of the wine gallon, of the wine quart and pint ; models of the pound, half pound, quarter pound, of the sixteenth of a pound or ounce ; of the seven thousandth part of a pound or grain ; models of the pennyweight or twenty-four grains, of the scruple or twenty grains ; and, of the apothecaries dram or sixty grains ; models of the weight of twelve and a half pounds, of twenty-five pounds, of fifty pounds, and of one hundred pounds ; that these models of weight and measure be formed with the utmost practical exactness from the weight and measures procured under the authority of the foregoing resolution, and that the number to be procured of each model shall not exceed —.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. SLOAN, from the Committee of Elections to which was referred the memorial of Philip Reed, contesting the election return of Jeremiah Causden, as one of the representatives for the State of Maryland, made a report thereon favorable to Mr. REED ; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.—The report is as follows :

That the constitution of Maryland directs that the elections shall be by ballot ; that every free white male citizen of the State, above twenty-one years of age, and no other, having resided twelve months within the State, and six months in the county, next preceding the election at which he offers to vote, shall have a right of suffrage in the election of Delegates to the State Legislature ; that the State is divided into districts for the purpose of electing Representatives to Congress ; that the sixth Congressional district is composed of the counties of Hartford, Cecil, and Kent. The election for Representatives to the present Congress was held on the first Monday of October, 1820. At that election the memorialist and the sitting member were candidates, and, by the returns from the several counties in said district, as made to the Governor and Council, it appears that the memorialist and sitting member had an equal number of votes, and that neither had the " greatest number of votes," as by the constitution of the State is required, in order to constitute an election. But it further appears, by an official statement of the proceedings of the Governor and Council, bearing date the 18th day of October, 1820, that, in conformity with what was considered to be the provisions of the law of Maryland, the Governor and Council " proceeded to decide between them which should be the Representative, and the result was that Jeremiah Causden, Esq., was decided to be the Representative for the said district." The committee are aware that to question the right of the Executive authority of Maryland to give full operation to the provisions of its election laws, will be considered as a measure of an important character. It is understood by the committee that the authority, under which the Governor and Council acted, is the act of the State of Maryland, passed the 14th of December, 1790, chapter 16, section 13. This provision of the act, the committee believe, has been repealed by the act of the 2d of January, 1806. But they consider it unnecessary to enter into an argument on this point. The Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 2, provides, that " the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States ; and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." Section 5 of the same article provides that " each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." On the first Monday of October, 1820, in conformity with the law of Maryland, an election was held by the qualified electors of the sixth Congressional district. On that day they either did, or did not, elect a member to Congress. None could be elected unless he received a greater number of votes than were given for any other candidate. The term election must mean the act of choosing, performed by the qualified electors, in conformity with the requisitions of the Constitution and laws regulating the manner in which the choice shall be made. If, therefore, the legal electors, on the day appointed, should fail to make a choice, it is confidently believed that no other authority of the State can, at any other time, make good this defect. Let it be supposed that the electors should fail to attend an election ; that, consequently, no election is held ; would it then be contended that the Executive authority could, by lot or otherwise, appoint a Representative for such district in the Congress of the United States ? This is a power which, it is presumed, none will contend does exist. Yet it is believed to be nothing more than that which has been exercised by the Governor and Council of Maryland, in the case under consideration. In this case, the electors assemble, they proceed to elect, they make no choice, they come to no Constitutional result. It is asked, what is the difference between the two cases ? The one would be an appointment, because no election had been held ; the other, because no choice had been made. The committee being of opinion that the power thus virtually exercised by the Governor and Council of Maryland, in appointing a Representative to the Congress of the United States, being contrary to the express provisions of the Constitution, and one which this House cannot sanction, have no hesitation in rejecting the official statement of the proceedings in the case as evidence of the right of the sitting member to a seat in this House.

to them, the committee proceeded to an examination of the claims of the memorialist, and the objections of the sitting member thereto. The memorialist alleges that at the election district No. 1, in Kent county, at said election, two tickets or ballots were thrown away by the judges of the election, and not counted, which tickets were given for him, and ought to have been set down and counted to his poll. These tickets, it appears, were thrown away under an impression that they had been folded together with a fraudulent intention, previous to their being put into the ballot box. On the part of the sitting member it was contended that at Elkton, in Cecil county, two tickets under similar circumstances were thrown away, and not counted, which ought to have been added to his poll, and that, at the same district, the memorialist was allowed one vote on account of a ticket on which was the name of the memorialist, together with that of five other persons, without any other designation than that of "for Congress." It was also contended by the sitting member that sundry illegal votes had been given for the memorialist, which, if deducted from his poll, would give the sitting member a clear majority of votes in his favor. No charges of a want of integrity were made by either party, against any of the officers who had been engaged in conducting the election. Some of the testimony exhibited to the committee had been taken previous to the meeting of Congress, and some has been taken since, under instructions given by the committee, for the government of the parties. It was suggested to the parties by the committee that it would be satisfactory to have the testimony of the judges and clerks of the election in district No. 1, of Kent county, respecting the double ticket, thrown away; and such course was recommended as was thought fair and liberal, and best calculated to arrive at a full knowledge of all the principal facts in the case, and the memorialist departed in order to procure additional testimony. At this time, it was understood by the committee that the sitting member rested his claim on the testimony he had already taken; but a few days subsequent, having stated to the committee that he was apprized of other testimony in the case, and that it was his wish to obtain it, a letter was addressed to each of the parties by the chairman of the committee, appointing the 10th of January, 1822, for the final hearing of the case by the committee, and requesting each to give the other five days' notice of the time and place of taking the additional testimony. The memorialist avers that he did not receive the notification of the committee until it was too late for him to be prepared to take depositions of his witnesses; until the day appointed for the decision of the case; and that, on his way to Washington, he accidentally lost the testimony. Under these circumstances, the committee permitted the testimony to be taken a second time, and inasmuch as the sitting member had not attended the taking of these depositions in the first instance, and did not object to them when presented, on account of not having notice, the committee agreed to receive the testimony thus offered. They have been thus particular in detailing all the circumstances that occurred in the case since it came under their cognizance, because, although some of the testimony may be such as strictly might not be admissible in a court of law, yet, as there appeared to be every disposition on the part of both the gentlemen to waive all objections of form, and to pursue a course calculated to arrive at facts, the committee were disposed to be less rigid than under other circumstances they might have been disposed to act. In respect to all the other testimony, due notice has been given by each party, and they attended or not as they thought proper. In support of the claim of the memorialist, John C. Hynson, one of the judges of the election in district No. 1, of Kent county, states that he took the tickets from the box; that two tickets were thrown away, on which was the name of General Philip Reed for Congress; that those tickets were not counted, but rejected, under an impression that they were a double ticket fraudulently put into the box; but that, after he had passed it out of his hands, he was impressed with a belief that it was not double, and that this impression was confirmed when, on counting out the whole of the ballots, two were wanting to make the number equal to the number of persons voting.

Dr. Beckington Scott, David Vickers, James Price, James Ringgold, James Eagle, Jr., Darius Dunn, and John C. Hynson, Jr., testify that they were present at the opening of the ballot box and counting of the tickets, and that they were satisfied that the two tickets thrown away, and which had the name of General Philip Reed on them, were not double, and that, on the final counting of the votes, there being two ballots less than there were names of persons voting, confirmed them in their belief.

The deposition of Elijah Beck states that he was clerk of the election, but states nothing respecting any of the facts in the case.

William Scott, clerk of Kent county, certifies, under the official seal of said county, a copy of the poll-book of said election, which shows that 365 persons voted at said election, and that only 363 tickets were counted.

The deposition of Joseph Ireland states that he acted as clerk of the election. That the judges drew from the box a double ticket, and threw it away. That he saw it in Judge Hynson's hands. And that, after the votes were counted, and the disagreement between them and the poll list was discovered, Judge Hynson still said it was a double ticket.

The sitting member produced the depositions of William Boulden and John Kean. They state that they acted at the election in district No. 2, in Cecil county, in 1820, the first as judge, the second as clerk; and that General Philip Reed was allowed one vote on account of a ticket which had four other names on it, without any other designation than "for Congress." They also state that two tickets were thrown away on account of being doubled.

James Sewall, clerk of Cecil county, gives a certified copy of the ticket alluded to by Boulden and Kean, under the official seal of Cecil county.

The deposition of John Bradshaw states that he was one of the judges of the election in district No. 1, of Kent county. That Judge Hynson drew from the box a ticket which he said was double; the deponent observed that if so, it ought to be destroyed, and it was thrown away. That after the counting was finished, two ballots were wanting to correspond with the book of polls. That he observed to Judge Hynson that perhaps it was a mistake as to the ticket destroyed being double, but he declared it was double, and that it sometimes did happen that the ballots and polls did not agree. Deponent states that he did not see any name on the ticket destroyed, not having it in his hands.

William Scott, clerk of Kent county, certifies, under the official seal of said county, that, during several years past, there has been a difference in some of the districts in said county, between the number of names on the poll-books of election and the ballots counted out.

The law of Maryland, in relation to this subject, is, that "every voter shall deliver to the judge or judges of the election, in which he offers to vote, a ballot, on which shall be written, or printed, the name or names of the person or persons voted for, and the purpose for which the vote is given plainly designated." This law further provides, that after the poll is closed, and whilst the ballots are opening and counting, that "if upon opening any of the said ballots there be found any more names written or printed on any of them than there ought to be, or if any two or more of such ballots or papers be deceitfully folded together, or if the purpose for which the vote is given is not plainly designated as within directed, such ballots shall be rejected and not counted."

In support of the allegation of the sitting member, that sundry illegal votes had been given to the memorialist which ought to be deducted from his poll, he produced the depositions of Edward Brown, George Copper, James Coleman, Josiah Massey, and the official certificate of James Sewall, clerk of Cecil county. On the propriety of entering into an investigation of this kind, when elections are by ballot, the committee entertain serious doubts. True it is that the decisions of the House in the case of Kelly and Harris, and Easton and Scott, may be considered as establishing the principle; yet, it is believed that when the circumstances attending those decisions are examined, it may be doubted whether they ought to be viewed as establishing a precedent which shall govern all future decisions. But as no desire is entertained to agitate this question at the present time, the testimony has been received, and attentively examined, but decided to be insufficient to establish any of the facts contended for.

From a full, attentive, and deliberate examination of the case, in all its points and bearings, the committee are impelled to the conclusion that the sitting member cannot, consistent with the Constitution of the United States, be allowed to retain a seat in this House, under the proceedings of the Governor and Council of Maryland. That the testimony in relation to the two votes rejected in district No. 1, of Kent county, proves that these tickets were not fraudulent, and that they ought to have been counted to the poll of the memorialist, for whom they were given; and that the vote allowed to him in district No. 2, in Cecil county, ought to be deducted from his poll, as being clearly an illegal vote. Therefore, by adding to the poll of Philip Reed, the memorialist, two votes improperly rejected in Kent county, and deducting one therefrom, for that improperly allowed in Cecil county, he will have a majority of one vote over the sitting member.

The paper marked A, is the answer of the sitting member to the prayer and arguments of the memorialist.

The following resolutions are submitted:

"Resolved, That Jeremiah Causden is not entitled to a seat in this House.

"Resolved, That Philip Reed is entitled to a seat in this House."

A—Letter of the sitting member.

SIR: In the contested election between General Philip Reed and myself, as it may be presumed that all the testimony on both sides, intended to be produced, or which will now be received, has been submitted to the committee, it seems proper that I should offer a few remarks upon the subject. This would have been earlier done, but for the impression that a partial discussion would rather retard than expedite the ultimate determination. In replying to the petition or memorial of General Reed, I must beg permission to invert the order adopted by him. He claims a seat in the House of Representatives upon the ground that he had a legal majority of votes; and if such were the fact, his claim would not be resisted; but I will examine this fully, as the second branch of the present inquiry. In the latter part of the memorial the petitioner labors to show that the law of Maryland, under which the sitting member has been returned, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and therefore void. This law was passed in 1790, and not in 1791, as stated in the petition, about two years after the formation of the Constitution of the United States, and by some of those very men who just before had sat in the Convention which agreed to adopt that Constitution. It, moreover, was passed for the express, avowed purpose, of carrying that Constitution into effect, and giving it full operation in Maryland. This is declared to be the object of the law, (see the act itself, 1790, chap. 16.) It must then appear strange indeed, if, under these circumstances, the law shall be found to be at war with the Constitution, in one of its most important provisions! I rather presume the Constitution was quite as well understood by the framers of this law as it is now, and I beg leave to add, that I further presume that there then existed quite as little disposition to violate the Constitution, or the rights of the people, as at this time. Upon turning to the law, the following provision will be found in the first section thereof: "Whereas it is declared by the Constitution of the United States that the House of Representatives, in the Congress of the United States, shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; that the electors in each State shall have the requisite qualifications of electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures, &c. In order, therefore, to carry the said Constitution into effect, be it enacted," &c. It is presumed that this section will hardly be contended to be at variance with the Constitution. And similar sentiments and language are to be found in the third and eighth sections of this same law. Yet, in the thirteenth section, it is provided "that in case two or more persons shall have an equal number of votes, the Governor and Council shall determine by lot, from the candidates, who shall be the Representative." Are these several provisions inconsistent with each other? Can they not well stand together, and form parts of the same system of elections? The most rigid critic must admit that they may. Then they may as easily be reconciled to the Constitution of the United States. And when it is asked, What are the rights of individual voters? and what are the powers of State Legislatures in relation to elections? this very law furnishes a strong and clear illustration. Every person entitled to vote for Delegates to a State Legislature is also entitled to vote for a Representative to Congress; and he has as high a security for the one right as the other. But upon the presumption that all the voters of a given district have exercised this right, (and such is the presumption of law,) and a tie between two or more candidates is the consequence, then the State Legislature, under the power to regulate the manner of holding elections for Representatives to Congress, may, if they think proper, provide by law for the determination of the tie, by lot, or otherwise. But in such a case the petitioner would object that the choice would not be by the people. Mr. Chairman, if we consult the phraseology of the Constitution, we shall perceive that the idea of representation pervades every part of it; that the Constitution itself, though it literally, and in express terms, is declared to be ordained by the people, is their act only upon this principle. It commences by saying, "We, the people of the United States," as if the people were personally assembled, and about to act together. It will be found, sir, that all acts done in the name of the people, or in virtue of authority derived from them, are truly and properly the acts of the people. The President of the United States, for the purposes of his appointment, is as truly and as literally a Representative of the people as a member of Congress. His election is not so immediately the act of the people, but still he is elected by them.

But, sir, the petitioner objects further, and asserts, respecting the first clause of the second article of the Constitution, (already quoted,) that "the command here is peremptory," &c. Now, with submission, I must insist that here is no command at all, either peremptory or not. The clause contains a general declaratory description of the House of Representatives; but more general it could not well be, and, without forcing its manifest meaning, it cannot be regarded as an authority for any particular mode of election by the people. And we have seen that it is perfectly consistent with the law of Maryland, of which it is made a substantial part. Upon the principles of this law, no popular right is violated, no voter has any ground for complaint, nor have the Legislature of the State transcended their powers in its passage. For I cannot subscribe to the doctrine of the petitioner, when he lays it down, "that the Constitution never intended that there should be any interference on the part of a State, as to the election of Representatives to Congress, further than is expressly declared." Sir, the very reverse of this doctrine is the true one.

The States may interfere in any and every case where they are not expressly or by necessary implication forbidden. The Constitution is no grant of power to the States or to the people; it is a grant by them; and all powers not expressly or by necessary implication granted are retained by them. Surely it cannot be necessary to press this subject further. But if this view of the subject should not meet the approbation of the committee and the House, and they should think the law unconstitutional and void, still the right of the petitioner to a seat is not established. He sets up a claim to a seat; and if in point of fact there was a tie, and the law of Maryland is void, then the petitioner has no more right to a seat than any other person in the community; and if there was a tie, and the Maryland law is a valid one, then too is there an end of the question. The claim of the petitioner rests wholly upon the fact of his having a majority of legal votes; and unless he can prove this fact to the satisfaction of the committee and the House, he must fail; and whatever opinion the committee and House may entertain of the law of Maryland, if it shall appear by proof that the sitting member had a legal majority of the votes, his seat will be confirmed as a matter of course. I will therefore proceed, Mr. Chairman, to an examination of the testimony which has been produced and laid before the committee, remarking that in this as in all other cases of claim the onus probandi lies upon the claimant. But the sitting member will go further: he will endeavor to show by proof that there was a legal majority of votes given in his favor and that the majority is decidedly against the petitioner.

The petitioner rests his claim solely upon two tickets, rejected by the judges as a double ticket. He states that these tickets were single, and not double, and that they contained his name for Congress. Mr. Chairman, both these positions are denied positively, and the evidence is appealed to with perfect confidence to settle the question. The petitioner produces several affidavits, mentioned in his petition, to prove that in the first or lower district of Kent county, at the time of counting out the ballots, one of the judges (Mr. John C. Hynson, the junior judge) drew from the ballot-box a ticket which at the time he declared to be a double ticket from its size. He passed it (say these deponents) to John Bradshaw, the presiding judge, unopened. Mr. Bradshaw they say opened the ticket and found it to be double, upon which it was rejected, but that each of those tickets contained the petitioner's name for Congress. The deponents further state that they were under the impression that these tickets were single, and not double, as supposed by the judges; and that their impressions were confirmed, when, upon finally comparing the number of tickets with the number of the names of the voters upon the poll-book, there was a difference of two.

This is the amount of all the testimony produced by the petitioner which is in his favor. His witnesses contradict each other, and are contradicted by those produced by the sitting member, in so strong a manner and to such extent that only a few facts are left undisputed between them. It is however certain that Judge Hynson drew a ticket from the ballot-box of such unusual size as to induce him to remark at the time, that from its size, he supposed it must be double; that it was only from the size of the ticket, and not from any other visible appearance, that he was induced to make this remark. The ticket was so folded together that no one present—not even the acute Dr. Beckington Scott, who observed it when it was first drawn from the box—could determine whether it was single or double until it was opened. To this point the evidence is uncontradicted. There is no witness who denies this to be the character and description of the ticket. When the ticket was opened it proved to be double, and was very properly rejected by the judges. All the witnesses concur in stating the rejection of this ticket as the joint act of the judges. There was no dispute, no doubt, about it; no dissenting voice; not even a whisper among the warmest friends of the petitioner. Thus far the evidence may be safely trusted, because it all agrees. The question then is, was this properly a double ticket, or did two separate tickets thus enfold themselves by chance? If the committee and the House believe this was a double ticket, then there is an end of the petitioner's claim, whatever names may have been written upon the tickets. If tickets be loosely folded when deposited in the ballot-box, by pressing them together with a stick or quill, or by shaking the ballot-box itself, they may become partially enfolded in each other: but in such a case there can never be any difficulty in deciding, by sober judges, who possess common eyesight. But if a ticket so folded as to answer the description of the ticket in question be deposited in the ballot-box, none of these means or any instrument of chance will be sufficient to produce an enclosure of one ticket in another. The thing is, ordinarily speaking, impossible. It will be recollected that the judges acted upon oath in this case, and that, as to this matter, they fully and explicitly agreed. They signed a joint return in conformity to this determination, which has become a public record. If either of them had felt the smallest doubt, or had been under the slightest impression that the ticket was improperly rejected, he was bound to communicate it to the other judges, and to rectify the mistake before the return was made. But in point of fact (for the proof of this is also uncontradicted) Judge Hynson declared, after all the votes were counted out, and after the deficiency was discovered, "that he was certain that it was a double ticket, and could not be counted." This Judge Hynson also remarked, at the same time, "that he had acted as judge several years, and that the tickets counted out often disagreed with the book of polls." And I would refer to the certificate of the clerk of Kent county, which has been laid before the committee, for numerous instances in different years. By this document it will appear that the tickets counted out oftener disagreed with the book of polls than accorded with it. Sometimes there was a difference of one, at other times two and three, &c.

Maryland Contested Election.

This has been attempted to be explained by the deposition of Mr. Beck, produced by the petitioner, in a manner not a little singular, and to which I must request the attention of the committee. Mr. Beck States that it was the practice to throw away scattering votes, and not to count them; but that, in 1820, columns were raised for all scattering votes, &c. Mr. John C. Hynson is made to speak to the same effect; I say is made to speak. I shall have occasion to notice this more fully hereafter. Mr. Chairman, what proposition is this? What is its character? Has it been the practice for the judges to violate their oath? When votes are counting out, how is it possible to tell, when a ticket is produced in favor of an individual, how many more he will obtain? And how can a judge know who is a candidate, except by the tickets as they appear?

But, sir, these gentlemen will admit that it was the practice to keep a column of numbers, if none was kept for scattering votes, and in this numerical column the number of the tickets was kept, independent of any or all the candidates. The object of keeping this numerical column was to ascertain, as far as possible, the correctness of the whole proceeding. But it is a fact that mistakes have frequently occurred in the hurry of an election. Names have been placed on the poll-book who did not vote, and others have been omitted who did vote. We have a very recent instance of a zealous and distinguished politician who voted, but his name, though as well known as any in the country, was not entered on the book. This is the true and natural solution of all the difficulty.

Only suppose, in the case before us, that one single name was entered upon the books by mistake, (a thing that happens every day, and in all bodies or assemblies of men,) and then we have additional proof that the ticket was double. And permit me to inquire whether this is not a much more probable supposition than that the judges should be deceived as to a fact of so plain, so palpable, and so simple a character. Even a slight attention to the different depositions is sufficient to show that no claim can be raised upon such evidence. Whether Hynson, for example, opened the ticket in question, or whether it was passed to Bradshaw, and opened by him, is asserted and denied most positively by different witnesses. But all the testimony is calculated to demonstrate that the ticket was truly a double one. It then only remains to explain the disagreement between the poll-book and the tally, which, it is presumed, has been satisfactorily done.

The deposition of Judge Bradshaw is entitled to entire confidence—a gentleman of high, respectable character, in every view of it, and a witness who has acted with the most perfect propriety throughout. When called upon, on the 2d of January last, to give testimony in presence of the petitioner and sitting member, he attended, and coolly and deliberately stated the facts, before them, in so clear and circumstantial a manner, as to leave no doubt of his veracity.

It would give me pleasure to be able to indulge in similar remarks as to Mr. Hynson; but this gentleman, though called upon in the same manner, and requested to attend at the same time, and give his evidence in the presence of the parties, refused, or neglected to do so. This is proved by the deposition of Morgan Brown, junior, who had requested the attendance of Mr. Hynson.

A letter was then sent to Mr. Hynson by the sitting member, requesting him to state in writing his knowledge and recollection upon the subject. Mr. Hynson, it is confidently believed, received this letter, but took no notice of it. Afterwards, in the absence of the sitting member, on the 10th of January, it seems he gave a deposition to the petitioner, which the latter states he lost on his way to this city. Subsequent to this, on the 12th of February last, Mr. Hynson, it seems, made oath again for the petitioner, and, to guard against casualties, swore to two depositions, signing one, and not signing the other; the latter is endorsed "a duplicate," and is produced; the former, which was signed by him, as stated by the petitioner, is not produced. All this operation of making depositions and duplicate depositions, on the part of this witness, was in the absence of the sitting member. This witness had refused to attend, he had refused to put pen to paper, he had refused to utter a word when the sitting member could be present, but in his absence he voluntarily furnishes depositions and duplicates to the petitioner, to his full satisfaction. And, in the duplicate produced, Mr. Hynson is made to say that "the two votes or ballots were thrown away, and not counted to the polls of General Philip Reed, as the deponent was satisfied they should have been." And was this deponent really satisfied that two tickets were thrown away which ought to have been counted to the poll of the petitioner? What! and he a judge, and say not one word about it, but declare publicly that the ticket was double, and could not be counted! And all this, even, after the whole of the tickets were counted out! Then to sign a return, under oath, which he knew was incorrect! Has Judge Bradshaw acted in this manner? I appeal to every bosom in which there may yet remain one solitary spark, one lingering trace of honorable feeling! From Judge Bradshaw's deposition, it appears that there must have been a mistake as to the names upon these tickets. He swears, positively, that he saw no name upon them; he only saw an eagle at the top on the inside. Now, as this was a mark of that ticket upon which the petitioner generally run at that election, it may be that the bystanders who saw it might have inferred that the petitioner's name was upon it; for it must be remembered that the name of the petitioner was printed at the bottom of the tickets upon which it was printed at all, below the names of the county delegates, though, in some instances, it was stricken out, and the name of the sitting member inserted.

The deponents named in the memorial, or rather some of them, say that the double ticket had upon it "General Philip Reed, for Congress." I feel no disposition, Mr. Chairman, to cavil, or raise frivolous objections, but I hope to be pardoned for remarking that here is a striking proof of the incorrectness of the recollection of these deponents. There were no printed tickets used at that election containing this inscription! And, to prove the fact, sir, I submit to the inspection of the committee the whole of the tickets of one entire district in that county, as they were taken from the ballot box. The tickets are either stamped with an eagle at the top, or without one; but upon no one printed ticket can this superscription, inscription, or whatever you may please to call it, be found; yet these deponents use the same words, and in the same order precisely, and their words are carefully marked. What is the inference? These deponents saw what never existed! So much for these ex parte depositions!

I am much mistaken, Mr. Chairman, if these views of the subject do not satisfy the committee that the petitioner has wholly failed to establish his claim to the benefit of these tickets.

But, sir, be this as it may, I will now proceed to show that there was a decided majority against him. I have hitherto called the attention of the committee to the pretensions of the petitioner, and the allegations and proofs offered by him. Now, I must claim the indulgence of the committee, while I present a brief and condensed view of the pretensions, allegations, and proofs, of the sitting member. First, it is in full proof that the petitioner was allowed by the judges of the Elkton district, in Cecil county, the benefit of a ticket containing five names, all for Congress. The ticket was carefully deposited with the clerk of Cecil county, by the judges, and a true copy, under his official seal, has been submitted to the committee, with the affidavits of the judges and clerk, stating that the petitioner was allowed a vote on account of that ticket.

The committee will observe that the judges, in this case, erred in a question of law, and not of fact, and that, upon every principle of law, and, indeed, of good sense, this ticket should have been rejected. By the election law of Maryland, it was an absolute nullity. But, in the nature of things, it must be so, even if no positive statute existed upon the subject.

What would be done in the case of a ballot for a committee of seven, if, upon counting out, a ticket should be found with ten names upon it? or if, in balloting for a Speaker, a ticket should be found with two or three names upon it? We all know that such tickets must, upon the principles of reason and justice, be null and void. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully apprehend that it is altogether unnecessary to attempt further to illustrate or enforce this part of the subject, and feel the most entire confidence that the committee will deduct this ticket from the poll of the petitioner, to which it ought never to have been added.

I will next call the attention of the committee to a vote given to the petitioner in Kent county, by Theodore Burr. This man had no residence in Kent county at all, except merely going there and undertaking to build a bridge, and being actually in the county part of his time, on that account.

His residence, if he had any in Maryland, was in Cecil county, and not in Kent, where he voted. He had been sued in Cecil, as his proper county, (and, by the law of Maryland, a person must be sued in his proper county,) and prosecuted to judgment, and an execution had been issued and served upon his body, returnable, and was returned, to the April court of that county in 1820. At that court, Mr. Burr was committed to jail, where he remained until late in June, or early in July. After this he went to Kent, and, on the first Monday of October in that year, voted for the petitioner. The certificate of the clerk of Cecil county, already laid before the committee, the law of Maryland referred to, and the deposition of James Coleman, fully prove this statement. This man had nothing in Kent county deserving the name of residence at the October election; but, whatever he had, it was not of six months' previous continuance as required by law to entitle to a vote.

I will also ask the attention of the committee to the vote of Thomas Glanvill, given in Kent, for the petitioner. Glanvill had no residence. That he had no residence, is fully proved by George Cooper, and that he voted for the petitioner, is proved by Morgan Brown, the present sheriff of Kent county. I refer to their depositions before the committee.

I will ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to present another case to the view of the committee.

Gideon Lusby voted for the petitioner, and was under age at the time. I refer to the deposition of Joseph Massey to prove this. Here then are four votes to be deducted from the poll of the petitioner, which will establish a decided majority against him. And it should not be forgotten that the depositions in these cases were not ex parte, but were taken in the presence of the petitioner, who cross-examined the witnesses. I am aware, however, Mr. Chairman, that objections may be made to this kind of testimony, and am prepared to support it, both upon principle and precedent. But no objection can properly now be made by the petitioner, because he entered into the evidence himself, by instituting a cross-examination, and it is believed that no serious difficulty can be raised by any one to this course of proceeding. It is as common as it is easy to make off-hand superficial objections to any thing.

What is the great difficulty in receiving this evidence? Sir, I have often felt surprised to hear the answer. It is said, by giving a man's declarations in evidence, you make him a witness against himself! Surely, if a man of any understanding ever advanced this proposition, it must have been without consideration. Is it not a principle of general law that you can give a man's declarations or acknowledgments in evidence against him, both in civil and criminal cases? You cannot give a man's declarations in evidence for him, nor can you compel him to be a witness against himself; but if he, without compulsion, confess or declare a matter which may operate against him, either civilly or criminally, this may be properly given in evidence against him. I said this was a principle of general, but perhaps I might have said of universal law. Such a confession, it is true, may affect a particeps criminis to a certain extent, or it may have a qualified effect upon one having an interest in the subject to which the confession or declaration relates ; and certainly it ought to have these effects. Innumerable instances might be put to illustrate this principle, but I fear I shall be tedious. In the State of Maryland, two years ago, after much consideration, it was solemnly determined that this kind of evidence should be received and acted upon. Nor is it any answer to this case to call it a high-handed measure of party, &c. For such was not its character. And only last winter the General Assembly of Maryland issued a commission to three persons in Cecil county, authorizing them to take testimony relative to illegal votes. But, Mr. Chairman, the principle has been sanctioned again and again by Congress ; and, in addition to the cases heretofore named to the committee, I will, on the present occasion, only notice one ; it is a case decided from Tennessee, in the thirteenth Congress : Thomas and Kelly. The circumstances of this case will be found applicable to the case before the committee. If I have been able to make myself understood by the committee, I presume there is a final end of the petitioner's claim. It is less substantial than the shadow of a shade.

The Bankrupt Bill.

Perhaps I owe an apology to the committee for the trouble I have given them in this case ; but I trust they will credit me when I assure them that my prevailing wish has been, from the beginning, to render their investigation as easy and agreeable as possible. In the present communication I have deemed it advisable, for the sake of brevity, to omit a number of circumstances which are of some importance to the different views which might be taken of this case.

JEREMIAH CAUSDEN.

To the Hon. JOHN SLOAN,

*Chairman of the Committee of Elections.BANKRUPT BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The amendment moved by Mr. TRACY, on Saturday last, being under consideration,

Mr. NEALE, of Maryland, moved to strike out the part of the amendment which limits the privilege to others than merchants to take the benefit of the act, to a period "within twelve months from the time of passing this act."

This motion was assented to by Mr. TRACY, and supported by him and Mr. SERGEANT, Mr. NEALE, and Mr. WRIGHT, and opposed by Mr. CUTHBERT, Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, and Mr. NELSON, of Virginia ; when Mr. WOODSON, after some prefatory remarks, in which he expressed his dissent to the proposition before the House, submitted the following amendment, to be inserted next after the words, "and provided also."

"That all classes of the community, other than the description of persons before mentioned, shall have the privilege, at their election, of becoming voluntary bankrupts, with the consent and approbation of a major part in value of all the creditors of such voluntary bankrupt, previously obtained and duly certified, and that such bankrupt shall be subjected to the same proceedings, and liable to the same penalties, fines, and forfeitures, and be entitled to all the privileges, benefits, and advantages, as are provided for, and made applicable to, all other bankrupts by the regulations of this bill."

The amendment was approved by Messrs. TRACY, WRIGHT, BALDWIN, and SERGEANT, on the ground that it was essentially similar to that proposed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. TRACY,) and for various other reasons.

It was opposed by Messrs. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, Ross, and NELSON, of Virginia, and negatived.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, then submitted the following amendment, to be inserted in the 47th line of the 1st section :

"And provided, also, that the discharge which may be given to a bankrupt under this act, shall not operate so as to discharge the bankrupt from debts which may be due to merchants, bankers, brokers, factors, underwriters, or marine insurers."

The question was taken thereon, and the amendment was negatived.

Mr. KENT, of Maryland, then proposed the following amendment :

"That no certificate of discharge, under the provisions of this act, shall operate to discharge any bankrupt from any debt or debts, except such as may be due or owing to persons who may be liable to become bankrupts under the said act."

This amendment was also negatived.

Mr. WOODSON then moved that the Committee rise and report, to the end that liberty to sit again be refused, and the subject finally disposed of : for he considered that the valuable properties of the bill had been destroyed by the vote of the Committee refusing the amendment which he had moved.

Mr. SERGEANT hoped the Committee would not rise, and he suggested to the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. WOODSON,) that when the subject should come before the House he would have an opportunity again to present for consideration that amendment, which he deemed so essential to the value of the bill.

The motion to rise and report was then taken and lost.

The second section having been read, Mr. WALWORTH submitted the following amendment, to be inserted in the 26th line :

"And shall also prove, by his own affidavit or otherwise, that the person petitioned against shall have committed an act of bankruptcy as aforesaid."

This amendment was supported by the mover ; and, after some further observations on the subject, by Messrs. SERGEANT, COLDEN, and ROSS, the question was taken thereon and lost, without a division.

The third and fourth sections were then successively read, without proposition of amendment.

The fifth section having been read, Mr. RHEA proposed to strike out all that part thereof which follows the word "and" in the tenth line, which authorizes the breaking of doors to take the body of the bankrupt.

Mr. RHEA made the motion on the ground that it was a most extraordinary provision. The bankrupt might perhaps be in the house without the knowledge of the owner, and he thought this part of the section was repugnant to every principle of law, of common justice, and the security of private habitation, which was guarantied by the fundamental principles of the social compact.

The question was then taken on Mr. RHEA's motion, and decided in the negative.

The subsequent sections of the bill, from the sixth to the twentieth, both inclusive, were successively read, without proposition of amendment.

The twenty-first section having been read—

Mr. RHEA moved to strike out the word "probable" in the second line and to insert in lieu thereof the word "good," as precedent to the cause for issuing a warrant, &c., which being put, the same was negatived without a division.

The twenty-second to the thirty-fourth sections inclusive were also read, seriatim, without proposition of amendment.

The thirty-fifth section having been read—

Mr. FULLER, of Massachusetts, submitted the following amendment to be inserted after the word "commission," in the tenth line of the section:

"Except, however, all debts due from the bankrupt for supplies of provisions, wearing apparel, household furniture necessary for himself and his family, and for laborers' wages; but all such debts shall remain, and may be recovered, so much as may be due after any dividend or partial payment thereon, notwithstanding the certificate aforesaid, or anything done pursuant to this act: Provided, however, That no single debt so excepted shall exceed the amount of two hundred dollars."

After some remarks by the mover in favor of this amendment, and by Mr. RHEA against it, the motion was negatived.

The thirty-sixth, thirty-seventh, thirty-eighth, and thirty-ninth sections of the bill having been read, without proposition of amendment, the Committee, on motion, at four o'clock, rose and reported progress.

In the House, the question having been put on granting leave to sit again—

Some conversation took place between Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, against granting leave to sit again, and Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. BUCHANAN, and Mr. SERGEANT, in favor of it. Finally, the leave was granted; and then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 12.

A new member, to wit: from the State of New York, STEPHEN VAN RENSSELAER, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Solomon Van Rensselaer, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a certificate of the election of STEPHEN VAN RENSSELAER, as one of the Representatives of the State of New York; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the petition of Jonathan Hampton, and others, reported a bill for the relief of James Miller, John C. Elliot, Noah Hampton, James Erwin, and Jonathan Hampton; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the establishment of a Territorial government in Florida," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill securing to mechanics and others payment for their labor and materials in erecting any house or other building within the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to deliver to the claimants, or their legal representatives, or any person legally authorized by them to receive the same, or to the person who may have made the relinquishment required, or deposited the evidences of claim, with the commissioners appointed under the act of Congress of the thirty-first of March, eighteen hundred and fourteen, entitled "An act providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory," all deeds, conveyances, releases, and other papers which may have been deposited, under the provisions of the aforesaid act, where any claim has been adjudged invalid, by said commissioners, and on which no scrip has issued to the claimant or claimants.

The resolve was read twice, and, on motion of Mr. GILMER, was ordered to lie on the table.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. COOK, calling for information from the Treasury Department, relative to the receipt of uncurrent notes of the Bank of Edwardsville, &c., was taken up and agreed to.

Mr. WALWORTH laid on the table the following joint resolution, viz:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring therein, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution:

That, until Congress shall establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States, it shall be lawful for the several States, or any of them, to enact bankrupt or insolvent laws, in the same manner, with the like effect, as they might have done previous to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States.

The said resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, the Committee on Indian Affairs were instructed to inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill authorizing the payment for property lost by the friendly Indians during the Creek war, in conformity to the Treaty of Fort Jackson in 1814.

On motion of Mr. STERLING, of New York, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be collected into one or more volumes, all the laws, resolutions, reports, proclamations, treaties, and such other information, connected with our public lands, as is necessary to a complete understanding of the same; and that he cause the said laws, &c., to be arranged under distinct and proper heads, so as to give a clear and correct view of their present situation.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts for adjusting the claims to land, and establishing land offices, in the districts east of the island of New Orleans," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The resolution from the Senate, "proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as it respects the choice of President and Vice President of the United States, and the election of Representatives in the Congress of the United States," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, submitted for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the sale of public lands by entry, in lots of forty acres.

Mr. MOORE spoke briefly in support of his motion on the ground that it would cause some land to be sold which otherwise never would, and would enable honest but poor men to become proprietors, &c.

The resolution was decidedly opposed by Mr. COCKE, Mr. FLOYD, and Mr. HILL, on the ground that the Government had been already sufficiently liberal to purchasers of the public lands; that, if persons were allowed to take out forty acres, including the springs wherever found, the remainder of the land would be of no use but to the owners of the springs, and would be purchased by them at their convenience; that, if the lands spoken of by the gentleman were now unsaleable in larger quantities, it did by no means follow that they ever would be, &c.

Mr. STERLING moved to lay the resolve on the table; which motion was negatived.

The question was then put on agreeing to the original motion, and decided in the negative. So Mr. MOORE's proposition was rejected.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, then submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, prior to the — day of —, 1819.

The question to agree to the resolve was decided in the negative by a decided vote.

HEMP AND FLAX MACHINE.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Agriculture, made a report favorable to the petition of Anthony Dey and James McDonald, praying for encouragement by Congress of their invention for the breaking and dressing flax and hemp, &c., recommending a reference of the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary, with a view to an examination on the bearing of the patent laws; which was agreed to. The report is as follows:

The Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the petition of Anthony Dey and James Macdonald, report: The petition alleges, that the said Macdonald, at the expense of the said Dey, has invented and constructed a new and useful machine for breaking and cleaning of hemp and flax, in an unrotted state, and that the said Dey has discovered the means by which hemp and flax, after being cleaned in an unrotted state in their machine, may be bleached by a process hitherto unknown; that they believe their method of dressing hemp and flax is of very great importance to the agricultural interest of the country, and, therefore, ask an extension of the exclusive right to make, construct, use, and vend, to others to be used, the said invention and discovery.

From the evidence adduced by the petitioners, it appears that they have invented a machine for breaking and cleaning hemp and flax, in an unrotted state, which is different in its principles and construction from any machine that ever has been used for that purpose, and that the said Dey has also discovered a process, never before used, for bleaching hemp and flax after it has been dressed in an unrotted state. And, also, it appears by the certificates of respectable gentlemen, who have witnessed the operation of the machine, that it will, by the power of one horse, with the assistance of one man and three boys, separate the integument and wood from the fibrous part of the hemp and flax plants, and clean the same, at the rate of one pound in a fraction of time over a minute, fit for bleaching.

The petitioners further assure us, from the operation of one machine by horse power, with the attendance of one man and three boys, from 1,600 to 2,000 pounds of unrotted hemp or flax, may be cleaned in a day, yielding from 400 to 500 pounds after it is bleached; and that, by the addition of another machine, which can be moved by the same horse, with the addition of one man and one boy more, from 800 to 1,000 pounds may be cleaned at an expense not exceeding five dollars. And the committee are informed by Mr. Dey that one man can bleach 350 pounds of hemp or flax, after it has been cleaned by their machine in a day, at an expense of one dollar and seventy-five cents for the article which he uses in the process.

From these calculations, it appears that any quantity of unrotted hemp or flax taken from the field, where it is raised, may be broke, cleaned, and bleached, at a rate of less than two cents per pound, delivered in a bleached state; and, allowing one cent per pound for the plant, as it comes from the field, the whole cost, (except for the wear of the machine,) in growing this valuable plant, and breaking, cleaning, and bleaching it, will be less than six cents per pound. The committee are not informed what the cost of hatching or combing it, (which is done after it is bleached,) and preparing it for the manufacturer, would be, but presume it will not exceed two cents per pound. If the information the committee have received, and their calculations, are correct, either hemp or flax may be raised, dressed, and prepared for the best manufacture, at an expense of eight cents, and not exceeding in any case ten cents, per pound.

By the experiments of the petitioners, and others, it is found that flax, dressed and hatchelled in the ordinary way, after it has been dew-rotted, yields nine pounds from one hundred pounds of the plant which has been rotted, being sixteen pounds less than is produced from one hundred pounds of unrotted flax, cleaned and bleached by the method which the petitioners have discovered. But no experiments have yet been made to determine the difference in the weight of the plant, before and after it is rotted; therefore, it cannot now be ascertained how much will be saved, in quantity, by this method of breaking and cleaning it before it is rotted. It cannot, however, be doubted, that the common process of rotting flax, especially by dew, destroys or injures many of its fibres, and, of course, the quality, as well as the quantity, must be, in some degree, diminished.

The committee have examined the machine, and have seen it operate, and believe it will prove one of the most important and valuable discoveries. The committee have, also, examined the hemp and flax which has been bleached in this new method and hatchelled, and find that the colored matter and harshness of the fibres are removed, and that the flax is rendered very white, and as soft and fine as silk. This method of bleaching hemp and flax, it is believed, will be of great value to the grower and manufacturer of these plants.

Considering hemp and flax among the most valuable plants which can be cultivated in this country, and believing there is an abundance of soil in every State in the Union which is well adapted to their culture and growth, the committee are highly pleased with the invention and discovery of the petitioners. If hemp and flax can be raised in this country as easily and as cheap as in any other, and these inventions should prove as valuable as the committee believe they may, the cultivation of these plants will engage the attention of a large portion of the agriculturists, and become exceedingly important to the United States. It may be seen by the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the quantity and value of merchandise imported, that, during the year ending on the 30th of September, 1821, 86,192 cwt. of hemp, valued at $510,489, (being about $120 per ton;) hempen goods, of the value of $226,174; duck and sheeting, of the value of $894,276; cordage, of the value of $107,868; and linens, bleached and unbleached, of the value of $2,664,159, were imported into this country, amounting to $4,302,963, and that the whole value of the exports of domestic and foreign produce of the same kind, amounted only to $822,976, leaving the value of $3,479,187 in the merchandise produced from the hemp and flax plants to be consumed in this country.

As the petitioners desire an extension of time, and further protection than is secured by the patent law in its present form, and as it is the peculiar province of the Committee on the Judiciary to report any revision or amendment of that law which may be deemed necessary, your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Anthony Dey and James Macdonald, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom the subject was referred, by the resolution, on the 31st of January last, reported a bill supplementary to, and to amend, an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed March the 2d, 1799, and to repeal an act supplementary thereto, passed the 20th of April, 1818, and for other purposes; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The bill is as follows:

United States before the passage of this act, and shall arrive therein between the thirtieth September, eighteen hundred and twenty-two, and the first day of October, eighteen hundred and twenty-three.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to establish a Uniform System of Bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The thirty-ninth section was read without any proposition of amendment.

The fortieth section having been read—

Mr. RHEA moved to strike out the words "good reason" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "probable cause," in the 12th line of the said section, which, the question being put, was negatived. No further amendment being proposed to that section, the same, with the subsequent sections of the bill, to the forty-eighth inclusive, were read without further proposition of amendment.

The forty-ninth section having been read—

Mr. RHEA moved to strike out the same altogether, which motion was put and lost, without a division.

The fiftieth section, to the sixty-third inclusive, were then successively read without any proposition of amendment.

Mr. SERGEANT proposed to introduce between the sixty-third and sixty-fourth sections the following:

Sec. 64. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the commissioners, appointed under the authority of this act, once in every year to make a report, and transmit the same to the Secretary of State, stating the number of persons who shall have been declared bankrupt, the number and amount of debts proved, the amount of property surrendered and of dividends declared, noting in each case any such particular circumstances as may have affected the amount of the surrender or the dividends, together with the costs which have accrued under each commission, with such general remarks upon the operation of the law, and proposals for its amendment, as may seem to them material.

The proposition was agreed to.

The sixty-fourth section, being the last section of the bill, was then read without proposition of amendment.

Mr. SERGEANT submitted the following, to be added at the end of the fourth section:

"And provided, also, that when the party against whom a commission is prayed for, as herein before provided, shall, by writing, signed and accompanying such petition, signify his concurrence in the prayer thereof, the commission may be issued and proceeded upon without any allegation, affidavit, or proof of an act of bankruptcy having been committed, in like manner as if the same had been fully established."

The amendment was agreed to, with some verbal amendments in the subsequent sections, to correspond with the amendment.

Mr. COLDEN submitted the following, to be added to the third section of the bill:

"But the said commissioners and clerk shall not be allowed to charge as for a whole day, unless they have been actually employed in the same business six hours in the day for which a whole day is to be allowed; and that, where the said commissioners and clerks may not in one day be employed in the same business six hours, they shall be allowed only such a portion of five dollars as the time they are actually employed bears to six hours; but, in this calculation, fractions of hours shall not be regarded."

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. WOODCOCK, of New York, moved to strike out the last proviso to the seventh section; which motion was negatived.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, moved to insert in the bill, as the thirty-sixth section, the following:

"And be it further enacted, That any person or persons not entitled to the benefit of this act, who shall have been, or hereafter shall be, discharged by any State law, under the provisions thereof, shall be entitled to the benefit of said discharge, as fully as any bankrupt discharged by virtue of this act."

Mr. WRIGHT supported the amendment in a speech of considerable length.

Mr. SAWYER replied that the object which the amendment proposed to attain was sufficiently secured in the fifty-ninth section.

The question was then taken, and the motion was lost.

No further amendments having been offered, the Committee rose and reported the bill as amended.

The question was then taken on the several amendments as reported, and, with a modification of the last, they were respectively concurred in.

The question was then stated on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading; when

Mr. TRACY proposed to amend the bill by adding to the first section the same amendment which he offered in Committee of the Whole, for admitting others than merchants to avail themselves of the benefit of the law.

On this question Mr. TRACY called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered; and decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 90, as follows:

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, then moved to amend the said bill, by inserting after the word "act," in the 47th line of the first section, the following provision, viz:

And provided, also, That no certificate of discharge under the provisions of this act, shall operate to discharge any bankrupt from any debt or debts, except such as may be due or owing to persons who may be liable to become bankrupts under this act.

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 71, nays 87, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Archer, Ball, Barber of Ohio, Bassett, Bateman, Blair, Breckenridge, Brown, Buchanan, Burton, Campbell of Ohio, Cannon, Condict, Darlington, Edwards of North Carolina, Floyd, Gilmer, Gist, Hall, Hooks, Jackson, F. Smith, Spencer, Sterling of Connecticut, Tatnall, Taylor, Tod, Tomlinson, Upham, Vance, Whipple, White, Whitman, Williamson, Wood, and Worman.

Mr. WOODSON then moved to amend the said bill by inserting, after the word "act," in the said

47th line of the first section, the following words, viz:

"Unless with their consent; and they, and all other classes of the community, shall have the privilege, at their election, of becoming voluntary bankrupts, with the consent and approbation of a major part in value of all the creditors of such voluntary bankrupt, previously obtained and duly certified, and that such bankrupt shall be subjected to the same proceedings, and liable to the same penalties, fines, and forfeitures, and be entitled to all the privileges, benefits, and advantages, as are provided for, and made applicable to, all other bankrupts, by the regulations of this bill.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE said, he did not rise for the purpose of discussing the merits of the amendment proposed by his colleague, (Mr. WOODSON.) He felt that, to enter now into that discussion, would be an unpardonable consumption of the time of the House. He only desired to inform the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) and the friends of the bankrupt bill, that without some such provision as that offered by his colleague, the bill would not be supported by many who would advocate a law, embracing, under proper restrictions, all classes of the community. You have a right, sir, to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy. But are you bound to confine its operations to merchants only? And does not policy and justice alike require that the remedy should be commensurate with the evil? Will you not extend it to the mechanic, or any other class of your citizens, who may be subject to the vicissitudes of fortune? The citizens of the West are a trading people; they are all more or less engaged in that species of traffic, from which pecuniary embarrassment may arise. The East and the North desire that merchants only shall be embraced by the law. But, whilst they are relieved from the pressure of misfortune, will they not also lighten the burden of their brethren? He warned the friends of the bankrupt law, that if they rejected the proposed amendment, the bill itself would, in the end, be also rejected. Those opposed to the bankrupt bill, would not aid in its amendment—it must be done by the friends of the measure, or the whole is lost.

Mr. J. SPEED SMITH said that, as he had consumed no portion of the time of the House upon the motion to strike out the first section of the bill, and as he had no wish to go into a discussion of the constitutionality or expediency of the proposed system, he expected to meet the indulgence of the House whilst he offered a few remarks in support of the amendment offered by one of his colleagues, (Mr. WOODSON,) to those already presented by his friend from Kentucky, (Mr. BRECKENRIDGE,) who had just taken his seat.

In all general propositions, said Mr. SMITH, containing principles offered for legislative sanction, which are to operate as rules of conduct throughout a whole nation, there must necessarily be a concession of judgment and interest to a given extent. Otherwise, in a Government like ours, diversified at first by the hand of nature, propelled by contrariant interests in different directions, and chequered by the operations of municipal regulations, it would be impossible to advance the great common interest of the nation. It should not, therefore, be expected by the friends of the measure, that the interest and advantage of their immediate constituents alone, are to be consulted; nor should it be concluded by the advocates of the bill, that no other views but their own are worthy of consideration. Upon this floor, continued Mr. S., the feelings and interests of every class are, or should be, represented. It would most surely be unwise, and a violation of our duty, to legislate for the benefit of any class, to the exclusion of all others, unless in some special cases. This, sir, is a proposition to create, by legislative enactment, a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States. The policy, and, in the opinion of some most respectable gentlemen, the necessity, of this measure, grow out of the embarrassments and difficulties of a very large and meritorious class of our fellow-citizens, who have been engaged in commerce. Whilst I admit, said Mr. S., the great advantages which the country has received, and will continue to receive, from the enterprise and industry of commercial men; and whilst I recognise their right to be represented here, and declare my sympathies for their misfortunes, and readiness to lend my aid in all legitimate measures for their relief, I cannot forget that they constitute but a very small portion of the whole community, to all of whom the principle of the bill should be applied, whenever it shall pass into a law.

H. OF R.

The avowed object of the bill, sir, is to dissolve from all legal liability for debt the unfortunate man who has been overwhelmed by adversity, and thus redeem him from what has been pronounced cruel, unnecessary, and unmerited vassalage. Why confine the operation of your benign intention to persons designated in the bill? I affect not to know, sir, much about the wants and interests of commerce and trade, in our large cities and seaport towns; but I claim some knowledge of the situation of farmers and other persons not included in the bill, and, without undertaking to say that a bankrupt law is desired by them, I will venture the assertion, that it would be unfair and unequal to pass one without giving them the benefit of it. We are told, continued Mr. S., that commerce and trade demand the passage of this bill. Would you exclude agriculture, sir, upon which they both depend? If, from the operation of causes over which persons engaged in commerce and trade had no control, hundreds and thousands of our fellow-citizens have been ruined and undone, does it necessarily follow that those engaged in agriculture and other pursuits have not met with like calamities? In that country which has honored me with a seat here, and which is essentially an agricultural country, men engaged in commerce and trade do not constitute any thing like a majority of those who ought to be benefited by the provisions of the bill upon your table? From the paper system, which has been sanctioned not only by Kentucky and many other States in the Union, but by the Federal Government itself, many individuals, other than merchants and traders, have been undone, not by adventuring, said Mr. S. beyond their means, in commerce and trade, for the accumulation of wealth and the enjoyment of splendor; not with the hope of buying principalities and erecting palaces; no, sir, by yielding to the influence of those noble and generous feelings which adorn our nature—the feelings of friendship—many beyond the mountains, who, but a little while back, were living upon their farms in ease and independence, if not affluence, have found themselves suddenly ruined, and brought to poverty and want—not by their own prodigality, sir, but by bank endorsements and other securityship—for whom? Men engaged in commerce and trade. Can it be right, sir, can it possibly be right, that he who has been urged on by cupidity or ambition, and in the furtherance of those passions has surrounded himself, in his progress, by individuals drawn to him by feelings of partiality and friendship, when he sinks into ruin, and overwhelms his friends in his fall—can it be right, sir, I ask, to redeem him, and leave them hopeless, despondent, undone? If the individual thus redeemed looks with gratitude and love to his country, what must be the reflections of those whom he has undone, and their country leaves in ruin, when they draw a comparison of their situations? If you strengthen the attachment of the first to his country, you alienate the affection of the other.

The bill should also be clearly retrospective in its operation and power of redemption; otherwise, thousands of meritorious citizens will derive no benefit from its passage; and, if you do interpose, do it efficiently—let us have a general jubilee.

I do not speak, said Mr. S., of the situation of those who wish this law, in the large commercial cities of the Union. I speak of those in the West, the causes of whose embarrassments I better understand, and whose claims to all the advantages proposed by the bill are at least equal to the claims of any other portion of this great community.

In conclusion, sir, there is no punishment unaccompanied with ignominy, which I would not undergo rather than give my support to a measure which, if it does pass, should operate for the benefit and advantage of the whole people, but which, as the bill now stands, will be partial and unjust. I shall, therefore, with great pleasure, vote for the amendment.

Messrs. Ross and Cook spoke against the motion; when

The question being taken on thus amending the bill, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 78, as follows:

Mr. FULLER then moved further to amend the said bill, by inserting, after the word "commission," in the 7th line of the 35th section of the printed bill, the following, viz:

"Except, however, all debts from the bankrupt for supplies of provisions, wearing apparel, household furniture necessary for himself and his family, and for laborers' wages; but all such debts shall remain and may be recovered, so much as may be due after any dividend or partial payment therein, notwithstanding the certificate aforesaid, or any thing done pursuant to this act: Provided, however, That no single debt, so excepted, shall exceed two hundred dollars."

And on the question to agree to this amendment, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. WALWORTH then moved further to amend the said bill, by inserting, after the word "debts," in the 26th line of the 2d section of the printed bill, the following, to wit:

"And prove to the said judge, by the affidavit of such petitioner or petitioners, or by the oath of one or more credible witness or witnesses, that an act of bankruptcy, as mentioned in the first section of this act, has been committed by the person petitioned against within six months then last past."

And on the question to agree to this amendment, it was determined in the negative.

No further amendment having been offered to the bill, the question recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading; on which question Mr. RHEA called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Before the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky had obtained the sanction of this House, the question whether the bill should be engrossed for a third reading, was one of very great importance. That question has, however, dwindled into insignificance, compared with the one at present under consideration. We are now called upon to decide the fate of a measure of awful importance. The most dreadful responsibility rests upon us. We are not now to determine, merely, whether a bankrupt law shall be extended to the trading classes of the community; but whether it shall embrace every citizen of this Union, and spread its demoralizing influence over the whole surface of society.

The amendment which has been adopted to-day, makes it my imperative duty, even at this protracted period of the debate, to trespass upon the patience of the House. I have the honor, in part, of representing an honest, a wealthy, and a respectable, agricultural community. I owe it to them, to my conscience, and to my God, not to suffer this bill to pass, which I conceive to be now fraught with destruction to their best interests, both moral and political, without entering my solemn protest against its provisions.

We have heard it repeated over and over again, by the friends of a bankrupt bill, that it should be confined to the mercantile classes. One of the principal arguments urged in its favor, by its eloquent supporters, was, that merchants, from the nature of their pursuits, were exposed to the vicissitudes of fortune more than other men; and that therefore their situation required a peculiar system of laws. That, in this country, their fortunes had not only been exposed to the dangers commonly incident to their profession; but, that the commercial regulations of the Government, the embargo, the non-intercourse laws, and finally the war, had brought ruin upon thousands. It was, therefore, inferred, that Congress were under a moral obligation to pass a bankrupt law for their relief.

The policy of all the modern commercial nations in the world, was presented before us for our imitation. England, France, Scotland, Ireland, Holland, and Spain, we had been told, each extended a bankrupt law to the merchant, and absolved him from the payment of his debts, upon certain conditions. Indeed, a great portion of the argument consisted in drawing a line of distinction between traders and the remaining classes of society.

Judge then, Mr. Speaker, of my astonishment, when to-day I found those very gentlemen voting in favor of introducing an amendment, extending the provisions of this bill to every individual in society, who might ask to become its object.

Will you pass a bankrupt law for the farmer? Will you teach that vast body of your best citizens to disregard the faith of contracts? Are you prepared to sanction a principle by which the whole mass of society will be in danger of being demoralized, and it will be left to an election by every man's creditors, in which a majority of two-thirds in number and value, against the consent of the remainder, shall have the power of discharging him from the obligation of all his contracts? Surely the House of Representatives are not prepared to answer these questions in the affirmative. No nation in the world, whether commercial or agricultural, whether civilized or savage, has ever for a moment entertained the idea of extending the operation of their bankrupt laws beyond the class of traders. Fortunately for our constituents, we have not the power of doing so. The Constitution, correctly expounded, has proclaimed "hitherto shalt thou go, but no farther." Nothing but a desperate effort to revive this expiring bill, could have ever induced its friends to have adopted the amendment which has just now been carried.

In the discussion of this question, I can assure the House, it is not my intention to travel over the ground which has been already occupied, or to repeat the arguments which have been already urged.

The subject naturally divides itself into two questions—the one of Constitutional power, the other of policy. On the first, as the bill stood before the introduction of the last amendment, I had not a single doubt. Much as I would have deprecated the passage of the then bill, I should have been infinitely more alarmed if this House had determined that the enactment of such a law transcended the Constitutional power of Congress. Upon this branch of the subject, the ingenious arguments of the gentleman from Virginia had not created a doubt in my mind. Where doubts before did exist, the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWNDES) and of my honorable colleague (Mr. SÉRGÉANT) were, in my opinion, calculated entirely to remove them, and to carry conviction to every understanding.

A new question of Constitutional power has now arisen on the amendment. The Constitution declares that "the Congress shall have power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." To this provision I am willing to give a fair and a liberal construction. Congress have the power to discharge from their debts, on the terms prescribed by the bill, all persons upon whom a law, emanating from this clause of the Constitution, may legitimately act. But can Congress make a law extending the penalties and the privileges of a bankrupt system to every individual in society? Can they embrace in its provisions the farmer, the clergyman, the physician, or the lawyer? Such a proposition was never seriously contended for before this day.

By considering the meaning of the term bankrupt, we shall be able at once to solve the difficulty. In adverting to its origin, we find the literal signification of the word to be a broken counter; which by a figure of speech has been applied in our language to a broken merchant. In the commercial laws of all the nations of the continent of Europe, bankruptcy is confined to merchants, in the strictest sense of the word. The operation of the bankrupt laws of England has been extended, by judicial construction, somewhat further; and they now embrace within their grasp not only the merchant, properly so called, but all persons who are traders, and are concerned in buying and selling any kind of merchandise, unless they have been expressly excepted by some positive legislative provision. This exposition of the law extends not only to those who sell any commodity in the same State in which they purchased it, but also to the manufacturer and the mechanic who bestow upon it their favor and their skill, and thus render it more valuable. The bill as it formerly stood confined itself strictly within this range. Indeed it was more circumscribed as to the persons on whom it would have operated than the bankrupt laws of England.

I am willing then to expound the power of Congress upon the subject literally. In construing the Constitution, Congress ought not to be fettered by nice technical rules. I admit that they have the power, whenever they think proper to call it into exercise, of establishing a system of bankruptcy which shall embrace all persons who have ever been embraced, even by the bankrupt laws of England. Further than this they cannot proceed, without extending the plain meaning of the word bankruptcy as it has been received by every commercial nation of Europe, and violating both the letter and the spirit of the Constitution.

In making this admission, I am sensible that many may suppose I am giving a latitude of construction to the instrument which is not warranted by its spirit. The authority "to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States" is contained in a clause of the Constitution which immediately follows that "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." The power over bankruptcy evidently originated from, and is closely connected with that over commerce. This commerce, which Congress has the power of regulating, is chiefly if not exclusively conducted by merchants in the strictest sense of the term, and principally by that class of them denominated importers. They are the men most exposed to the vicissitude of trade, and on that account are more properly the objects of such a law than people of any other description. It might therefore with much plausibility be contended that the power of Congress over bankruptcy is confined to that description of merchants.

Another argument, which would give additional strength to this construction, arises from the general spirit of the federal institutions. They do not propose to embrace the internal policy of the States. The jurisdiction of the federal courts is confined by the Constitution to controversies between citizens of different States, and between foreigners and citizens of the United States. To such suits the merchants who carry on the intercourse with foreign nations, and between the different States, are most generally parties.

The object which I have in view in using these arguments is not to prove that the Constitutional power of Congress is confined to such merchants; but to show that it is contrary to the nature and the spirit of our Government to extend it to all classes of people in the community. The bill as it stood before the amendment went quite far enough. It would even then have brought the operation of the law and the jurisdiction of the federal courts, into the bosom of every community. The bill, however, as it now stands, if it should pass, will entirely destroy the symmetry of our system and make those courts the arbiters in almost every case of contract to which any member of society, who thinks proper to become a bankrupt, may be a party. It will at once be, in a great degree, a judicial consolidation of the Union. This was never intended by the framers of the Constitution. Some of the terrible evils which would flow from such a system I shall have occasion to delineate, when I come to speak of the policy of its adoption.

Before, Mr. Speaker, I proceed to expose to the view of the House those objections against this bill which have presented themselves with peculiar force to my mind, permit me to answer some of the principal arguments which have been urged in favor of its passage. My friend and colleague from Pennsylvania, in his concluding speech, has made such a clear, forcible, and eloquent argument in favor of the bill, that I fear it has produced a considerable effect. Upon this occasion he was listened to, as he always is, and always deserves to be, with the most profound attention. It is painful for me to be under the necessity of differing from him in opinion, and when I do so, I am almost inclined to distrust my own judgment. Nothing, therefore, but an imperative sense of duty could have induced me to take any part in the debate upon the present occasion.

It has been urged that, as the framers of the Constitution gave to Congress the power of passing a bankrupt law, we are bound to put that power into practical operation, and not suffer it to remain dormant.

In answer to this argument I would reply, that power and duty are very different in their nature. Power is optional; duty imperative. The language of power is that you may, that of duty you must. The Constitution has, in the same section, and in the same terms, given to Congress the power to declare war, to borrow money, to raise and support armies, &c. Will any gentleman, however, undertake to say, we are under an obligation to give life and energy to these powers by bringing them into action? Will it be contended that, because we possess the power of declaring war and borrowing money, that we are under a moral obligation to embroil ourselves with foreign Governments, or load the country with a national debt? Should any individual act upon the principle that it is his duty to do every thing which he has the legal power of doing, he would soon make himself a fit citizen for a madhouse.

Power, whether vested in Congress or in an individual, necessarily implies the right of exercising a sound discretion. The Constitution was intended not only for us, and for those who have gone before us, but for generations yet to come. It has vested in Congress ample powers, to be called into action whenever, in their sound discretion, they believe the interest or the happiness of the people require their exertion. We are, therefore, left to exercise our judgment on this subject, entirely untrammelled by any Constitutional injunction.

It has been said that the passage of such a bill as the one now before us is necessary, on account of the numerous frauds which are perpetrated under the insolvent laws of the States, and the preference which they authorize a failing debtor to give to particular creditors.

From the forcible manner in which this argument has been urged, one would be induced to suppose that the legislative authority of the States, upon this subject, had been entirely prostrated by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Sturges vs. Crowninshield. This is, however, altogether a mistake. The citizens of the States have not been left exposed to the mercy of fraudulent debtors. They can look to their own Legislatures for relief. Their power to pass bankrupt laws is as ample within their several States as that of Congress, with one single exception: which is, that such laws shall not contain a provision "impairing the obligation of contracts." This tremendous power the people have decreed that the States shall not exercise. With the exception, therefore, of that portion of this bill which discharges a bankrupt from his debts, the Legislatures of the several States might, if they thought proper, enact all its provisions. They have the same power to pass every law for the prevention and punishment of the frauds of insolvent traders which Congress possess. They can equally annul all preferences which a failing debtor may give to a favorite creditor, whether by deed of trust, by judgment, or in any other manner. This principle is expressly recognised in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case which I have cited. There is then no necessity that Congress should interfere for the purpose of securing the creditor; yet this has been urged as one of the principal reasons in favor of the passage of a bankrupt bill.

It cannot be denied that many of the States have neglected to exercise the authority which they fully possess over this subject. In the State, one of whose representatives I have the honor to be, a failing debtor of every description possesses too much power in the distribution of his property. He may, if he chooses, secure one creditor at the expense of all the rest. He is the sole judge of the propriety of any preference which he may think proper to make. The Legislature of that, and of every other State where a similar evil exists, can however apply the remedy, if they think proper. Why then has it been urged upon us, that it is absolutely necessary Congress should pass this bill, to secure creditors against the frauds and the preferences which exist under the insolvent laws of the States, when the States themselves possess ample powers to attain the same ends?

It has been said, truly, that Congress alone can pass a bankrupt law which will be uniform over the United States. But, I would ask, whether the benefits resulting from the uniformity which the law must possess would not be more nominal than real, whilst, on the other hand, it would be a source of the most serious inconveniences? Is it correct legislation to force upon the citizens of one State a system of internal policy, deeply affecting the rights of creditor and debtor, which may be ruinous and demoralizing to them, because it may promote the prosperity of another State? All laws should be adapted to the character and to the habits of those on whom they are designed to operate. Upon this principle of uniformity, which must be introduced into any bill that you have the power of passing, you are obliged to adapt your citizens to the law, not the law to your citizens. Will any gentleman say, that the same internal political regulations, respecting creditor and debtor, should exist in each of the States composing this vast Union? For example, would the same laws be suited to the manners and to the habits of the citizens of Louisiana which might be beneficial in the State of Maine? This necessity for uniformity, in legislating upon the subject of bankruptcy, reminds me of the bed of Procrustes. He made every person of every size fit it. If they were too long for its dimensions, he lopped off their limbs; if too short, he stretched them to the proper length.

The uniformity which must exist in any law that we have the power of passing, shows, in a forcible point of view, the propriety of State legislation upon the subject, in preference to that of Congress, it will be better adapted to the peculiar habits of the citizens of the respective States.

It has been urged, as an objection to State legislation, that, as they can pass no law impairing the obligation of contracts, they cannot discharge a bankrupt from his debts. This is certainly true. If, therefore, it be deemed proper that the States should possess that power, it can be bestowed on them by an amendment to the Constitution.

On this part of the subject I am much obliged to my honorable colleague for the clear and forcible distinction which he has drawn between contracts, and the means of enforcing them—between rights and remedies. This distinction is also precisely marked in the opinion of the court in the case of Sturges and Crowninshield. The States, it is true, cannot impair the obligation of a contract, but they possess a discretionary power, to a considerable extent, in modifying the remedy of the creditor. I have been informed that no species of execution in Rhode Island will touch the debtor's real estate, yet the law of that State, in this respect, has never been supposed to be unconstitutional. Why then might not the States, if they thought it politic, declare, that, after a debtor had fairly relinquished all his property for the benefit of his creditors, in such a manner as might be directed by law, their process of execution should not be used by a vindictive creditor against the acquisitions of his debtor for a certain number of years, and then only against a part of them, and for the common benefit of all the creditors? If such a provision, or one of a similar nature, be Constitutional—and I confess I can perceive no reason, founded either upon principle or precedent, sufficient to convince me that it would not—the States already possess the power of relieving an honest bankrupt to a considerable extent. This is however, a delicate subject, on which I wish to express no decided opinion. How far a State may proceed constitutionally, in controlling the process of her own courts, has never yet been determined. The precise point, at which the power of regulating the process would interfere with the prohibition against impairing the obligation of the contract, will be difficult to ascertain.

The advocates of this bill have presented it to us in the garb of a political experiment. Say they, its duration is limited to the term of three years. It must then die, unless its existence shall be prolonged by the joint act of all the legislative departments. Its enemies, therefore, ought not to apprehend serious evils from its enactment.

In answer to this suggestion, it may be observed, that legislative experiments should be tried with extreme caution. An act may expire in three years by its own limitation; you may repeat it at the end of one, should its operation be found injurious, but yet its pernicious influence may last for ages. If, by expunging a law from your statute book, you would efface its effects from the human mind, or withdraw its influence from the human character, then, indeed, experiments in politics would be as harmless as those in philosophy. This, however, is not the case. We all agree that the bill, if it should pass, is what may, with propriety, be called a strong measure. It is not a mere theory. Its effects upon society will be immediate, and either good or evil to a great extent. Whether, therefore, it shall continue but three years, or be perpetual, ought not much to influence the decision of the question.

The experience of other countries, respecting bankrupt laws, has been introduced into this argument by the friends of the bill, for the purpose of furthering their views, whilst, on the other hand, its enemies have contended, that the practical operation of the bankrupt law of England, and of that one which heretofore existed in this country, present powerful reasons against the passage of this bill. Into this controversy I will not enter, because the subject has been already fully discussed. There is, however, one event in the history of Pennsylvania which speaks volumes against the passage of this bill. On the 13th March, 1812, the Legislature of that State, after much solicitation, passed a bankrupt or insolvent law, under the provisions of which debtors were to be relieved from the obligation of their contracts. The operation of this act was confined to the city and county of Philadelphia. It was there that the commerce of the State was chiefly conducted, and it was there the merchants resided who were most liable to be ruined by the fluctuations of trade. If there ever was a place where a fair experiment could have been made of the effects of such a law, Philadelphia was peculiarly that place. What was the consequence? The act would have expired by its own limitation on the 1st of April, 1814, but it was not suffered to exist one month beyond the next meeting of the Legislature after its passage. It was repealed on the 21st December, 1812. I am now informed, by my colleague, (Mr. BROWN,) who was then a member of the Legislature, that the representatives from that district, who, but a few months before, had strained every nerve to procure the passage of the bill, were the most active in obtaining its repeal. On the very first day of the session they presented a great number of petitions from their constituents, praying that the law might no longer be suffered to exist. Such were its baneful effects in so short a period of time. Whilst on this part of the subject I will merely add, that this law was repealed long before the Supreme Court of the United States had decided that the States had not the power of introducing into a bankrupt law a clause discharging the bankrupt from his debts. Before this decision was made, the Supreme Courts, both of New York and Pennsylvania, had held a contrary doctrine.

The Bankrupt Bill.

I shall now proceed to lay before the House my objections to the passage of this bill. As it now stands, certain classes of society are exposed to its adverse operation, upon the commission of any of the acts of bankruptcy, described in its first section. Every individual in the community, including those embraced by the bill previous to the late amendment, may become voluntary bankrupts.

It will be necessary here briefly to inquire who may be declared bankrupts against their will. The adverse operation of the law will not be confined to wholesale and retail merchants, strictly speaking, and to dealers in exchange, bankers, brokers, factors, underwriters, and marine insurers. By the construction which has been placed upon the words "other person, actually using the trade of merchandise, by buying and selling, in gross or by retail," not only every dealer in any article, but every manufacturer or mechanic who purchases any material, bestows his skill and labor upon it, and sells it in its improved state, falls within the compulsory branch of this bill, unless expressly excepted by the proviso in its first section. Thus, the distiller who purchases grain, converts it into whiskey, and sells the whiskey, would clearly be within its operation. The miller, also, who buys wheat, and sells it converted into flour, may be declared a bankrupt against his will. These cases are cited only as examples to illustrate the general rule. Each individual member can imagine many others.

I will now proceed to that which strikes my mind as a radical objection to the existence of this or any other adversary bankrupt bill in the United States. It arises from the nature of our free institutions, and is one that exists in no other country on the globe. It springs out of the best principles of the Federal Constitution, and it cannot be removed without expunging them from the instrument.

In what manner is a person to be declared a bankrupt by the bill now before the House? On the petition of any creditor, accompanied by an affidavit of the truth of his debt, the Circuit or District Judge of the United States is authorized to issue a commission of bankruptcy. The alleged bankrupt may, however, appear before the commissioners, deny that he has committed any act of bankruptcy, and demand a trial by a jury of his country, before the Judge who issued the commission. This is a right of which he cannot be deprived by the power of Congress. In the emphatic language of the Constitution, "he shall not be deprived of his life, his liberty, or his property, without due process of law."

This trial before the Circuit or District Judge may, and probably will, in a majority of cases, be delayed for years, before its final termination. In free governments we cannot move with the celerity of despotism. During its pendency, what becomes of the property of the alleged bankrupt? He cannot be dispossessed of it under the Constitution of the country, or by the provisions of this bill, until the jury shall have convicted him of some one of the acts of bankruptcy described in its first section. But, although it cannot be wrested from him until after the event, yet the moment the commission issues, he, in effect, loses all control over his estate. The reason of this is, that, by the provisions of the bill, all intermediate dispositions made by the debtor of his property are absolutely void, should he finally be declared a bankrupt. No person, therefore, could, with safety, in the meantime, enter into any contract with him, on purchase any part of his estate. From the very nature of an adverse bankrupt system, this must necessarily be the case. If it were not, every man charged with having committed an act of bankruptcy would demand a trial by jury before the District or Circuit Judge of the United States; so that, during its pendency, he might have an opportunity to dispose of his property as he thought proper. This would be giving a legal sanction to the very evil which the friends of the bill say it is chiefly intended to remedy.

What, then, is the situation in which the bill places every man within its adverse provisions? Any of his creditors, or pretended creditors, by making an ex parte affidavit of the truth of his debt, without even proving, by his own oath, or otherwise, any act of bankruptcy against him, may bring upon him inevitable and overwhelming destruction. If envy or malice against him rankles in the soul of any enemy, who either is his creditor, or who will swear that he is, that enemy may wreak his vengeance to the full extent of his wishes, by having a commission of bankruptcy issued against him. The commission itself would be the death warrant of his property, notwithstanding his property may have been sufficient to discharge his debts, and he may have been guilty of no act of bankruptcy. If he submits to the commission, his credit is gone and his power of exertion is at an end, until he shall have obtained his final discharge. If he does not, and demands a trial, he is, during its pendency, in the situation of Tantalus in the infernal regions. Although he may be surrounded by all the comforts of life and the means of extricating himself from his difficulties, he has not the power of using them. If he should be a merchant, his counting-house must be closed and his capital remain idle, awaiting the result of a tedious lawsuit. If he be a farmer, who has carried on a distillery, or who has been a miller, or retail merchant, he cannot dispose of an acre of his land, or any of his personal property, until the controversy is determined. Whether, therefore, he submits to the commission or does not, if he be an honest man he is exposed to inevitable ruin. If he be a fraudulent debtor, the delay of the trial will afford him ample time and opportunity to secrete his property, and place it beyond the reach of his creditors; and, in this situation, he will have the strongest temptation to be guilty of fraud.

The bankrupt law of England, the model from which the present bill has been drawn, provides an effectual remedy for this evil. It is one, however, which we have no Constitutional power to adopt, and, if we had, it would be repugnant to every feeling of the hearts of freemen. In that country the bare issuing of the commission is itself equivalent to an execution. The debtor is at once deprived of the possession of all his property, and it is vested in the commissioners. Although he may declare that he has never been guilty of an act of bankruptcy, and petition for a trial, he petitions in vain. The iron hand of the law is upon him, and no innocence can elude its grasp. In that country, the law declares that "caveats against commissions are not allowed, for they give too much time to a fraudulent debtor." The proceedings under it resemble those of the judges in the infernal regions who first condemn and afterwards hear. They first deprive a man of all his property, by virtue of the commission, and, after the evil has been done, allow him to apply to the Chancellor to have it superseded.

From the nature of those Governments on the continent of Europe, under whose dominion bankrupt laws prevail, and from the peculiar character of those laws, and of the commercial tribunals by whom they are administered, the same evils do not exist. I will not exhaust the patience of the House by detailing their different provisions.

It may be said that, as the bill provides that the petitioning creditor, before the commission can issue, shall give bond, to be taken by the circuit or district judge, in such penalty and with such surety as he may direct, conditioned that the obligor shall prove the debtor to be a bankrupt, he will be enabled to recover damages to the extent of any injury which he may sustain, in case the condition of the bond should be violated.

This remedy, from its nature, could be no compensation for the injury sustained. To inform a man, after he had been arrested in the pursuit of his business by a commission of bankruptcy; after his prospects in life had been blasted; after his credit had been destroyed; and after he had been pursued for years in a course of litigation, which had terminated in his favor, that he might then enter upon another law-suit and bring his action upon the bond, would be laughing at his calamity. This would present no prospect of indemnity, even if the obligors should be solvent; but, from the ignorance of the judges, so far removed from the people as those of the United States necessarily are, respecting the solvency of the sureties, and from the lapse of time which must transpire before any suit could be sustained upon the bond, it would in most instances, be of little or no value.

These, then, would be the effects of the bill on the persons within its adverse operation.

Let us next inquire what would be the moral and practical effects of this bill, with the amendment just adopted of the gentleman from Kentucky. Should it pass in its present shape, I shudder at the consequences. How will it affect the great agricultural interest of the country? I have the honor, in part, to represent a district chiefly composed of farmers. They are honest, they are industrious, and they esteem their contracts to be sacred and inviolable. The word of most of them, could their existence be perpetuated, binds them as forcibly as their bond. Have they, or have any other agriculturists over the whole range of this extensive Union, asked you to pass a bankrupt law in their favor? Have they ever petitioned you to discharge them from the obligation of their contracts, which they feel themselves as much bound in conscience as in law to perform? It is certain that many honest and respectable men of that valuable class of society have been unfortunate, and I pity them from my inmost soul; but, I beseech you, spare them from a law for which they have never asked, and which would tempt them to add guilt to misfortune.

What would be the necessary operation of such a law, when brought home to them and to every other member of society? Once declare that contracts shall be no longer sacred; that any debtor, whether he has been a trader or not, by complying with the provisions of the law, may have an election held by his creditors, and if two-thirds of them in number and value consent, may be relieved from all his debts against the will of the remainder; and you make a direct attack on the first principles of moral honesty, by which the great mass of the people have been hitherto directed. Let a bankrupt be presented to the view of society, who has become wealthy since his discharge, and who, after having ruined a number of his creditors, shields himself from the payment of his honest debts by his certificate, and what effects would such a spectacle be calculated to produce? Examples of this nature must at length demoralize any people. The contagion introduced by the laws of the country, would, for that very reason, spread like a pestilence, until honesty, honor, and faith, will at length be swept from the intercourse of society. Leave the agricultural interest pure and uncorrupted, and they will forever form the basis on which the Constitution and liberties of your country may safely repose. Do not, I beseech you, teach them to think lightly of the solemn obligation of contracts. No Government on earth, however corrupt, has ever enacted a bankrupt law for farmers, it would be a perfect monster in this country, where our institutions depend altogether upon the virtue of the people. We have no Constitutional power to pass the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky; and, if we had, we never should do so, because such a provision would spread a moral taint through society which would corrupt it to its very core.

There is another point of view in which this bill, in its practical effects, would be intolerable. The jurisdiction of federal courts over citizens of the United States is now chiefly confined to controversies existing between the citizens of different States. This bill, if it should become a law, will amount to almost a judicial consolidation of the Union. The litigation which will arise out of it, and which, by its provisions, must be exclusively determined by the federal courts, will embrace a large portion of the citizens of every State, either as parties or witnesses.

The Bankrupt Bill.

The numerous acts of bankruptcy described in the bill, many of which depend altogether upon the intention of the party charged with having committed them, would form the first ample source of exclusive federal jurisdiction.

By the fifty-sixth section it is provided that any creditor of a bankrupt, appearing before the Commissioners, may, at his election, have the validity of his claim determined in the circuit court of the district in which the bankrupt resides. The same privilege is extended to the assignees objecting to the validity of any claim upon the bankrupt, presented before the Commissioners; in this manner every law suit which could arise in the settlement of a bankrupt's estate, respecting the demands of any of his creditors, would be drawn into the circuit court for decision. This would be the case whether he became a bankrupt voluntarily or by compulsion, and without any regard either to his occupation or place of residence, or that of his creditors. The whole structure of the National Judiciary would thus be changed. It would then possess jurisdiction, not only over controversies arising between citizens of different States, but over an immense number of those existing between citizens of the same State.

It would be tedious to enumerate, and perhaps impossible to foresee, all the controversies which, under the provisions of this bill, must exclusively be determined by the federal courts. The sixty-third section contains a sweeping clause upon this subject. It provides "that, except in the cases 'which are in this act otherwise specially provided for, if any bankrupt, or any assignee or assignees, creditor or creditors, or any other person, shall conceive himself, herself, or themselves, aggrieved by any examination, order, decision, denial, or other proceeding of the Commissioners, under any commission, or any act, proceeding, refusal, neglect, or omission of the bankrupt, or any assignee or assignees, or creditor or creditors, under, or by virtue of this act,' such person may petition the circuit court, for the district where the commission issued, or either of its judges, for relief. The court, or the judge, is then bound to take cognizance of the complaint, and, at the election of either party, direct any facts in controversy to be tried by a jury.

In the State of Pennsylvania there are but two district courts of the United States, the one located in the city of Philadelphia, the other in the city of Pittsburg. The distance between these two places is three hundred miles. The inconvenience and expense to the people, from every section of the State of attending those two courts, as parties, and as witnesses, would be an intolerable grievance. Under the provisions of this bill, however, such attendance must necessarily be a matter of daily occurrence. The people are already sufficiently harassed, by being obliged to be present at the courts within their own counties; but, if you compel them to travel to the federal courts, from one extremity of a large State to the other, it would be an evil scarcely to be endured. The same inconveniences will exist in every other State in the Union, but they will be felt in a greater degree by the people of the larger States. This is another radical objection against the passage of a bankrupt bill by Congress. It is one which cannot be renewed, because it results from the organization of the federal courts under the Constitution, and the allotment of judicial power between them and the courts of the several States. It demonstrates, however, that the power to pass bankrupt laws could be exercised by the States much more conveniently for the people, than by the General Government.

Another serious objection to the passage of the bill, is its manifest tendency to increase the perpetration of fraud. It is true, it has been strenuously maintained by its friends, that it will, in a great degree, repress that evil. Has the experience of England justified them in making this prediction? Does not the testimony which has been taken before the committee of the House of Commons prove clearly the contrary? Indeed, so pressed down with its weight was my honorable colleague, (Mr. S.,) that he was obliged to attribute the innumerable frauds which had been committed under the bankrupt law of that country, not to the operation of the law itself, but to the general corruption which prevailed among the people. This bill, should it become a law, must be productive of innumerable frauds, unless it will have the power of changing the nature of man, and rendering him the less criminal because he is the more tempted. He who created man, and therefore best knew his heart, directed him to pray that he might not be led into temptation. This bill informs the debtor that, if he will conform to its provisions, he shall obtain a certificate which will discharge him from all his debts. The State insolvent laws declare to him that, when he has given up all his property for the use of his creditors, he has done no more than his duty, and that his future acquisitions shall be answerable until his debts are paid. If a debtor can pass the ordeal of this bankrupt law, and obtain his certificate, he may then in security enjoy that property which successful fraud has enabled him to conceal. Under the State insolvent laws, however, he must know that the moment his concealed property is brought to light, it is liable to be seized by his creditors. Whilst, therefore, a bankrupt law holds out every temptation to make the debtor dishonest, an insolvent law presents him no such inducement. Indeed, his true policy is directly the reverse. Upon his good and fair conduct, and the consequent favorable regard of his creditors, depend his hopes of a discharge.

It is true, that by this bill a bankrupt cannot obtain a discharge from all his debts, unless by the consent of two-thirds of his creditors in number and value. In theory this would appear to present a considerable difficulty in the way of obtaining a certificate. In practice, under the English bankrupt laws, it has been found more nominal than real. Indeed, but few instances have, I believe, occurred in the history of their bankrupt laws, in which consent has not been obtained. In this country, under our judiciary system, it would, perhaps, be still easier for the bankrupt to escape from his debts. He himself, if he be fraudulently disposed, can, by his own act, create as many creditors as he chooses. If the assignees or the other creditors think proper to dispute the claims of those believed to be fraudulent, they may insist upon having a trial by jury before the circuit court. Where the bankrupt has little or no property to divide, as would be the case in most instances, neither his assignees nor honest creditors would incur the expense and trouble of carrying on a lawsuit, perhaps a hundred miles from home, to disprove any debt presented before the commissioners. Even should they think proper to do so, it would be difficult to accomplish it, if the fraud had been conducted with any art; because, in the law, fraud is never to be presumed, but must be clearly proved.

H. OF R.

The Bankrupt Bill.

The evils which would flow from the retrospective operation of this bill I shall not touch; they have already been ably and eloquently descanted upon by others.

I shall now come to my concluding argument against the passage of this bill. It would tend again to arouse the spirit of wild and extravagant speculation, which has spread distress far and wide over the land. It will tend again to produce those very evils for which its friends say it is intended to provide a remedy.

What has been the history of this country? Upon this subject let us not turn a deaf ear to the dictates of experience. It is the best teacher of political wisdom.

Under our glorious Constitution, the human mind is unrestrained in the pursuit of happiness. The calm of despotism does not rest upon us. Neither the institutions of the country, nor the habits of society, have established any castes within the limits of which man shall be confined. The human intellect walks abroad in its majesty. This admirable system of government, which incorporates the rights of man into the Constitution of the country, develops all the latent resources of the intellect, and brings them into active energy. The road to wealth and to honor is not closed against the humblest citizen; and Heaven forbid that it ever should!

It is, however, the destiny of man to learn that evil often treads closely upon the footsteps of good. The very liberty which we enjoy, unless we are restrained by the dictates of morality and of prudence, has a tendency to make us discontented with our condition. It often produces a restless temper, and a disposition to be perpetually changing our pursuits, for the purpose of becoming more wealthy or more distinguished. The frame of mind produced by freedom, if kept within proper bounds, is a source of the greatest advantages to individuals and to society; if unrestrained and suffered to run wild, it leads to every species of extravagance and folly.

A few merchants, both in the cities and in the country, have amassed splendid and princely fortunes. These have glittered in the fancy of the thoughtless and unsuspecting countryman, and have roused his ambition or his avarice. He never calculated that it requires a union of considerable parts with great experience to make an accomplished merchant; and that, with all these advantages, but few comparatively are successful. His son is taught book-keeping at a country school, and then he abandons the pursuit of his fathers. He leaves the business of agriculture, which is the most peaceful, the most happy, the most independent, and, I might add, the most respectable, in society, to become a merchant. He spurns the idea of treading in the path of his ancestors, and acquiring his living by the sweat of his brow. Wealth and distinction have become his idols, and have turned his brain.

Is not this the history of thousands in our country within the last twenty years? It was not difficult to predict what would be the melancholy catastrophe. Bankruptcy and ruin have fallen upon the thoughtless adventurers.

Happy would it have been for the country had this spirit of speculation confined itself to the farmer who turned merchant. We have witnessed it spreading over every class of the community. We have, in innumerable instances, seen the plain, sober, industrious, and experienced farmer, converted into a speculator in land and in stocks. We have lived in a time when the foundations of society appeared to be shaken, and when the love of gain seemed to swallow up every other passion of the heart. This disposition gave birth to the hundreds and the thousands of banks which have spread themselves over the country. Their reaction upon the people doubled the force of the original cause which produced them. They deluged the country with bank paper. The price of land rose far beyond its real value; it commanded from $200 to $400 per acre in many parts of the district which I have the honor, in part, to represent; and I know one instance in which a man agreed to give $1,500 per acre for a tract of land, which he afterwards laid out in town lots. He sold the lots at so large a profit that he would have accumulated an independent fortune by the speculation, had not the times changed, and the lot-holders, in consequence, been unable to pay the purchase money.

This universal delusion has vanished; the enchantment is at an end; the people have been restored to their sober senses. In the change, which was rapid, many honest and respectable citizens have been ruined. Among many, misery and want have usurped the abodes of happiness and plenty. I most sincerely deplore their situation; but, as legislators, we should also have some compassion on the community. Experience has taught us a lesson which, I trust, we shall never forget—that a wild and extravagant spirit of speculation is one of the greatest curses which can pervade our country. Do you wish again to rouse it? Do you wish again to witness the desolation which it has spread over the land, and which we are now slowly repairing? Then pass this bankrupt bill. Inform the farmer, who is now contented and happy, and whom experience has taught the danger of entering into trade, that he may become a merchant or a landjobber; that he may proceed to any excess he thinks proper; that he need confine the extravagance of his speculations within no other limit but the extent of his credit; that if, at last, he should be successful, unbounded wealth will be his portion—if not, the law will discharge him from all his debts, and enable him to begin a new career; hold out a lure to all the industrious classes in society to abandon their useful and honorable pursuits, and enter into speculation of some kind or other, by proclaiming it as the law, that, if they should prove unsuccessful, their debts shall be cancelled, and they shall be restored to their former situation. Such a law would present the strongest temptations to every man in society to become indolent and extravagant, because every man in society is embraced by its provisions. In this respect it is as novel as it is dangerous. Rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that our population require the curb more than the rein. If you hold out such encouragement to unbounded speculation as this bill presents, we shall, before many years, see all the occurrences again presented before us which have involved the country in unexampled distress.

The time may come, ages hence, when a bankrupt law may become necessary for the encouragement of commerce. History has instructed us that nations, like men, rise, and flourish, and decay. At present our population possesses all the vigor and enterprise of youth. The stimulus of such a bill would drive us on to madness. It would be putting into the hands of Phæton the reins of the chariot of the sun. The day will come, but I trust it is now far distant, when old age shall fall upon us as a nation—when wealth shall beget luxury and corruption—and when we shall be enfeebled in all our exertions. Then it may be necessary to hold out extraordinary allurements to commercial enterprise. When that day shall arrive; when our country shall be sinking into decline; when her energies shall be paralyzed; and when, perhaps, a new Republic, vigorous as ours is at present, may be her competitor in commerce, then, and not till then, will it be necessary that Congress should exercise the power vested in them by the Constitution, and pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies.

When Mr. B. had concluded—

Mr. WRIGHT replied.

To put an end to further discussion of the subject, Mr. TAYLOR remarked that he felt it his duty to call for the previous question, and, on motion, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96.

At the suggestion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, Mr. CAMBRELENG moved for a reconsideration of the vote for the previous question just taken; but the House refused to reconsider the same—yeas 69, nays 83.

The main question was then ordered, and was put, on reading the bill a third time, and decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 99, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, March 13.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed, on the 14th ultimo, to inquire into the expediency of permitting aliens, who resided within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States one year immediately preceding the declaration of the late war between the United States and Great Britain, and who have continued to reside within the same, to become citizens without a compliance with the first condition specified in the first section of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization," approved April 14th, 1802, made a report thereon; which was read, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the same committee, also reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Frederick S. Warburg; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Rules of the House.

MARCH 1822.

Mr. GILMER submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be instructed to report to the House of Representatives, what evidences of claims, recorded in the office of the Department of State, in pursuance of the act of Congress, passed 31st March, 1814, providing for the indemnification of certain claims of public lands in the Mississippi Territory, remain in that office, after having been rejected by the commissioners appointed under that act; whether the Secretary of State has refused to deliver up such evidences of claims to the claimants, together with the reasons of such refusal, specifying the names of such claimants as applied to withdraw their evidences of claims.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table one day.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, moved for the consideration of the joint resolution from the Senate, now lying on the table, for fixing a time for the adjournment of Congress, which motion was negatived—the House refusing to consider it.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, the House went into the consideration of the report of the select committee appointed to revise and alter the standing rules and orders of the House.

The first alteration proposed in the report, was of the 16th rule, so as to substitute Maine for New Hampshire, in the order of calling petitions.

The alteration was supported by Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, Mr. HILL, and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and opposed by Mr. MCCOY, Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, Mr. WOODCOCK, and Mr. MALLARY, when the question was taken and the alteration adopted.

Another alteration was proposed to the 16th rule in relation to the presentation of petitions, forbidding the same, after thirty days from the commencement of the session, except on the first day of the meeting of the House in each week.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, moved to erase the word "thirty" and in lieu thereof to insert the word "fifty."

MESSRS. RHEA, and WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, were disposed to non-concur altogether with the proposed amendment. They considered it as an improper curtailment of the right of petitioning. After some further remarks by Messrs. NELSON, of Virginia, MERCER, and FULLER, the question was taken on Mr. CAMPBELL's motion, and lost. On the question of adopting the amendment as reported, it was decided affirmatively.

The following proposition was reported to be added to the 17th rule, viz: "No more than an hour each day, shall be devoted to the subject of reports from committees, and resolutions; after which, the Speaker shall dispose of the bills, messages, and communications, on his table, and then proceed to call the orders of the day."

The proposition was opposed by Mr. BUTLER, who thought the only beneficial curtailment would be, by devising some method of limiting the long speeches that had consumed so much time during this session.

Mr. STERLING, of New York, proposed to amend the amendment, by inserting, after the word "resolutions," the words, "unless in the opinion of the Speaker further time shall be required."

The amendment of Mr. S. was opposed by Mr. MALLARY, and negatived.

Mr. EDWARDS, of Connecticut, then offered the following amendment to the amendment, to be inserted after the word "resolutions," viz: "unless in the opinion of the House further time shall be necessary, which question shall not be subject to debate." This proposition was also negatived, as were others respectively submitted by Messrs. BATEMAN, COOK, and EDWARDS, of North Carolina. The question then recurring upon the adoption of the amendment as recommended by the committee, the same was supported by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, TOMLINSON, COOK, and RICH, and opposed by Messrs. RHEA, PLUMER, of New Hampshire, and WALKER; when the question was taken and the amendment was adopted.

After passing various other amendments proposed to the present rules—

The first amendment proposed to the 52d rule being under consideration—

Mr. CANNON moved to amend the same, by adding ~~there~~ words to constitute the Committee on the Militia a standing committee. The motion was supported by the mover and opposed by Messrs. TAYLOR, SMITH, of Maryland, and MCCOY, and negatived.

The clause as reported to be added to the 52d rule being under consideration—

Mr. EUSTIS proposed to strike out the following part thereof, next after the word "report," viz: "from time to time, such measures as may contribute to the economy and accountability of the said establishment," and to insert, in lieu thereof, the words "their opinion thereupon." The motion to strike out was supported by the mover, and Messrs. MERCER, FULLER, and MCCOY, and opposed by Messrs. TAYLOR, SMITH of Maryland, TOMLINSON, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, and NELSON of Virginia; when the question was taken and the motion negatived.

Mr. TOMLINSON moved so to amend the proposition as to provide that the said committee report their opinion upon the measures submitted to them, and also to report from time to time such measures as may contribute to economy and accountability in the said establishment.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. T. and carried, and the question next recurring upon the amendment as amended, the same was adopted.

Mr. TAYLOR proposed a similar modification to the last of Mr. TOMLINSON, in respect to that part of the amendment which relates to the Committee on Naval Affairs; the same was agreed to, and the amendment as amended was then adopted.

The remaining branch of the amendment, in relation to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, after some verbal emendations, was concurred in.

A new rule, to be inserted after the 56th rule, providing that the Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the commencement of every session of Congress, shall cause to be printed and delivered to each member a list of reports, &c., which it is the duty of any officer or Department of Government to make to Congress, was also concurred in.

A new rule, as reported for the 82d rule, after sustaining a modification, on motion of Mr. RICH, was also adopted.

The last proposition reported by the committee was in the following words: "Nor shall any rule be suspended except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present."

The concurrence with this amendment was opposed by Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, and Mr. MERCER, and supported by Mr. NELSON of Virginia; when the question was taken thereon, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MERCER moved to insert, as an addition to the 22d rule, the following: "Nor shall any member remain in the hall covered, during the session of the House, without the permission of the Speaker."

The question was discussed by Messrs. MERCER and HARDIN in favor of the motion, and by Messrs. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, LITTLE, WALKER, and TRIMBLE, in opposition to it; when Mr. TAYLOR submitted it as a question of order, that this proposition was not susceptible of debate or determination, without being laid one day on the table.

Mr. MERCER considered it to be in order as an amendment to rules that were now under discussion.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion was in order; and, after a few further remarks by Mr. MERCER in favor of the motion, and by Mr. SAWYER against it, the question was taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 63, noes 77.

Mr. MERCER then submitted an amendment of the 18th rule, so as to prefix thereto the following words: "No member shall read a newspaper, write or read a private letter, in his seat, during the session of the House."

This motion was opposed by Messrs. WRIGHT and RHEA, and negatived without a division.

Mr. WRIGHT moved, as a new rule, the following: "That no person shall be permitted to smoke a cigar in the hall nor in the outer lobby of the hall." This motion was also negatived without a division.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the 82d rule, for the purpose of introducing a proposition, that a motion to adjourn should not be in order before the hour of 4 o'clock, if any question should then be before the House.

The House agreed to reconsider, and adopted the amendment as proposed.

Mr. COCKE moved to amend the 21st rule, so as to provide that no member should be allowed to speak more than an hour at one time, without special leave of the House.

Mr. ROSS moved to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "speak" the words "or read a speech," so as to read—no member shall be allowed to speak or read a speech, more than an hour at one time, without special leave of the House.

Mr. F. JONES, of Tennessee, opposed both the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken upon the latter, it was decided in the negative; when, the question recurring upon the original proposition, the same was also negatived.

Mr. MERCER submitted an amendment to the 2d rule, the purport of which was, that, after a subject had been under discussion for three hours on each day of three successive days, in the House or in Committee of the Whole, a motion to adjourn, or rise and report, (unless the question shall have been decided,) should not be in order before 7 o'clock, P. M.

The question was supported by the mover, and opposed by Mr. RHEA, who concluded his remarks by moving to amend the amendment by striking out the words "7 o'clock, P. M." and by inserting in lieu thereof the words "the question is taken."

The motion was negatived, and the question recurring upon the original amendment—

Mr. MERCER called for the yeas and nays, which were accordingly ordered. Some further remarks were made by Messrs. BUCHANAN and LOWNDES in favor of the amendment, and by Messrs. WRIGHT, ARCHER, F. JOHNSON, MONTGOMERY, HARDIN, SMYTH, RHEA, and FARRELLY, in opposition to it, when Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved that the whole subject be laid on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR contended that it was not practicable to lay on the table the original report of the select committee, which had been fully acted upon.

The CHAIR decided that the motion was in order.

Mr. WRIGHT appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, supported, and Mr. TAYLOR opposed the decision, when Mr. WRIGHT withdrew the appeal.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, having understood from the SPEAKER that the motion to lay on the table would apply only to the last proposition, withdrew the same.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, proposed to renew the motion, when the SPEAKER decided that the whole subject, as last proposed by Mr. MERCER, was not in order before the House.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, then moved that the proviso to the 16th, and the amendment to the 17th rules, should not take effect until the next session of Congress; but, before any decision thereon, at 5 o'clock, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 14.

On motion of Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of vesting in Alvira Debel, formerly Alvira Mitchell, and Sophia Hancock, formerly Sophia Mitchell, daughter of Samuel Mitchell, by Molly, a Choctaw woman, the title to five thousand one hundred and twenty acres of land, reserved to them by the Treaty of Mount Dexter, concluded between the United States of America and the Choctaw nation of Indians, on the 16th day of November, 1805.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing beacons or buoys on the bar of the port of Georgetown, South Carolina, and ascertain the compensation for keeping the same in repair.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be instructed to communicate to this House any information he may possess relative to the failures and delays of the United States mail between Washington city and Wheeling, the causes which have produced them, and the means of preventing them in future.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a list of officers of the Army of the United States who hold brevet commissions for gallant conduct in battle, and for other causes, communicated in pursuance of a resolution of this House; which letter and list were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill from the Senate, for granting to the Governor of Louisiana two tracts of land in the county of Point Coupee, in the State of Louisiana, reported the same with an amendment to strike out the first section of the bill, (which grants the site of the old fort for the use of a college,) and, on motion of Mr. R., the report was ordered to lie on the table.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. GILMER, calling for information from the Department of State, relative to the titles of certain lands in the Mississippi Territory, which remain in that Department, was taken up and agreed to.

Mr. WALWORTH called for the consideration of a joint resolution, submitted by him some days since, proposing an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, so as to restore to the respective States the power of enacting bankrupt laws, until such time as the Congress shall establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

The question of consideration was carried—ayes 64, noes 41.

The resolution was then read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WHITMAN gave notice that he should, on Monday next, move that the House go into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon the resolution from the Senate, proposing an amendment to the Constitution in relation to the choice of President and Vice President of the United States, and Representatives to Congress.

The unfinished business of yesterday, in relation to the rules and orders of the House, was then taken up, and the question recurred upon the motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, yesterday, proposing to postpone the operation of the rule in respect to the receipt of petitions, and also the rule for restricting the time of hearing reports, &c., until the next session of Congress—and, after some further debate, the proposition on both points was negatived.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, it was ordered that the rules and regulations of the House, as amended, be printed.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on sundry private bills.

A bill for the relief of Benjamin Freeland and John M. Jenkins, being under consideration—

Mr. RANKIN moved to strike out the first and only enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR suggested it to the member from Mississippi, (Mr. RANKIN,) as a matter of form, that it would be more parliamentary to move to strike out those words in the bill which imply legislation, than the first and only enacting clause.

Mr. R. modified his motion accordingly.

The motion to strike out was supported by the mover, and by Messrs. STERLING, of New York, MCCOY, and CANNON, and opposed by Messrs. COOK and BUTLER, when the question was taken thereon, and the motion to strike out prevailed.

A bill for the relief of James McFarland was then taken up.

After a few explanatory remarks, Mr. RANKIN moved to strike out the first enacting clause of this bill also; and supported the motion by a number of observations.

The motion was opposed by Mr. COOK and Mr. STERLING, of New York, to whom Mr. RANKIN replied; and, the question being taken, was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. RANKIN then moved that the Committee rise and report their decisions on these bills, which was put and lost, when a bill for the relief of Jonathan N. Baily was taken up, and a few explanatory remarks were made by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in favor of the bill, and, after a few suggestions by Messrs. LOWNDES, MCCOY, WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and WALWORTH, the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

In the House, Mr. COOK moved that the report of the Committee of the Whole to strike out the enacting words of the bill for the relief of Benjamin Freeland and John M. Jenkins be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

On the question of concurrence with the Committee of the Whole, in striking out the first clause of the bill for the relief of James McFarland,

Mr. COOK opposed the concurrence, and Mr. RANKIN and Mr. COCKE advocated it.

The House refused to concur with the Committee of the Whole—yeas 49, noes 53.

Mr. RANKIN then moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, which was agreed to. The report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Jonathan N. Baily was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EXCHANGE OF STOCKS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on "a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange certain stocks."

The general object of the bill was to pay off the United States' stocks, bearing six and seven per cent. interest at five per cent. redeemable at a future period.

H. OF R.

Mr. BALDWIN moved to amend the bill by inserting after the word "thirteen" in the 7th line, the words, "and also two millions of the six per cent. stocks of 1820."

Mr. LOWNDES suggested that it was probable, from the tenor of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the two millions contemplated by the amendment would be redeemed within no long time, and it would therefore be inexpedient to continue for many years to pay interest for the sum when it was in our power to redeem the principal; and that the effect of the amendment would naturally be to injure the public credit by carrying with it the impression that the Government was not able to redeem that portion of the debt as soon as expected.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, proposed to modify the amendment in such a manner as to leave it discretionary with the Executive to include the six per cent. of 1820, or not, as he may deem expedient.

This course was advocated by Mr. CAMBRELENG, but the modification was not then acceded to by the mover, and an extensive range of debate ensued upon the original amendment, which was supported by the mover and Messrs. TRIMBLE, MALLARY, BUCHANAN, ROSS, and FARRELLY, and opposed by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, COLDEN, LOWNDES, WOOD, GORHAM, and NELSON, of Virginia.

Mr. BALDWIN finally expressed his willingness to leave it to the Executive to include the stock of 1820 or not, conformably to Mr. TUCKER's proposition; but before the question was determined, the Committee rose, reported progress, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 15.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act concerning the commerce and navigation of Florida," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to the Committee of the whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, from the Committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to our commercial intercourse with foreign nations, and the various petitions on the subject of commercial restrictions, (so called,) made a report, which, on motion of Mr. N., was committed, and, on motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, two thousand extra copies were ordered to be printed.

This report concludes with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the act concerning navigation, passed the 18th of April, 1818, and the act supplementary to the act concerning navigation, passed the 15th of May, 1820; and, also, the act laying a tonnage duty on French vessels, passed the 15th of May, 1820, made necessary to countervail the restrictive systems of Great Britain and France, and for the protection of the navigation and commerce of the United States from injuries, are still, and, as long as those adversary systems shall continue, must be necessary to protect from injuries the same great interests, and ought not to be repealed.

Resolved, That the Government of the United States, having uniformly declared and avowed its attachment to the principles of free commerce, and having, in the treaties which it has formed and agreed to, with foreign nations, and in its relative acts, adhered to them, should be the last to abandon them, and especially at a time when every just and enlightened nation is conforming its commercial policy to an accordance with those principles.

Mr. SLOAN, from the Committee of Elections, made a report on the certificates of the election of the members of the House; which was laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to make perpetual an act passed the 3d day of March, 1817, entitled "An act to continue in force an act, entitled 'An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed the 3d day of March, 1815, and for other purposes,'" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred on the 15th of December last, reported a bill providing for the examination of the titles to land in that part of the State of Louisiana, situated between the Rio Hondo and the Sabine river; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Cornelius Huson, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Cornelius Huson; which bill was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of James Green; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The House then took into consideration the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. STEWART, relative to the irregularity of the Western mail, and adopted the same.

On motion of Mr. SLOAN,

Resolved, That Philip Reed, who contests the election of Jeremiah Causden, returned a member of this House, be permitted to appear within the bar, and be heard in support of his petition during the discussion of the report of the Committee of Elections on said petition.

Mr. MERCER submitted the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of the House:

After any bill or resolution shall have been debated for more than three hours in each of three successive days, either in Committee of the Whole, or in the House, unless such bill or resolution shall have been finally disposed of, no motion for the committee to rise, or the House to adjourn, shall be in order before — o'clock.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table one day.

On motion of Mr. WALWORTH, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to deliver to Martin S. Aiken, Azariah C. Flagg, Ira A. Wood, and others, certain rifles promised them by Major General Maccomb, for their gallantry and patriotic services during the siege of Plattsburg, in September, 1814.

The House proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act granting to the Governor of the State of Louisiana for the time being, and his successors in office, two tracts of land in the county of Point Coupee:" whereupon, it was ordered, that the said bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill authorizing the State of Illinois to open a canal through the public lands in said State.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to the resolution of this House of the 25th of January last, directing him to report the number of land offices in the different States and Territories, designating the number and location in each State and Territory, the annual expense of supporting the same, the amount of money received at each during the years 1820 and 1821, and the distance of the respective offices from each other; and whether, in his opinion, the public good requires the increase or diminution of said offices, or any alteration in the location of the same; and if any increase is required, in what State or Territory the same ought to be located; which report was read and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jonathan N. Bailey," was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act for the relief of James H. Clarke;" "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States;'" "An act supplemental to an act, entitled 'An act authorizing the disposal of certain lots of public ground in the city of New Orleans and town of Mobile;'" "An act to define admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;" and "An act to amend the laws now in force as to the issuing of original writs and final process in the circuit courts of the United States within the State of Tennessee;" in which bills they request the concurrence of this House.

ALTERATION OF THE HALL.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, who were instructed by resolution, "to inquire whether such an alteration can be effected in the Hall now occupied by the House of Representatives, as will fit it for the purpose of a deliberative assembly; and if this be deemed impracticable, whether a suitable apartment can be provided in the centre building of the Capitol for the accommodation of the House of Representatives," made the following report thereon, in part:

"The committee, having examined the Hall when empty, and observed, with as much accuracy as was practicable, the expansion and reverberation of sound within it, entertain the opinion, that the altitude and peculiar structure of the dome, are the principal causes which render sounds within the House indistinct and inaudible. It would seem desirable that this opinion should be tested by actual experiment, so as to ascertain its foundation in fact. An experiment which, it is believed, may be made with very little expense, has been proposed by the Architect, which the committee submit for the consideration of the House. The experiment is to be made by throwing canvass or other cloth across the base of the dome, at the springing of the arch, so as to exclude the dome. From a computation by the Architect, it is believed the expense of this experiment will not exceed one hundred and fifty dollars. The trial may be made so as to be tested by the House without much loss of time, as the materials for making the experiment are at hand, and the Architect will be ready to execute the work promptly. Should the House concur in the views of the committee, they would recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Architect of the Public Buildings cause to be made the experiment recommended in the accompanying report."

The report being read, the question was taken on agreeing to the resolution therein recommended, and passed in the affirmative.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Elections, on the memorial of Philip Reed, contesting the election of Jeremiah Causden, returned as one of the representatives of the present Congress from the State of Maryland.

[This report, after an examination of the statements of the two parties, and the evidence by which they were sustained, comes to the following conclusion:

"From a full, attentive, and deliberate examination of the case, in all its points and bearings, the committee are impelled to the conclusion that the sitting member cannot, consistent with the Constitution of the United States, be allowed to retain a seat in this House, under the proceedings of the Governor and Council of Maryland. That the testimony in relation to the two votes rejected in district No. 1, of Kent county, proves that these tickets were not fraudulent, and that they ought to have been counted at the poll of the memorialist, for whom they were given; and that the vote allowed to him in district No. 2, in Cecil county, ought to be deducted from his poll as being clearly an illegal vote. Therefore, by adding to the poll of Philip Reed, the memorialist, two votes improperly rejected in Kent county, and deducting one therefrom, for that improperly allowed in Cecil county, he will have a majority of one vote over the sitting member."

The following resolutions were submitted:

Resolved, That Jeremiah Causden is not entitled to a seat in this House."

Resolved, That Philip Reed is entitled to a seat in this House."

But the most important part of the reasoning on which this report is founded, is the following:

"The committee, being of opinion that the power thus virtually exercised by the Governor and Council of Maryland, in appointing a Representative to the Congress of the United States, (by casting lots where each of the candidates had an equal number of votes,) is contrary to the express provisions of the Constitution, and one which this House cannot sanction, have no hesitation in rejecting the official statement of the proceedings in the case as evidence of the right of the sitting member to a seat in this House."]

The report having been read, Mr. CAUSDEN rose, in opposition to the report of the Committee, and in support of his own title to his seat, and delivered an argumentative speech of considerable length; after he concluded,

Mr. REED addressed the House until about a quarter of an hour before four o'clock, when

Mr. SLOAN moved that the Committee rise and report progress, which was agreed to; and then the House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, March 18.

Mr. BATEMAN, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, who were instructed by resolution, on the 11th ultimo, to inquire into the practicability of facilitating the means of discovering thefts, destruction of, or opening or mutilating letters, committed by deputy postmasters, their agents; and mail contractors; and, also, into the propriety of enacting severer and other penalties against those who may be convicted of such offences, made a report, in part, thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STERLING, of New York, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill making provision for the survey and disposal of the public lands, in the Territory of Florida; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WALWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made a report on the petition of Stephen Howard, Jr., accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MERCER called for the consideration of a resolution laid by him on the table on Friday last, proposing to alter the standing rules of the House, with a view to limiting the length of debates in the House. On the question being taken thereon, the House refused to consider the same—ayes 47, noes 55.

Mr. CANNON called for the consideration of a resolution submitted by him some days since, fixing a time for the adjournment of Congress, but the House refused to consider the same—ayes 49, noes 73.

Mr. TUCKER moved for a reconsideration of the vote just taken, but the House refused to reconsider the same, without a division.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of James H. Clark; an act to amend the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States;" an act to define admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; an act to amend the laws now in force, as to the issuing of original writs and final process in the circuit courts of the United States within the State of Tennessee; and an act supplemental to an act, entitled "An act authorizing the disposal of certain lots of public ground in the city of New Orleans and town of Mobile;" were severally read twice and referred; the first, to the Committee on Naval Affairs, the second, third, and fourth, to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the fifth, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. COCKE moved that the House do come to the following resolutions, viz:

1. Resolved, That the act of the 2d of March, 1821, to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, was not intended to authorize the President of the United States to dismiss officers then in service, and introduce others of the same grade into the Army.

2. Resolved, That the dismissal of Brevet Brigadier General Daniel Bissell, Colonel of the 1st regiment of infantry, and of Joseph L. Smith, Colonel of the 3d regiment of infantry, as supernumerary, and the creation of three new Colonels, to wit: Townson, Fenwick, and Butler, on the 1st day of June, 1821, was not authorized by the terms or by the spirit of the act of the 2d of March, 1821.

3. Resolved, That the appointment of Colonel James Gadsden to the office of Adjutant General of the United States Army, and the dismissal of Colonels Butler and Jones from that office, was not justified by the act of the 2d of March, 1821.

4. Resolved, That the transfer of Lieutenant Colonel Lindsay from the seventh regiment of infantry to the third regiment of artillery, after the 1st of June, 1821, was contrary to the regulations for the government of the Army of the United States, and not authorized by the terms or spirit of the act of the 2d of March, 1821.

5. Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress, upon national principles and considerations, to protect each officer and soldier of the Army in the enjoyment of his legal and Constitutional rights.

Mr. COCKE thought that the subject embraced by the resolutions was one which involved the interest of the country, and he therefore moved that they be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. WRIGHT said the House had business enough before it to occupy its time without interfering with the appropriate business of the other branch of the Legislature, which he thought the resolution was calculated to do. He wished each planet in our system to keep within its proper sphere and move in its assigned orbit, and he did not feel willing to become an organ of censure to another body.

The SPEAKER remarked that the motion to lay on the table was not debateable, and was about to put the question, when

Mr. COCKE expressed an opinion that he had a right to lay a resolution on the table, and that such was the course he had originally proposed.

Mr. WALWORTH observed that the subject embraced by the resolution was now before the Military Committee, and he believed a member of it was at that moment employed in drawing a report upon it.

The SPEAKER observed that he thought it was proper on this occasion to put the question of consideration, and he was about to put the question, whether the House would now consider the resolutions; when

H. OF R.

MARCH, 1822.

Mr. COCKE inquired by what rule he was deprived of the right to lay a resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER referred to the rule of the House, that, "when any motion or proposition is made, the question, 'Will the House now consider it?' shall not be put, unless it is demanded by some member, or is deemed necessary by the Speaker"—and the question of consideration was then put, and carried—ayes 62, noes 55.

Mr. COCKE then renewed his original motion that the resolution be laid on the table and printed; which was carried without a division.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the unfinished business of Friday last—the contested election of Mr. REED, and Mr. CAUSDEN.

Mr. REED resumed his remarks in support of his memorial and his claim to a seat in the House, and occupied the floor about an hour; when

Mr. CAUSDEN made a reply at considerable length.

Mr. SLOAN, (chairman of the Committee of Elections, who reported the bill,) explained the views of the committee in arriving at the conclusion they had expressed to the House.

The question was further debated by Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, Mr. WRIGHT, and Mr. WALWORTH, in support of the resolutions presented by the committee, and virtually in favor of the claim of General Reed, and by Mr. MOORE, of Virginia, in opposition to them; when, at 4 o'clock, the question was taken upon the 1st resolution "that Jeremiah Causden is not entitled to a seat in the House," and decided in affirmance of the same—ayes 92.

Mr. F. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, inquired, whether this decision would involve a determination of the 2d resolution, or whether it would not again send the election back to the people? Before a distinct reply was made to the question—

Mr. TAYLOR moved to amend the 2d resolution as reported by the committee, (in relation to the right of General Reed to a seat) by inserting the word "not" between the word "is" and the word "entitled," thereby negating the title of either to a seat.

The question was taken thereon, and carried—ayes 72, noes 63.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the Committee then rose, and reported the resolution as amended.

In the House, the question was upon a concurrence with the report of the Committee of the Whole; when

Mr. WRIGHT, in a speech of some length, contended that it was not competent for the House to send the election back to the people, without a simultaneous declaration, that they found the votes to be equal in favor of the respective candidates. Further remarks were made on the subject by Messrs. ARCHER, NEALE, MALLARY, F. JOHNSON, WALKER, BUCHANAN, F. JONES, and CANNON;

when the question was taken upon concurrence with the Committee of the Whole in their amendment of the second resolution, denying the right of General Reed to the seat he claims; and the votes were, yeas 73, noes 71, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Ball, Barber of Ohio, Bassett, Bateman, Baylies, Bigelow, Borland, Brown, Burrows, Butler, Campbell of New York, Cannon, Cocke, Colden, Conkling, Conner, Cuthbert, Darlington, Denison, Dickinson, Durfee, Dwight, Edwards of Connecticut, Farrelly, Findlay, Fuller, Garnett, Gebhard, Gist, Harvey, Jackson, F. Johnson, J. T. Johnson, J. S. Johnston, Kent, Kirkland, Lathrop, Leftwich, Little, Lowndes, McCarty, McCoy, Mallary, Matlack, Matson, Mercer, Mitchell of South Carolina, Moore of Virginia, Phillips, Plumer of New Hampshire, Rankin, Rhea, Rochester, Ruggles, Russ, Sawyer, Arthur Smith, Spencer, Sterling of New York, Stevenson, Taylor, Tod, Tomlinson, Tracy, Tucker of South Carolina, Tucker of Virginia, Upham, Whipple, Williams of Virginia, Wilson, Woodecock, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Archer, Barber of Connecticut, Bayly, Blackledge, Blair, Buchanan, Burton, Campbell of Ohio, Cassedy, Chambers, Condict, Crafts, Cushman, Dane, Eddy, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Edwards of North Carolina, Eustis, Gross, Hardin, Herrick, Hill, Hobart, Hooks, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Keyes, Lincoln, Litchfield, Long, McSherry, Mattocks, Milnor, Mitchell of Pennsylvania, Moore of Pennsylvania, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Patterson of Pennsylvania, Pierson, Pitcher, Plumer of Pennsylvania, Reed of Massachusetts, Reid of Georgia, Rich, Rogers, Ross, Russell, Sloan, S. Smith, W. Smith, J. S. Smith, Sterling of Connecticut, Stewart, Stoddard, Swan, Swearingen, Thompson, Vance, Van Wyck, Walker, Walworth, White, Whitman, Williams of North Carolina, Williamson, Wood, Woodson, and Worman.

Mr. TAYLOR observed, that the vote being so nearly equal, and so many members absent, he thought it but justice that the ultimate question should be taken in a more full House—and, on his motion, at half past 5 o'clock, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 19.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorial of the North River Steamboat Company, and the Fulton Steamboat Company, reported a bill granting certain privileges to steamships and vessels, owned by incorporated companies; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, made an unfavorable report on the memorial of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer, representatives of Colonel Robert Hanson Harrison, deceased, secretary and aid-de-camp to General Washington, in the Revolutionary war; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill providing for recording and examining titles and claims to land in the Territory of Florida ; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill requiring Surveyors General to give bond and security for the faithful application of public moneys.

Mr. RANKIN, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts, for adjusting the claims to lands and establishing land offices in the districts east of the island of New Orleans," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, submitted to the House a copy of an act of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland, entitled "An act relative to the road made by the United States, from Cumberland on the Potomac river, to or near Wheeling, on the Ohio river;" which was referred to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road.

On motion of Mr. HALL, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the propriety of repealing the act of 1813, to encourage vaccination, and if, on inquiry, it shall seem proper, that they report a bill to that effect.

Mr. STERLING, of New York, submitted the following resolution, viz :

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House the items of the incidental expenses incurred in the Land Offices of St. Louis, Franklin, Huntsville, and Cahaba, for the year 1820, and the three first quarters of the year 1821.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table one day.

A Message received yesterday from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, was read, and is as follows :

To the House of Representatives of the United States.

I lay before the House of Representatives the copy of a supplementary report made by William Lambert, in relation to the longitude of the Capitol from Greenwich, in pursuance of a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress of the 3d of March, 1821, and I subjoin an extract from the letter of Mr. Lambert submitting that report.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 12, 1822.

The Message and documents were ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement exhibiting the amount of drawback payable on merchandise exported from the United States during the year ending on the 31st day of December, 1818, 1819, and 1820, compared with the amount of duties which accrued on the same, respectively ; which letter and statement were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, called for the consideration of the joint resolution from the Senate fixing a time for the adjournment of Congress ; but the House refused to consider the same—ayes 47, noes 67.

Mr. MERCER called for the consideration of a resolution laid on the table by him, on Friday last, proposing an alteration of the standing rules of the House intended to limit the extent of debate ; but the House refused to consider the same by a large majority.

SOUTH AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the Message from the President of the United States, concerning the recognition of the independence of the late Spanish provinces in America, made report thereon ; which was read and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union ; and five thousand copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the members of this House, in addition to the usual number.—The report is as follows :

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which were referred the Message of the President, concerning the recognition of the late Spanish provinces in America, and the documents therewith communicated, having examined the same with the most profound attention, unanimously report :

That the provinces of Buenos Ayres, after having, from the year 1810, proceeded in their revolutionary movements without any obstacle from the Government of Spain, formally declared their independence of that Government, in 1816. After various intestine commotions, and external collisions, those provinces now enjoy domestic tranquillity, and good understanding with all their neighbors ; and actually exercise, without opposition from within, or the fear of annoyance from without, all the attributes of sovereignty.

The provinces of Venezuela and New Granada, after having, separately, declared their independence, sustained, for a period of more than ten years, a desolating war against the armies of Spain, and having severally, attained, by their triumph over those armies, the object for which they contended, united themselves, on the 19th of December, 1819, in one nation, under the title of "the Republic of Colombia."

The Republic of Colombia has now a well organized Government, instituted by the free will of its citizens, and exercises all the functions of sovereignty, fearless alike of internal and foreign enemies. The small remnant of the numerous armies commissioned to preserve the supremacy of the parent State, is now blockaded, in two fortresses, where it is innocuous, and where, deprived as it is, of hope of succor, it must soon surrender at discretion ; when this event shall have occurred, there will not remain a vestige of foreign power in all that immense Republic, containing between three and four millions of inhabitants.

The province of Chili, since it declared its independence, in the year 1818, has been in the constant and unmolested enjoyment of the sovereignty which it then assumed.

The province of Peru, situated like Chili, beyond the Andes, and bordering on the Pacific ocean, was, for a long time deterred from making any effectual effort for independence, by the presence of an imposing military force, which Spain had kept up in that country. It was not, therefore, until the 12th of June of the last year, that its capital, the city of Lima, capitulated to an army, chiefly composed of troops from Buenos Ayres and Chili, under the command of General San Martin. The greatest part of the royal troops which escaped on that occasion, retreated to the mountains, but soon left them to return to the coast, there to join the royal garrison in the fortress of Callao. The surrender of that fortress, soon after, to the Americans, may be regarded as the termination of the war in that quarter.

When the people of Peru found themselves, by this event, free to express their will, they most unequivocally expressed in favor of independence, and with an unanimity and enthusiasm which have no where been excelled.

The revolution in Mexico has been somewhat different in its character and progress, from the revolutions in the other Spanish American provinces, and its result, in respect to the organization of its internal government, has, also, not been precisely the same. Independence, however, has been as emphatically declared and as practically established, since the 24th of August last, by the "Mexican Empire," as ever it has been by the Republics of the South; and her geographical situation, her population and her resources, eminently qualify her to maintain the independence which she has thus declared, and now actually enjoys.

Such are the facts which have occupied the attention of your committee, and which, in their opinion, irresistibly prove, that the nations of Mexico, Colombia, Buenos Ayres, Peru, and Chili, in Spanish America, are in fact independent.

It now remains for your committee to examine the right and the expediency, on the part of the United States, of recognising the independence which those nations have thus effectually achieved.

In this examination, it cannot be necessary to inquire into the right of the people of Spanish America "to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume, among the Powers of the earth, that separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them." The right to change the political institutions of the State has, indeed, been exercised equally by Spain and by her colonies; and for us to deny to the people of Spanish America the right to independence, on the principles which alone sanction it here, would be virtually to renounce our own.

The political right of this nation to acknowledge their independence, without offending others, does not depend on its justice, but on its actual establishment. To justify such a recognition, by us, it is necessary only to show, as is already sufficiently shown, that the people of Spanish America are, within their respective limits, exclusively sovereign; and thus, in fact, independent. With them, as with every other Government possessing and exercising the power of making war, the United States, in common with all nations, have the right of concerting the terms of mutual peace and intercourse.

Who is the rightful sovereign of a country, is not an inquiry permitted to foreign nations, to whom it is competent only to treat with "the powers that be."

There is no difference in opinion, on this point, among the writers on public law; and no diversity, with respect to it, in the practice of civilized nations. It is not necessary, here, to cite authority for a doctrine familiar to all who paid the slightest attention to the subject; nor to go back, for its practical illustration, to the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster. Long since, the chiefs of those conflicting houses alternately triumphed and ruled, and were alternately obeyed at home and recognised abroad, according as they, successively, exercised the power, without demonstrating the right—monarchies have become commonwealths or republics, and powerful usurpers have been recognised by foreign nations, in preference to legitimate and powerless pretenders. Modern history is replete with instances in point. Have we not, indeed, within the brief period of our own remembrance, beheld governments vary their forms, and change their rulers, according to the prevailing power or passion of the moment, and doing so in virtue of the principle now in question, without materially and lastingly affecting their relations with other governments? Have we not seen the emperors and kings of yesterday receive, on the thrones of exiled sovereigns, who claimed the right to reign there, the friendly embassies of other Powers, with whom those exiled sovereigns had sought an asylum—and have we not seen to-day those emperors and kings, thus courted and recognised yesterday, rest of their sceptres, and, from a mere change of circumstances, not of right, treated as usurpers by their successors, who, in their turn, have been acknowledged and caressed by the same foreign Powers?

The peace of the world, and the independence of every member of the great political family, require that each should be the exclusive judge of its own internal proceedings, and that the fact alone should be regarded by foreign nations. "Even when civil war breaks the bonds of society and of government, or, at least, suspends their force and effect, it gives birth in the nation to two independent parties, who regard each other as enemies, and acknowledge no common judge." It is of necessity, therefore, that these two parties should be considered, by foreign States, as two distinct and independent nations. To consider or treat them otherwise, would be to interfere in their domestic concerns, to deny them the right to manage their own affairs in their own way, and to violate the essential attributes of their respective sovereignty. For a nation to be entitled, in respect to foreign States, to the enjoyment of these attributes, "and to figure directly in the great political society, it is sufficient that it is really sovereign and independent: that is, that it governs itself by its own authority and laws." The people of Spanish America do, notoriously, so govern themselves, and the right of the United States to recognise the governments, which they have instituted, is incontestible. A doubt of the expediency of such a recognition can be suggested only by the apprehension that it may injuriously affect our peaceful and friendly relations with the nations of the other hemisphere.

Can such an apprehension be well founded?

Have not all those nations practically sanctioned, within the last thirty years, the very principle on which we now propose to act; or have they ever complained of one another, or of us, for acting on that principle?

No nation of Europe, excepting Spain herself, has, hitherto, opposed force to the independence of Spanish America. Some of those nations have not only constantly maintained commercial and friendly intercourse with them, in every stage of the Revolution, but indirectly and efficiently, though not avowedly, aided them in the prosecution of their great object. To these the acknowledgment, by the United States, of the attainment of that object, must be satisfactory.

To the other nations of Europe, who have regarded the events occurring in Spanish America, not only without interference, but with apparent indifference, such an acknowledgment ought not to be offensive.

The nations who have thus respectively favored, or never opposed, the Spanish American people during their active struggle for independence, cannot, it is believed, regard with dissatisfaction the formal recognition of that independence by a nation, which, while that struggle lasted, has religiously observed, towards both the conflicting parties, all the duties of neutrality. Your committee are therefore of opinion, that we have a right, on this occasion, confidently to expect, from what these nations have done or forborne to do, during the various fortunes of the civil war which has terminated, that they will frankly approve the course of policy which the United States may now think proper to adopt in relation to the successful party in that war. It surely cannot be reasonably apprehended, that nations who have thus been the tranquil spectators, the apparent well-wishers, if not the efficient supporters, of this party, and who have not made the faintest attempt to arrest its progress, or to prevent its success, should be displeased with a third Power, for merely recognising the Governments which, owing to that success, have thus been virtually permitted, or impliedly approved, in acquiring the undisputed and exclusive control of the countries in which they are established. It is therefore on the consistency as well as on the justice of these nations of Europe, that we may confidently rely, that the simple recognition, on the part of the United States, of the necessary effect of what has already been done, will not be considered as a just cause of complaint against them; while the interested and immediate agents, who have been directly and actively engaged in producing that effect, have neither been opposed nor censured.

Your committee, therefore, instead of seriously apprehending that the recognition, by the United States, of the independence of Spanish America, will be unacceptable to these nations, are not without hope that they may practically approve it, by severally adopting a similar measure. It is not, indeed, unreasonable to suppose, that those Governments have, like this, waited only for the evidence of facts which might not only suffice to justify them, under the laws and usages of nations, but to satisfy Spain herself, that nothing has been prematurely done, or which could justly offend her feelings, or be considered as inconsistent with her rights. As their motives for not having hitherto recognised the independence of Spanish America, may thus be supposed to have been analogous to our own, it is permitted to presume that the facts and reasons which have prevailed on us no longer to hesitate, will, confirmed as they are by our example, have a like influence on them.

No nation can entertain a more sincere deference for the feelings of Spain, or take a more lively interest in her welfare, than the United States. It is to this deference, too evident to be doubted or misunderstood, that ought to be ascribed the hesitation of this Government, until now, to yield to the claims of Spanish America, although these claims were in perfect accordance with our own principles, feelings, and interests. Having thus forborne to act, even at the hazard of having those principles and feelings misunderstood on this side of the Atlantic, we have, as your committee believe, given at once satisfactory proof of our disinterestedness and moderation; and of our scrupulous respect to the principle which leaves the political institutions of every foreign State to be directed by its own view of its own rights and interests.

Your committee have been particularly anxious to show, in a manner satisfactory to Spain herself, that the measure which this Government now proposes to adopt, has been considered with the most respectful attention, both in relation to her rights and to her feelings.

It is not on the laws and usages of nations, or on the practice of Spain herself on like occasions, that your committee have relied for our justification towards her.

The fact that, for the last three years, she has not sent a single company of troops against her transatlantic colonies, has not been used as evidence of their actual independence, or of her want of power to oppose it. This fact, explained as it is, by the public acts of Spain herself, is regarded by your committee as evidence only of her policy.

The last troops collected at Cadiz, in 1819, which were destined to suppress the revolutionary movements in Spanish America, not only rejected that service, but joined in the revolution, which has since proved successful in Spain itself. The declaration of the leaders in that revolution was, that "Spanish America had a right to be free, and that Spain should be free." Although the constitution, which was re-established by that revolution, guaranteed the integrity of the Spanish dominions, yet the principles on which that constitution was founded seem to discountenance the employment of force for the accomplishment of that object, in contempt of the equal rights and declared will of the American portion of the Spanish people. The conduct of the Government, organized under that constitution, has uniformly been, in this respect, in conformity to those principles. Since its existence, there has not been even a proposal by that Government to employ force for the subjugation of the American provinces, but merely recommendations of conciliatory measures for their pacification.

The answer of the Cortes, on the 10th of July, 1820, to the address of the King, furnishes conclusive proof of this policy.

"The intimate union," says this answer, "of the Cortes with your Majesty; the re-establishment of the constitution; the faithful performance of promises, depriving malevolence of all pretext, will facilitate the pacification of the ultra marine provinces, which are in a state of agitation and dissension. The Cortes, on its part, will omit no opportunity to propose and adopt measures necessary for the observance of the constitution and restoration of tranquillity in those countries, to the end that the Spain of both worlds may thus form a single and happy family."

Although the ultra marine provinces are not here encouraged to expect absolute independence, yet they are no longer treated as vassal colonies, or threatened with subjugation, but are actually recognised as brothers in the great constitutional and free family of Spain.

A report made to the Cortes on the 24th of June, 1821, by a committee appointed by that body, not only manifestly corroborates the policy above stated, but sufficiently intimates that the recognition of the independence of Spanish America by Spain herself had nearly been the measure recommended by that committee.

That report avers that "tranquillity is not sufficient, even if it should extend throughout America, with a prospect of permanency. No; it falls short of the wishes of the friends of humanity."

In speaking of the measure demanded by the crisis, it says, that this measure was not only warmly approved by the committee, but at first entirely assented to by the Ministers with whom it had been discussed, and failed only to be proposed to the Cortes "by these Ministers having, on account of peculiar occurrences, suspended their judgment." It speaks of this measure as indicative of a new and glorious resolution; that it was demanded by America and the true interests of the Peninsula; that from it Spain might reap advantages which otherwise she could never expect; and that the ties of kindred and the uniformity of religion, with commercial relations, and those emanating from free institutions, would be the surest pledge of mutual harmony and close union.

Your committee do not feel themselves authorized to say positively what that measure was, but they do not hesitate to declare their entire conviction that no measure short of a full recognition of unconditional independence, could have deserved the character nor been capable of producing the effects ascribed to it.

It is therefore sufficiently manifest that Spain, far from wishing to call into action her means of prosecuting hostilities against the people of Spanish America, has renounced even the feelings of an enemy towards them, and but for "peculiar occurrences" had been prepared nearly a year ago to consent to their independence.

She has not only practically discontinued, and even emphatically deprecated, the employment of force to restore tranquillity to Spanish America, but she has declared that even universal and permanent tranquillity there "falls short of the wishes of the friends of humanity."

While she appeals to the ties of kindred," she undoubtedly feels them; and if she has not abandoned her desire, so often avowed, of mere constitutional union and equal commercial intercourse with her former colonies, as between provinces of the same empire, a union and an intercourse which intervening Andes and oceans seem to render highly inconvenient, if not utterly impracticable, she evidently refers the accomplishment of this desire to the unawed deliberations and to the congenial and kindred feelings of the people of those colonies, and thus substantially acknowledges their independence.

Whatever may be the policy of Spain, however, in respect to her former American colonies, our recognition of their independence can neither affect her rights nor impair her means in the accomplishment of that policy. We cannot for this be justly accused of aiding in the attainment of an independence which has already been established without our assistance. Besides, our recognition must necessarily be co-existent with the fact on which it is founded, and cannot survive it. While the nations of Spanish America are actually independent, it is simply to speak the truth to acknowledge them to be so.

Should Spain, contrary to her avowed principles and acknowledged interests, renew the war for the conquest of South America, we shall indeed regret it; but we shall observe, as we have done between the independent parties, an honest and impartial neutrality. But on the other hand should Spain, faithful to her own glory and prosperity, consent that her offspring in the New World should enjoy the right of self-government equally with their brethren in the Old, we shall sincerely rejoice; and we shall cherish with equal satisfaction, and cultivate with equal assiduity, the friendship of regenerated Spain and of emancipated America.

Your committee, in justice to their own feelings and to the feelings of their fellow-citizens, have made this declaration without disguise; and they trust that the uniform character and conduct of this people will save it from all liability to misinterpretation.

Happy in our own institutions, we claim no privilege; we indulge no ambition to extend them to other nations; we admit the equal rights of all nations to form their own Governments and to administer their own internal affairs as they may judge proper; and however they may in these respects differ from us, we do not on that account regard with the less satisfaction their tranquillity and happiness.

Your committee, having thus considered the subject referred to them in all its aspects, are unanimously of opinion that it is just and expedient to acknowledge the independence of the several nations of Spanish America, without any reference to the diversity in the forms of their governments; and, in accordance with this opinion, they respectfully submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives concur in the opinion expressed by the President in his Message of the 8th of March, 1822, that the American provinces of Spain which have declared their independence, and are in the enjoyment of it, ought to be recognised by the United States as independent nations.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill appropriating a sum, not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, to enable the President of the United States to give due effect to such recognition.

[TRANSLATION.]

Extract from the report of the Committee [of the Spanish Cortes] to whom was referred the disturbances in the American provinces, with instructions to prepare measures for their general pacification.

"Still New Spain, or rather the whole of the Spanish provinces in North America, having almost entirely returned to a state of tranquillity, at that period so desolating a war was terminated; while, on the other hand, a considerable part of Peru constantly adhered to Spain, as has also been the case with Cuba and the other islands. Thus, while on the Main, in Buenos Ayres, and in Chili, the afflicting spectacle was beheld of Spanish and American blood being shed by the very hands which had the greatest interest in its preservation—the most important part of Spanish America remained free from so many calamities. But this tranquillity is not sufficient, even if it should extend throughout America with a prospect of permanency. No! it falls short of the wishes of the friends of humanity. It is necessary that America should build her happiness upon a solid foundation, so that, far from counteracting, she may contribute to the prosperity of Europe.

"Your committee, persuaded of this truth, discussed in their several sittings the questions which appeared most proper to attain the grand object we all have in view. These were examined in conjunction with His Majesty's Ministers, who, in the beginning, entirely coincided in the general opinion prevailing in the committee, but were subsequently induced, by peculiar occurrences, to suspend their judgment, believing that public opinion was not yet prepared for a final decision. In this situation your committee are unable to bring forward any formal proposition, inasmuch as it belongs to the Government to determine the matter of fact, that is to say, as to the expediency and urgency of certain measures; and the Cabinet not thinking that moment yet arrived, nothing now remains to your committee but strongly to recommend to Ministers the acceleration of so desirable a moment. This is loudly called for by justice; it is demanded by the uncertain and precarious fate of so many European Spaniards settled in those countries; it is demanded by the natives themselves, and the different classes who have so gallantly supported the cause of the metropolis; in fine, it is demanded by America and the true interests of the Peninsula—the prosperity of the former resting in the restoration of tranquillity, which will prove a source of incalculable benefit to her; and that of the latter in not being obstructed in her progress, by having her councils distracted by cares created by the deplorable situation of those distinct climes. The lights of the age and a wise policy ought to guide the Government in forming so new and so glorious a resolution.

“Your committee, fully sensible of the greatness of the subject, and believing that their decision will, perhaps, affect the interests of the whole world, would wish to impress upon the minds of all Spaniards this, their firm conviction, that they might all contribute to the completion of so great a work. Spain would reap advantages which otherwise she can never expect; and the ties of kindred, and the uniformity of religion, together with commercial relations, and those emanating from free institutions, would be the surest pledge of mutual harmony and close union. Your committee, therefore, not being able alone to come to any determination, content themselves with simply proposing that Ministers be urged to lay before the Cortes, with the least possible delay, the fundamental basis of such measures as they may deem advisable and just, both for the complete pacification of the distracted provinces of America, and to secure to them all solid and lasting happiness.”

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then went into consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, (the contested election of Messrs. Causden and Reed.)

The question was first taken upon concurrence with the Committee of the Whole in their agreement to the first resolution reported by the Committee of Elections, viz: “That Jeremiah Causden is not entitled to a seat in the House,” and the same was affirmed, ayes 91, noes 27.

The question was then about to be put on agreeing to the other resolution reported by the committee, as yesterday amended, so as to declare that Mr. REED is not entitled to a seat.

Mr. WRIGHT moved a reconsideration of the vote taken yesterday, denying the right of General Reed to a seat in the House; and, the question being taken thereon, the reconsideration was refused—ayes 66, noes 68.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to amend the resolution as amended in Committee of the Whole, by inserting, in lieu thereof, after the word “resolved” the following words—“that Jeremiah Causden and Philip Reed having an equal number of votes, therefore, Philip Reed is not entitled to a seat in this House.”

Mr. COLDEN and Mr. EDWARDS of North Carolina opposed the amendment, and, the question being taken thereon, the same was negatived without a division.

The question then recurring upon the second resolution as amended and reported by the Committee of the Whole,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and Mr. WOOD opposed the same, and Messrs. RHEA, F. JOHNSON, and BARBER of Ohio, supported it; when, on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, the yeas and nays were ordered, and the question being so taken, stood—yeas 74, nays 75, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Ball, Barber of Ohio, Bassett, Bateman, Bigelow, Borland, Brown, Butler, Campbell of New York, Cannon Cocke, Colden, Conkling, Conner, Cook, Cuthbert, Darlington, Denison, Dickinson, Dwight, Edwards of Connecticut, Farrelly, Findlay, Fuller, Garnett, Gebhard, Gilmer, Gist, Gorham, Harvey, Hawks, Jackson, F. The SPEAKER, under the rule of the House—“that, in all cases of ballot by the House, the Speaker shall vote; in other cases he shall not vote, unless the House be equally divided, or unless his vote, if given to the minority, will make the division equal; and, in case of such equal division, the question shall be lost”—voted in the affirmative, which made an equality of votes upon the proposition before the House. The effect of this vote was decided by the Chair to be, that the affirmative proposition, viz: Philip Reed is not entitled to a seat in this House, was lost, and was equivalent to a determination in the affirmative of the original proposition of the Committee of Elections in favor of Mr. Reed.

Mr. BALDWIN appealed from the decision of the Chair, and on that question the mover and Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, RHEA, FARRELLY, GORHAM, WALWORTH, LOWNDES, WRIGHT, ARCHER, ROSS, LITTLE, WHITMAN, CAMPBELL of Ohio, STEVENSON, TUCKER of Virginia, MONTGOMERY, and SMYTH, respectively expressed their sentiments, when the question was taken, and the decision of the Chair was reversed.

Mr. SANDERS then presented the following resolution:

On this question the yeas and nays were ordered, and the resolution was carried—yeas 82, nays 77, as follows:

Whereupon Mr. REED appeared, was qualified, and took his seat as one of the Representatives from the State of Maryland; and then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 20.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, called for the consideration of a bill to extend the limits of the port of entry and delivery for the district of Philadelphia; and, the House having agreed to consider the same, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. LATHROP submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to consider and report what business it is necessary for the House of Representatives to act upon during the present session.

On motion of Mr. MALLARY, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. RICH, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for a settlement, upon the best evidence of which the cases will admit, of the accounts of persons charged with public moneys on the books of the Third Auditor of the Treasury, prior to the 1st of July, 1815.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act to provide for paying to the State of Missouri three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands within the same," with amendments; and they have also passed bills of the following titles, to wit:

1. An act for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Alexander Montgomery;
2. An act to authorize the State of Illinois to open a canal through the public lands, to connect the Illinois river with Lake Michigan;
3. An act authorizing the payment of a sum of money to John Gooding and James Williams;
4. An act for the relief of Samuel H. Walley and Henry G. Foster;
5. An act for the relief of Jacob Babbitt;
6. An act for the relief of William Nott, Stephen Henderson, and Nathaniel Cox, syndics of the creditors of George T. Phillips, late of the city of New Orleans, deceased;
7. An act for the relief of Samuel Walker;
8. An act for the relief of Matthew McNair;
9. An act granting to the corporation of the city of Mobile, in the State of Alabama, certain lots of ground in the said city;
10. An act granting a tract of land to William Conner and wife, and to their children;

In which amendments and last mentioned bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said last mentioned bills from the Senate were severally read twice, and referred; the 1st, to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

2d, to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill to authorize the State of Illinois to open a canal through the public lands, to connect the waters of the Illinois river with Lake Michigan.

3d, 4th, and 5th, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

6th, to the Committee on Commerce.

7th and 8th, to the Committee of Claims; and the 9th and 10th, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for paying to the State of Missouri three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands within the same," were read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act granting certain privileges to steamships and vessels owned by incorporated companies," was read the third time, and passed.

LAND OFFICES.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. STERLING, of New York, calling for information relative to the contingent expenses of the land offices at Louisville, Franklin, Huntsville, and Cahaba, was called up.

Mr. MALLARY wished the inquiry to extend to all the land offices in the United States, and moved an amendment to that effect.

Mr. STERLING opposed the amendment on the ground that he believed it to be unnecessary to extend the inquiry beyond the limit he had proposed, and also on the ground that it would perhaps have the effect to protract the investigation of the subject, and preclude any efficient act in relation to it at this session.

Mr. SLOAN was opposed to the resolution altogether. He thought it would be productive of no beneficial result.

Mr. RANKIN was in favor of the resolution, but deemed the amendment unnecessary.

Mr. MALLARY made some further remarks in support of the amendment; upon which, the question being taken, it was negatived.

Mr. RICH then moved to erase the items of incidental expenditures, and to insert, in lieu thereof, that there should be a general statement under each head of expenditure.

Mr. COCKE opposed the amendment, and remarked, that it reached no further than the information which the House already possessed.

After some further remarks by Messrs. RICH and STERLING of New York, the amendment was withdrawn, and the resolution was adopted as originally moved.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The House proceeded to consider, by a vote of 79 to 74, the resolution of the Senate, proposing to close the present session of Congress, on the first Monday of April.

Mr. BASSETT moved to strike out the words "first Monday in April," so as to leave the period of adjournment in blank.

Mr. LATHROP proposed to commit the resolution to a select committee, with instructions to examine and report the business necessary to be done before the close of the session.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, was in favor of the reference suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. LATHROP,) but wished it to be done without giving instructions to the committee.

Mr. HARDIN hoped that somebody would be heard on this subject, besides the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. EDWARDS,) and the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. LATHROP.) It was a matter in which other members of the House had an interest. What, he asked, was the usual course of business? The first two-thirds of the session was occupied in receiving petitions, maturing business—meeting late, and adjourning early; and, if holidays intervene, pass through the forms of meeting and adjourning, without doing any business of importance; and one-third of the remainder of the session was ordinarily consumed in debating the question at what time Congress should adjourn. He wished to go home as much as other gentlemen who have families, and certainly as much as those who have none, but it was the bounden duty of this House, before its members separated, to do the business of the nation which they were sent here to perform. He was opposed at all events to giving powers and instructions to a committee to select the business. It ought to take the course prescribed by the miller, and that which was first presented should be first done. He had three years ago presented a petition, possessed of strong and peculiar merits, which had been favorably reported on by the Committee of Claims, and God knows, said Mr. H., it must have merits if it could pass that Committee, and yet this Committee of Arrangement had annually arranged it out of the House. He was not prepared to tell the people, we have sat here as long as our convenience suited—we have done no business—but we have got our eight dollars a day, and now we wish to go home, and leave the business of the nation undone. Mr. H. concluded his remarks by moving that the resolution be laid on the table; but, on suggestion, he withdrew that motion, to give way to

Mr. BALDWIN, who moved to commit the resolution to a Committee of the Whole House and make it the order of the day for to-morrow, so that it might take its regular place on the docket.

Mr. SANDERS opposed the motion. He wished that some period for adjournment might be fixed on. It would greatly facilitate the business, as gentlemen would then have their eye fixed on that event, and shape their business and their speeches accordingly. He was not particularly anxious for an early adjournment, but he believed it essential that the time should be determined on, and if the present motion were negatived he would then move to fill the blank with the last Monday in April.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was not surprised that the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. SANDERS,) and other gentlemen who had not long experience in this House, should entertain the sentiments they advanced. In the State Legislatures it was not difficult to fix the period of terminating the session. There the business of each was known to all, and it was easy to measure the time it would occupy. But it was not so in the National Legislature. Here was a vast variety of business, collected from the various parts of this widely extended empire, and it was impossible for each member to know in what time the whole of the necessary business could be accomplished. Added to this, there were many new members upon the floor, who could not immediately become acquainted with the ordinary routine, and hence it had happened in the early part of the session that resolutions had been introduced, and long discussions grown out of them, calling for information upon subjects that were perfectly familiar to those who had the advantage of experience. But, although it must be confessed that much time had been spent in unproductive debate, yet it was also true that much business had been matured this session which it was important should be acted upon. As the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. HARDIN) had remarked, it was commonly the case at the close of a session, private petitions are thrown aside, which in effect was equivalent to a denial of justice. Mr. S. was apprehensive that it was impossible for the House to do the necessary business before the 20th of May; nor was it until within a few years that Congress had adjourned before that period. He formerly knew a session that continued until July; and it was a well-known fact that the laws passed at the close of a session were slurred over, and put together so loosely that you might drive a coach and six through them. This resolution, he remarked, came from the Senate. And for what purpose? To tell the people that the House of Representatives had not done its duty. That the Senate was ready to adjourn, but that the House was wasting its time. Mr. S. disclaimed imputing any such intentions to that body; but such, he contended, was the obvious operation of it. And shall we say to our constituents, said Mr. S., that we have spent all our time in maturing the business, and that, as soon as we had done that, we had broken up without accomplishing it? If it is inconvenient to gentlemen to remain—that is a circumstance that they should have reflected on before they accepted of their seats; but, at all events, the business of the nation should not be sacrificed to suit the convenience of their Representatives. And now, said Mr. S., after the business has been three months preparing, this subject is taken up for debate and discussion, day after day, in order to hasten the public business!

H. OF R.

Adjournment of Congress.

MARCH, 1822.

Mr. RHEA supported the motion to commit, in a speech of considerable length; but his remarks could not be distinctly heard by the reporter.

Mr. CANNON believed that no time could be fixed on which would be agreeable to his colleague, (Mr. RHEA;) but he hoped that the time of the House would not be consumed by debating the question. The motion to commit would be equivalent to a vote of rejection, which he hoped the House would not consent to. The session had been spun out by speeches on one or two subjects, yet he did not think the legislation was more correct or perfect by so much speech-making. His observation had convinced him that the perfection of business did not consist in the length of the discussion; for he had remarked that, whenever a great question was made out of a small one, the members would soon withdraw their attention from it. Mr. C. expressed his belief that the House could dispose of all the necessary business before the time mentioned by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. SANDERS.) Three days had been occupied upon a contested election, which might have been determined in two hours; and, if a period was fixed, it would put an end to useless discussion; yet he could hardly call it discussion; it was speech-making. Opinions were not formed or altered by debate. He hoped the mover would withdraw the motion; for, even if it were to succeed now, yet the question must be tried at some part of the session; and, if the object were defeated now, yet it would certainly be brought up again.

Mr. J. SPEED SMITH was in favor of the motion. A proposal was now made to us, he observed, to adjourn; and why? Not because we had done the business, but because some spur was necessary to urge us on to our duty. It was unbecoming, he said, for this body to move with a halter round their necks; and he was unwilling to believe or admit that the House of Representatives could not trust themselves without a cord by which they could be guided. The argument of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HARDIN,) he conceived to be unanswerable, in relation to the business, and he briefly reviewed the various important matters pending before that body. We had gone, he said, through the formality of presenting and referring petitions; they had been laboriously examined by the committees, and the reports had been printed at a very considerable expense; but now we want to go home, and therefore we must leave the business undone, and the same formalities to be gone through with, and the same expense incurred, at the next session. But he would not fall into the error of his friend from Tennessee, (Mr. CANNON,) and, in making a long speech against speech-making, enforce by example what he had repelled by precept. For this reason he would sit down.

Mr. WOODCOCK observed that he regretted to take up the time of the House in the discussion of a subject, the object of which was to save time. But he was not willing that the resolution should have the go-by in the manner proposed by the motion. He hoped the question would be fairly met, and not got rid of in this manner. He should pay great deference and respect to the opinions of those who possessed greater experience in legislation than himself; but he could not but express his regret that the limit of every session had not been assigned by the Constitution. He admitted the right of members to make long speeches; nor did he wish to abridge that right by any other means than the exercise of their own discretion. We had now been here, he said, almost four months, and but little of the business had been finally disposed of. He wished some method to be adopted which should increase the despatch of the remainder, and he could conceive of no method so effectual as to limit the continuance of the session. If, as the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) had suggested, it would be necessary to protract the session to the middle of May, be it so; he was willing to stay as long as the public interest required, but he hoped the proposition would be distinctly met.

Mr. F. JOHNSON remarked, that those who were in favor of the resolution advocated it on the ground that it was impossible to do all the business before the House, and therefore we ought to fix a day on which to adjourn. The same rule, he observed, would prove that we ought never to come here at all; for we could not do all the business before us if we were to continue in session until the third of next March. He was not disposed to manacle ourselves in such a manner that we could not move without the guidance of another body. If this is the course to be pursued, the right of petitioning has become a solemn mockery; and yet those gentlemen who are so anxious to get home, present, perhaps, as many petitions as any other members of the House. It was a hard case for persons to petition here, year after year, with fair claims upon the Government, and to be turned off because the servants of the people cannot stay to do them justice, from their wish to get home to their families. If we can't do the business of the people, let us honestly tell them so, and not hold out expectation, and torture them with disappointment. If there was any gentleman whose situation was such that he could not stay from home any longer, let him ask leave of absence. For one, he would vote for it, and it was possible that the House could even get along without him. We do not profess to come here, he observed, merely to be honorable members of Congress, and to make a great speech on the Bankrupt bill, or some other great question, but to do the business of the nation. Mr. J. referred to an important bill which had been preparing by the Committee of Ways and Means, and on which, judging of the future by the past, if he did not much mistake, the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. CANNON) would spend more time in discussing than he was now willing to allow to Congress for the whole of the residue of the session. When there were only thirteen States, he remarked, the sessions were about as long as at present, when the States, population, and business to be done, were more than two to one, besides the incidental accumulation of claims growing out of the war. The people had a right to expect us to do their business; and, for his part, he was prepared to say that he would do it if it required a continuation of the session until the third of March next.

Mr. CONDUCT moved to lay the motion on the table, which was negatived.

Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, expressed his sentiments in favor of the motion; when

Mr. CONDUCT moved that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to the second Monday of April.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, renewed the motion to lay it on the table, which was again negatived; and the motion to postpone was agreed to.

EXCHANGE OF STOCKS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the unfinished business of Thursday last, on the bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange a stock bearing an interest of five per cent. for certain stocks bearing an interest of six and seven per cent.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. BALDWIN to amend the first section of the bill, by extending the provisions of the bill so as to include also two millions of six per cent. stock created by the loan of 1820.

The question being taken on this motion for amendment, it was negatived without a division.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to amend the bill by striking out the whole of the first section, after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to propose an issue of stock, to an amount not exceeding thirty millions of dollars, bearing an interest of five per centum per annum, in exchange for any of the stock heretofore issued bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, and of the stock heretofore issued bearing an interest of seven per centum per annum; for which purpose, books shall be opened at the Treasury of the United States, and at the several Loan offices, on the 1st day of April, 1822, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, to continue open until the first day of July next thereafter, for such parts of the aforementioned six and seven per cent stock, as shall, on the day of subscription, stand on the books of the Treasury, and on those of the several Loan offices, respectively; and the holders of the aforementioned stocks, who may become subscribers in the manner aforesaid, shall severally specify the terms upon which they propose to effect, the exchange hereby authorized: and the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept such subscriptions of the aforementioned stocks as may be subscribed and offered, upon terms which he may deem advantageous to the United States; which subscriptions, accepted in pursuance of this authority, shall be effected by a transfer to the United States, in the manner provided by law for such transfers of the credit or credits standing on the said books; by a surrender of the certificates of the stock so subscribed; and by the payment into the Treasury of the United States of such premium, if there be any, as may be offered in consideration of the exchange thus effected."

In offering this amendment, Mr. C. said, he hoped the Committee would not pass the bill in its present shape; and he begged leave to explain his reasons for offering an amendment to a bill emanating from the Committee of Ways and Means. It limited the exchange to the stocks of 1812 and 1813. He thought it probable, if the negotiation was effected at all, these stocks only would be embraced; but he disliked specifying any particular stocks in the bill, as it made them at once objects of speculation. He was willing to enlarge the authority to be given the Secretary, that he might be enabled to effect the exchange upon terms most advantageous to the United States. He had, therefore, in the amendment, proposed to open the subscription for all the sixes and sevens. If no others were ultimately accepted but those of 1812 and 1813, it would not injure the negotiation for the holders of these particular stocks to know that the Secretary was authorized to accept others. Besides, it was impossible for the Secretary or this House to anticipate the prices of stocks.

The section, as it stands, provides only for the exchange of five per cent. for six and seven per cent. stock. It supposes a rare coincidence—an equality in the price of five per cent. ten years' stock, and of six and seven per cent. stock redeemable in three or four years. Now, sir, if it be for the interest of the holders of these stocks to make the exchange, they will do so; and, if this be the case, may they not be willing to offer a premium for the preference? At least, this case may happen, and provision ought to be made for such a contingency, unless we were disposed generously to give the stockholders the premium.

The section suspends the subscription till next October. He thought if it was to be passed in that shape, it would be useless to pass it at all. The market rate of interest had been advancing for twelve months, and was now advancing; the bill ought to have been acted on two months earlier, and the negotiation, if authorized at all, ought to be effected as early as practicable. He doubted whether we had not even now let the opportunity escape, and he was very certain it would be impracticable twelve months hence. Gentlemen who proposed to suspend the negotiation until next October, November, or December, should reflect that a general revival of trade was sensibly operating upon and absorbing the idle capital of the country, and they should also reflect that, during the present year, we shall probably receive important intelligence relating to the affairs of Europe, which would affect the prices of the stocks of all Governments. He hoped the amendment would be adopted, and that the exchange, if practicable at all, would be made forthwith.

Mr. F. JOHNSON said, that gentlemen had said that this was the most important bill which had been presented to the House during the session, and he was willing to admit its great importance, while he should ask the indulgence of the Committee to make a few observations.

The bill proposes to put it in the power of persons owning twelve millions of the public debt contracted in 1812, and redeemable or not at the pleasure of the Government in 1825, on a part of which is paid six, and a part seven per cent.; and fourteen millions of the debt contracted in 1813, and redeemable in like manner in 1826, bearing an interest of six per cent., to relinquish that debt and take, in lieu thereof, a debt on the Government to be created, bearing an interest of five per cent., which the Government shall not be at liberty to pay off until 1832, 33-34.

He preferred the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENG) to the original section, as reported, and particularly, because it did not limit the negotiation to an exchange on equal terms; for he knew of no reason why we should give to the brokers a stock worth eight or ten per cent. above par, in exchange for stock that was worth but five or six. But he was opposed both to the amendment and the bill, for it seemed to presuppose no exertion on the part of Congress to pay off the public debt. If, during the period of the loan and redemption, we have an excess of revenue, we cannot appropriate it to this object. A time of peace was the proper time to extinguish the debt. Every effort should be made to effect it, and, if we cannot do it otherwise, we ought to reduce and retrench our expenditures. And shall we now say, at a time when there is no prospect of war, that it is expedient to postpone the debt, instead of paying it off? And for what? Where is the reason and necessity of so doing? Mr. J. was not satisfied that any beneficial result could grow out of the measure. He did not believe that Congress could calculate money matters and stocks better than the brokers. They were as able to calculate the contingencies of war in Europe, as we could be; and they could judge as well, to say the least, as we could, what would be the effect of such contingencies, to increase or diminish the value of stock. It was their business and their pursuit, to which they gave undivided attention. All the affairs of our own Government also were open to their inspection, and they will not make the exchange unless they can get the best of the bargain. They will calculate whether the Government will redeem the stock or not, and they will inevitably out-calculate us. Mr. J. believed, that if we should want money hereafter, we could obtain it on better terms than by adopting this measure. He thought we should use all our efforts to discharge the debt, but not to postpone it. We must retrench our expenses. Look to the Navy. He was a friend to it, but he believed it opened an ample field for retrenchment, without taking away its efficiency. Savings might also be made in the civil and other departments, the fortifications, &c. We were now paying an annual interest of $5,700,000 on the public debt, and such was our situation, that we were now paying interest on interest. In such a condition, in his private affairs, a prudent man would look about him for objects of reduction, and for such means as should be calculated to relieve him from the burden of debt. Although this bill purported to provide only for an exchange of stocks, it was really and substantially a bill for creating a new loan, and, as such, it ought, in his opinion, to be regarded

He liked things to be called by their right names; they would then be better understood by the people. The competition offered by either the bill or amendment, was confined to the present creditors of the Government; no other than an owner of the one or the other description of stock can become purchasers of this new loan; and it cannot therefore be expected, that as good a bargain can be had for the Government, as if the market was opened to all; and this was another objection with him to the bill. What! authorize a loan of thirty millions, and confine it to a particular description of individuals! It was wrong in policy and principle; rely upon it, if the bargain you offer is advantageous to the holders of the present stock, they will accept it; if it is not, they will not; so that the alternative, either way, is a bad bargain to the Government. Nor has it been shown that money will be scarcer two years hence than it is now; and, as we are to make a bad bargain if we make any, what good reason can be assigned against postponing this loan of thirty millions, until we have redeemed as much as we can, and what is not then redeemed may be put in market, in which others as well as the present stockholders, will have a right of bidding, and which will insure a more advantageous contract to the Government? We may then get the full value of the stock, which we cannot now reasonably expect; it will then be time enough to adopt the sad alternative of loans, when better cannot be done. Mr. J. said, the measure might have one effect, which some gentlemen might esteem beneficial; that was, it might do away the plea of necessity of retrenchment and reform, and permit things to remain as they are. This, he said, was what he wished to avoid; and he must be allowed to believe that the Government would, at least if Congress would do its duty in reforming the disbursements of public expenditure, be able to discharge a considerable part of the public debt; but if the debt be postponed until 1831,-2,-3, let the funds and resources of the Government be what they may, we cannot pay it until that time, and having money, we shall be apt to waste it; whereas, if we keep the public debt in our reach, and in view, we shall make exertions to pay it.

Mr. McDUFFIE stated that he should not have troubled the Committee with any remarks on this subject, if the range of the observations of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. JOHNSON) had not assumed a broader cast than he had reason to anticipate. The objections of that gentleman seemed to be founded upon a misconception of the nature of the obligations of the Government to discharge its public debt, and of the means of preserving the public faith and public credit unimpaired. To whom does the obligation of the Government extend? To the public creditors, and to them only. Now the proposition involved in this bill proposes to do nothing but with the consent of the public creditors. And what fact could furnish more conclusive evidence of the high credit of the Government than that the public creditors should be anxious to exchange six or seven per cent. stock, redeemable at an earlier period, for five per cent. stock, redeemable at a period more remote? But the gentleman from Kentucky seems to assume that we are bound, upon principles of public policy, to hasten the extinguishment of the public debt, without a proper regard to the existing revenue. Mr. McD. contended that no principle, either of justice or sound policy, could require that the whole burden of the war debt should be thrown upon that disastrous period of embarrassment which succeeds the war, and is produced by it. For how, said he, stands the argument? We go to war without any preparation. Our system of revenue is prostrated by the very state of things which renders revenue necessary. In war, therefore, we must always contract an enormous public debt; for our principal dependence in war must be upon loans. We sustain the burdens and privations of the war; we fight the battle; and when it is brought to a close, exhausted as we are by the conflict, we are required upon principles of policy to pay off the debt immediately, though the public creditors are anxious that we should not. It is clearly a question between the present generation and posterity; and nothing could be more obviously just than that the debt contracted for the establishment of those principles, in which posterity have as deep an interest as we have, should not fall exclusively upon those who have already had more than their proportion of sacrifice and suffering. The gentleman had said that we were compelled to increase our debt by a loan last year. This fact tended rather to favor than oppose the projected exchange. For how, said Mr. McD., can an argument in favor of the rapid extinguishment of the public debt be drawn from the fact, that our revenue was inadequate to pay the interest of the debt, keep up the operations of the Sinking Fund, and defraying the current expenses of the Government? It seemed to involve an inconsistency which he could not comprehend. But it seems that we are to be driven back into the condition in which the late war found us. We are to cut down these establishments, founded upon the experience and disasters of that war, and to run again into a system of wasteful economy, such as had brought upon us the heavy debt we are now required to discharge. In fact, said he, if we wish to avoid a public debt, we must change our system of revenue, so as to render it permanent. If we are not prepared for this, we must reconcile ourselves to a public debt, as without loans we cannot meet those exigencies, which we are certainly destined to encounter.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, remarked that the subject had taken a different course from what he had expected. He had not hitherto explained the principle of the bill—nor would his health permit him to do so extensively now. The gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON,) had not appeared to view the subject in that light, in which he hoped his better judgment would lead him. He has said that we should not procrastinate, but pay off. He agreed it was desirable, but it was not in our power. The object of the bill was to be prepared to pay off the debt. The money market is now favorable for the operation—but it may not be so in 1825. The money market is rising. The calculation is to seize the present opportunity. Twenty-six millions of dollars of the stock due in 1825 and 1826, is proposed to be exchanged by this operation; if carried into complete effect more than two millions of dollars will be saved to the United States. It was intended to postpone it to a period when we shall be able to extinguish it. Information had been received from New York and Boston that left no reasonable doubt that the proposition would be accepted by the creditors. On the first of January, 1825, we must meet these demands, and he knew of no other adequate means to effect it. Mr. S. reviewed, at considerable length, the financial concerns of the country to show the necessity and expediency of adopting the bill as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. In 1824 it was calculated that the whole of the public debt would be redeemed. He had seen and conversed with the Secretary of the Treasury, since the bill was reported, who informed him that the custom-house bonds of the last quarter of the last year had exceeded his expectation by the amount of one million of dollars. It had been said that we ought, by no act of ours, to deceive the people. This was a truism. It was a position that no person would deny; but he believed the Secretary of the Treasury would not propose, and he hoped the Committee of Ways and Means would not be found to sanction or sustain such a proposition. Mr. S. thought the present was a palpable case, and that there could be no reason for refusing assent to such a measure, which was calculated to diminish the national debt. It was very true that this proposition would defer the payment of the public debt, but it would be with the consent of the creditors—and in such case there could be no complaint, nor pretence of injustice. In respect to the amendment, he thought it did not differ much from the principle of the bill; but he was not satisfied that it was preferable to the section as reported. Mr. S. took a particular view of the several parts of the amendment, and to show that it did not improve the bill, but would be injurious to it. The proposition to extend the subscription had been considered by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Committee of Ways and Means, and was deemed unadvisable after deliberation. The probability that the other holders of stock would subscribe was, to say the least, very remote. There was no adequate inducement, and would have the effect to throw so much into the market as might perhaps defeat the object. In another particular, also, the amendment was defective, for it allowed no time for the European stockholders to come forward and avail themselves of the proposed exchange.

Mr. RHEA opposed the amendment at some length, but the position of the reporter would not enable him to hear, with sufficient distinctness, to do justice to his observations.

Mr. F. JOHNSON replied to the remarks of the gentlemen from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) and South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE.) It was by no means his intention to cast any imputation upon the committee who reported the bill, and in relation to the observations of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McD.), he had said nothing whatever about the Army. He had voted for its reduction at the last session; and, with respect to the Navy, he was disposed to lop off such parts of it only as were an encumbrance to it. He did not wish to retard any of the operations of Government—but he was decidedly in favor of a just system of economy, and for examining into every department of the Government, and for reducing and lopping off every expenditure that can be done, without impairing the useful operations of the Government, and such a system, he said, would greatly accelerate its operations and advance its best interests. And he was opposed to the principle of putting a great load of debt upon posterity. He understood the gentleman (Mr. McDUFFIE) to say, that “we had fought and borne the brunt of war, and that posterity ought to be charged with the debt incurred by it—that it would be too much to require us to fight the battles and pay the debts too.” If these were that gentleman’s notions he differed very widely from him. He would ask what advantage would that liberty and independence be to posterity, which the victories of the present generation had sustained, if we load them with a public debt, which is to destroy the enjoyment of that liberty and independence? Direct taxation, he said, was the worst of evils in a country situated as ours—the nation was not now capable of bearing a direct tax, nor could he tell when it would be. He thought we ought to keep a sharp lookout in peace, so as to pay off our debts incurred in war, and to avoid loans and direct taxes, and a system of strict economy would greatly aid us therein. This objection to the bill was reducible to these two grounds—1st, that it was not certain that money will be dearer then than now; and, 2dly, that it was not certain that we should be wholly incapable of reducing any part of the public debt.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, was in favor both of the bill and of the amendment. It had been objected by the gentleman from Kentucky, that brokers would calculate the value of stock better than Congress, and that therefore no beneficial bargain of this sort could be made. But this he thought depended much on contingencies. If there should be war in Europe, the rate of interest will rise, and the value of stock will fall. Another event might also have an essential bearing upon the value of stock. He alluded to the recent recommendation to recognise the independence of the South American colonies. This would probably open new sources of trade and industry. It was also objected that we might have money on hand, lying idle, which might be applied to the extinguishment of the debt. To this he replied that it might be used to increase the Sinking Fund. The commissioners of that fund could employ it beneficially, and would then be able to purchase in the stock on advantageous terms, and, in the supposed change of the money market, it would have a double operation. He considered this as one of the most prudent measures that the nation could adopt, and the most fortunate conjunction that could occur for it. He was anxious that the bill and amendment should pass, and he thought it could be modified without injury, so as to include the European holders of the stock who might wish to avail themselves of the act.

Mr. BALDWIN considered both the bill and the amendment as highly important, and he was in favor of the principle of both. But it was material that the House should well understand it. The amendment had been just submitted, and he thought it was entitled to more deliberate consideration. He therefore moved that the Committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again. Which was agreed to.

In the House, the amendment, on motion of Mr. WOOD, was ordered to be printed, and, after granting leave to the Committee to sit again, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 21.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled “An act authorizing the payment of a sum of money to John Gooding and James Williams,” reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, to which was also referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Jacob Babbitt," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to whom the subject was referred on the 20th instant, reported a bill in addition to the act, entitled "An act for the prompt settlement of public accounts;" which was read twice and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLANE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Bainbridge; which bill was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COOK from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was recommitted a bill for the relief of James McFarland, reported the same with two amendments, the first of which was concurred in; and some debate arose upon the second amendment, in which Mr. COOK supported, and Mr. COCKE opposed the same; when, on motion of the latter, the bill and amendments were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HILL moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Library Committee be directed to inquire into the expediency of distributing the four volumes of the Secret Journal of Congress, and Journal of the Convention, to those members who belonged to the 16th Congress, and have not received them; and, also, to report on the propriety of distributing copies of the same books to the Athenæum, Antiquarian, Historical, and other learned institutions in the United States, together with the Journal of the Convention, the Fourth Census, Pitkin's and Seybert's Statistics, Wait's edition of State Papers, and the Commercial Regulations of Foreign Countries.

The resolution being read, the question was taken, Will the House now proceed to consider the same? And was determined in the negative.

Mr. MERCER moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Buildings be instructed to inquire into the practicability of preparing, for the accommodation of the House of Representatives, the room in the centre building designed for the library.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, stating the causes of the failures and delays of the mails between the City of Washington and Wheeling, in Virginia, and prescribing the means of preventing them in future; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to fix the limits of the port of entry and delivery for the port and district of Philadelphia," was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, it was ordered that the bill concerning invalid pensioners, reported to this House on the 20th January, 1821, together with the petitions and papers of the persons therein mentioned, be committed to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill concerning invalid pensioners, reported at the present session of Congress.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which was referred, on the 9th instant, a petition of sundry inhabitants of the said District, reported a bill to enable the inhabitants of the District of Columbia to form a frame of government; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.—The bill is as follows:

A Bill to enable the inhabitants of the District of Columbia to form a frame of government.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the inhabitants of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, authorized to hold a Convention, to determine whether it will be for their benefit to have the rights of self-government extended to them, so far as the same may constitutionally be done; and if they shall be of such opinion, to form a frame of government, to be submitted to Congress for their approbation.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said Convention shall be composed of twelve representatives for the City of Washington, and that part of the county of Washington east of Rock Creek; of eight representatives for the town of Georgetown, and that part of the county west of Rock Creek; and of nine representatives from the town and county of Alexandria. The said representatives to be free white taxable males, inhabitants of said District, above the age of twenty-one years, who shall be chosen by ballot, by the free white taxable males, inhabitants of said District, above the age of twenty-one years, on the — day of — next, under the superintendence of such judges, at such place in each of the said towns, and subject to such other directions, as the President of the United States may prescribe.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the persons so chosen shall convene, in the City of Washington, at such place as shall be fixed by the President of the United States, on the — day of —, and shall organize themselves by the appointment of a presiding officer, and such other officers as may be necessary. A majority of the members shall constitute a quorum, and their proceedings shall be communicated to the President of the United States, to be by him laid before Congress at their next session.

EXCHANGE OF STOCKS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, (the bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange certain stocks,)—the question being upon the amendment submitted yesterday by Mr. CAMBRELENG.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, opposed the amendment in a speech of considerable length. He examined its various provisions, and contended that it really held out fewer advantages than the first section of the bill in its present shape; and, among other observations, he remarked that it was calculated to depreciate the value of the stock, by giving advantages to American over European stockholders.

Mr. WOOD was in favor of the amendment.

H. of R.

MARCH, 1822.

He thought it was conformable to the views which the Secretary of the Treasury had presented in his report, and he, Mr. W., was disposed to extend it, not only to thirty, but to thirty-six, millions; and he entered into a statistical examination of the subject to test the expediency of its adoption.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied, and modified the resolution by adding to the amendment as follows: "Provided, That, in effecting the aforesaid exchange, the Secretary shall, in no case, give any premium."

Mr. WILLIAMSON remarked that the subject of finance, in all its parts, was already important, and equally difficult to be understood. One need to have clear views himself, and the attention of others, else his remarks on such a topic would be fruitless. This bill proposes the exchange, he observed, of twenty-six millions of six and seven per cent. of the loans of the United States, effected in 1812-13, payable in 1825-26, by a new stock to be created, bearing an interest of five per cent. payable in 1821-2-3. In this discussion four considerations present themselves to our view, and demand our decision:

1. Is it expedient to make the exchange?
2. For what amount, if any, shall the books be opened?
3. At what time shall they be opened and closed; and,
4. When shall the new stock, if any be created, become due? These are the four points to be considered.

In respect to the first, he thought it was expedient to make an exchange. In 1812-13, the United States were involved in a war with one of the most powerful nations upon earth. The demands and pressure on the Government were great; it must have had money; to procure which loans were opened, and the money procured at a rate per cent. interest which showed at that time the unfortunate condition of public credit. Of the loan at six and seven per cent. effected in 1812, he remarked, there will be due and redeemable, in 1825, upwards of seventeen and a-half millions of dollars; and of the loan effected in 1813, at six per cent., there will fall due and redeemable, in 1826, near twenty-two and a-half millions; so that upwards of forty millions are redeemable those two years. The first question is, Will this Government be able to meet and pay off that sum in 1825-6? He thought not. The Secretary of the Treasury, and others who have passed the revenue and expenditure under their view, think not. What, then, is the best provision which can be made in the premises? It is very truly stated, that the credit of the Government is now high—perhaps never higher. A promissory note, that is, the paper security of the Government of the United States is always more valuable, will sell quicker, and for a larger sum, as the length of time intervenes between the date and pay-day; because, as the interest is always paid quarterly, and as the capitalists do not want the trouble of often vesting their money, or exchanging the investment, provided it lies safe. Hence, at the present moment, $10,000 of Government paper, bearing five per cent. interest, and payable ten years hence, interest demandable quarterly, would now bring as many dollars in specie, and also a considerable premium. In 1812-13, Government security, at six, and at one moment, seven per cent only, would command the cash, though the day of pay was fixed at thirteen years then future. The reason was, money was commanding high interest; the credit of Government was low; changes great abroad, and we were compelled to borrow, and capitalists took the advantage. The tables are now turned; our credit is good—never better; and money, being plenty, commands only a low interest. It is said a stock at five per cent. interest, payable 1831-2-3, will bring in, by way of exchange, the demands of six per cent. against the United States, which are payable in 1825-6. Why not, then, make the exchange? It will be saving the difference of at least one per cent. on the sixes, and two on the sevens, for three or four years; and it cannot be safely calculated that our Government will be able to pay them off when they become due.

A second question is the amount. If a loan be opened for exchange, for what sum ought it to be? The bill proposes twelve millions of the loans of 1812 and '13, so as to embrace all that on which seven per cent. interest is payable, and so much of the loan bearing six per cent. as will, together with the former, amount to twelve millions; leaving due, to be paid by Government, during the year 1825, the residue of what will fall due that year, namely, about five millions and a half. Can this latter sum be paid those years, besides meeting the other charges on Government? The past and present state of the revenue does not prophecy such ability. We cannot do it. Gentlemen do hardly suppose it. Why not then open the exchange for the whole which will fall due that year, viz: about seventeen and a half millions, instead of twelve millions? If this reasoning be correct, then how will the Government be able, probably, to pay off twenty-two millions and near a half, which fall due in 1826? It would be remarkable to entertain calculations that we then may deal in the commodity of miracles. I would go in this exchange as high as the amendment proposes, which is thirty millions, and then about ten millions will be due those two years—quite as much of the public debt mentioned as we shall be able to meet.

Another and third question arises in this difficult business—When shall the books be opened, if opened at all? The bill proposes October, the amendment April. If the credit of the Government paper be, as stated, good, so high in market, why not embrace the present moment? Is it not the proper time? What advantage by delay? Mighty events, which are by many anticipated; changes in the mercantile world, always affect money matters. When the loans were effected, it was a season of extremes; the present is another, diametrically opposite. The gentleman from Maryland says, some of the sixes and sevens are owned in Europe, and a short time would not give them an equal chance to make the exchange. Such, if any there be, have, no doubt, their agents here, vested with discretion, and know full well what would be for the interests of their principals. Delays are dangerous, and, in this case, procrastination is the thief of time. In my humble opinion this exchange must be effected before autumn, or never.

One word, finally, on the fourth point proposed, as to the time when these five, if the books for exchange be opened, shall be payable? The bill, I believe, said Mr. W., has set the time at 1831-'32-'33, and these years may be the proper ones. If the time be fixed, and extended to a period too remote, perhaps the new stock ought to bring a premium; if within a limit too short, the exchange cannot be effected; and it is very difficult to prepare a data from which to draw any satisfactory conclusions. But, if long threes and fives are now as quick in market, and bring as great a premium as gentlemen have supposed, one might conclude these years would be the times which ought to be fixed in the bill. I am unequivocally in favor of the projected exchange, believing, as I do, that it will be promotive essentially of the interest of this Government.

Mr. TRACY was opposed to the amendment, because he was opposed to the principle of the bill. He thought it would be either inoperative, or the Government would lose by the project; for it was really a question whether the Government was more acute in bargaining than the stock-jobbers, and the expediency of the measure depended upon that point, concerning which he thought the House could not entertain a doubt. He believed the proposition would not be accepted; for, as it was of a voluntary character, it certainly would not be, unless the jobbers and brokers should find it for their interest to agree to it. Every man was to be trusted in his own art, and he thought it extremely impolitic for this Government to enter into competition with the keener brokers of Wall street. He also thought the effect of it might be to lull the people into a listlessness on the subject of the public debt, and virtually to authorize expenditures which we could not well bear, under the impression that the debt was indefinitely postponed, and that all things were going on well.

Mr. RICH proposed the following amendment:

"Strike out 'thirty' third line, and insert 'twenty-six' seventh line, to wit: For the seven per cent. stock, and for the six per cent. stock of the year 1812, to an amount not exceeding twelve millions of dollars; for the six per cent. stock of the year 1813, to an amount not exceeding fourteen millions of dollars."

Mr. CUTHBERT observed, that although, in the administration of our finances, the conversion of stocks was a matter of experiment, yet it was not so in other countries. Nothing was more common; nor did it follow, in such conversion, that the operation could not be made advantageously to both parties. Originally, stocks are taken up by money dealers; but in a Government whose credit is good, it usually gets into the hands of those who are prudent and cautious, and unwilling to enter into hazardous speculations, but are desirous of possessing a steady and certain income.

Hence it is not a competition between the Government and the jobbers, but recommends itself by the accommodation of persons who prefer a settled and certain income to a stock which will be shortly redeemed, though entitled to a higher rate of interest. Mr. C. was in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. RICH,) for he was apprehensive that, without it, there would be so much brought into market as to destroy the competition.

Mr. RHEA entered at some length into the discussion, and was opposed to all the amendments proposed.

Mr. COOK was opposed to the principle of the bill. In the course of his remarks, he observed that it was better for the Government to create a new five per cent. stock, than to undertake to exchange it; for there would be a combination among the stockholders which would effectually defeat the purpose of the bill. The holders know full well that the Government will not be able to pay the debt when it becomes due, and will make their calculations accordingly.

Mr. TRIMBLE was opposed to the amendment as proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. RICH,) because he preferred that which was originally proposed. He was not disposed, however, to admit, with the mover, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) that there was danger of war from measures that the House would probably adopt in a few days, so as to affect the price of stocks. Mr. T. was inclined to believe there had been, or would be, such an increase of revenue as materially to reduce the public debt, and presented an extended view of the subject in detail, arriving at the conclusion that it would not realize the expectations that had been entertained. He stated that the annual revenue from the customs had generally been at about the ratio of one dollar and fifty cents to each individual in the country; and he thought there was no reason to expect a disproportionate increase hereafter. It would probably increase, only according to the increase of population. If, therefore, even the bill should pass, yet it would be found necessary to retrench, and he was satisfied that retrenchment might be made to the extent of a million of dollars, without any possible injury to the public service and safety. He thought the time was favorable, and he should vote for the bill, unless it should be shown that we could meet the debt without it.

Mr. BALDWIN remarked that this was the first time for many years in which Congress had gone into an examination of its financial concerns; and that subject must always be important which affects the credit of the Government. In order to establish it on a firm footing, it was desirable to establish it, as a maxim, always to redeem our debts, at the time when they are redeemable. A great question then was, whether and how far the debt could be met by the ordinary revenue of the Government; and he was disposed, from the best view he could take of the subject, to consider the proposition of the gentleman from New York (Mr. WOOD) to extend this bill to forty millions, as the better plan. As we had gone on for some years past, the Government has paid the interests of short stock, and the holder gets the benefit of long stock. The high price of our stock did not now depend so much on the great credit of our Government, as on the difference of exchange; and, although our revenue had increased, yet the debentures were stationary, and he could not view the state of our revenue in the same favorable point of view as the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) seemed to consider it. We were now as prudent men looking over the state of our accounts; and if we can now, owing to the rate of exchange and the peculiar state of the money market, reduce the interest from six and seven per cent. to five, we ought to do it. He should not further press the amendment he had offered some days ago, to include the two millions; for the House had refused it, and taken the pledge of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that it would be paid—the one-half this year, and the residue the next. He begged that fact might be remembered, and he hoped the pledge would be redeemed. He concluded by expressing his approbation of the bill, for, he believed, the more the subject was examined, the more clearly it would be found that the revenue was not more than adequate to the current expenses of the Government.

Mr. RHEA made some further observations in opposition to the amendment; when the question was taken, and Mr. RICH's proposition was lost.

Mr. RICH moved to amend the amendment by inserting in the 7th line as follows:

And for the six per cent. stock of the years 1814 and 1815, to an amount not exceeding four millions of dollars.

After a few remarks in support of the amendment by the mover, and in opposition to it by Mr. CAMBRELENG, the question was taken, and the amendment negatived.

The question then recurred upon the original amendment of Mr. CAMBRELENG, which was also negatived—yeas 52, nays 78.

No further amendment having been offered, the second section of the bill was read, when

Mr. VAN WYCK moved to amend the same by adding the following, after the 40th line in the 2d section:

Provided, That, if the stockholders of the aforesaid six and seven per cent. stocks decline exchanging such stock for the five per cent. stocks, proposed in the bill, that it shall then be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, after the first day of January, 1823, to reopen the said subscription books, indiscriminately, to the citizens of the United States, which books shall remain open until after the 1st day of January, 1824, and from which proposals the best terms shall or may be accepted by the Secretary of the Treasury. And be it further provided, That no such stocks created, shall be subscribed for, transferred to, or owned by, a foreigner, in a foreign country.

The question was taken on the proviso, and negatived without a division.

Mr. MILNOR submitted the following amendment to the 2d section:

In line 19, strike out one and insert three.

In line 21, strike out two and insert six.

In line 33, strike out three and insert eight.

The amendment was supported at considerable length by the mover, and opposed by Mr. TUCKER of Virginia, and Mr. GORHAM; when the question was taken on the first branch of it and lost, and the residue was withdrawn by the mover, when the Committee rose and reported the bill to the House.

In the House, Mr. CAMBRELENG proposed to amend the first section, by striking out all that part of it which follows the enacting clause, comprising the same provisions with that which he had offered in Committee of the Whole, except reducing the sum from thirty to twenty-six millions, and directing the books to be opened from the first of May to the first of August.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he felt it to be his duty to express his decided opinion in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG.) However unpromising might be its prospect of success, he was so firmly convinced it ought to succeed, he would briefly state his reasons for his opinion. The principle of the bill, said Mr. B., is unexceptionable. If we could pay the debt, when it shall become due, that would be the most politic course. This is admitted to be impossible, even by those who are the most sanguine in their calculations respecting the revenue. After the $26,000,000 shall have been exchanged under the provision of this bill, the remainder of the war loans will be more than we will be able to pay as they become due. It therefore becomes a wise and prudent people to provide, in time, the means of keeping up the credit of the Government. We can now do this, and save, at the very least, an annual expenditure of interest of $260,000 from the time when the bill shall go into operation. The question, however, now is, between the first section of the present bill and the proposed amendment. Mr. B. said he was in favor of the latter. The universal peace which followed the general war throughout Europe, had opened the avenues of trade to all nations. By that means much of the capital of our merchants had been driven from commerce, and was vested in the public funds. The price of money became cheap, because we had much more than was demanded to carry on our commerce. Trade has, however, been lately reviving, and the demand for money is becoming greater. Should we realize all the benefits from declaring the South American provinces independent, which we anticipate, and should other events transpire, which are at least probable, new channels of trade will be opened to our commercial enterprise. Delay upon this subject may therefore be dangerous. We have every reason to believe that the exchange could now be effected upon very advantageous terms—what will be the state of the money market by October next, it is impossible to foresee. The amendment contemplates that proposals shall be received by the Secretary of the Treasury from and after the first of May next; the original section, not until October. In this respect, Mr. B. thought the amendment preferable to the bill as it then stood. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had thought the bill should not go into operation until the 1st of October next, that the foreign holders of stock might have an opportunity of taking advantage of its provisions. Mr. B. said, he could not perceive upon what principle we should endanger the success of the bill, by waiting until they might have an opportunity of subscribing. He also preferred the amendment for another reason. The five per cent. stock of the Government was now selling in the market at an advance higher, by between three and four per cent., than the six per cent. stocks redeemable in 1825 and 1826. The bill, as it at present stands, will give the benefit of this premium to the stockholders of the Government, at the public expense. Why should we extend these advantages to any description of men in the community? We should be just; it cannot be expected we will be generous to the public creditors; because, by acting in this manner, we injure our constituents. A premium of three per cent. on the $26,000,000, proposed to be exchanged by this bill, would amount to $780,000. I hope the House are not prepared to give this large sum, without any equivalent, to the holders of the public stock. The amendment can do no harm. The Secretary has no power to make a worse bargain, under its authority, than under that of the original bill; he may, however, and in all human probability will, make one that is much better. This bill, as it stands at present, presents a singular incongruity. The six per cent. stock, due in 1824 and in 1825, is placed on the same footing, and yet the one is clearly more valuable than the other. They must both be exchanged for five per cent. stock on the same terms, and it is out of the power of the Secretary to make a different bargain in the one case from the other. Mr. B. said he believed, if the amendment were adopted, it would be a clear saving to the country of between half a million and a million of dollars; and, under that impression, he would call for the yeas and nays, that his vote might be recorded in the affirmative.

The amendment was further supported, after a modification, at the suggestion of Mr. Cook, by Messrs. TUCKER of Virginia, and GORHAM, and opposed by Mr. RHEA, and Mr. SMITH of Maryland, when the question was taken and decided by yeas and nays in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 38, as follows:

Mr. CAMBRELENG proposed an amendment to the second section of the bill, so as to make it conform to the amendment which had just been adopted in relation to the first. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILNOR renewed the motion he had made in the Committee of the Whole, and the three propositions it contained, being taken collectively, were carried—ayes 63, noes 58.

Mr. LOWNDES made some remarks upon the necessity of framing the bill in such a manner as to equalize the premiums of the loans to be made, but, as his health had not permitted him to prepare any amendment calculated for that object, and as he had not anticipated the result to which the House had arrived, he suggested to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means the propriety of moving to adjourn, that a proper provision might be introduced upon that important subject; and, thereupon, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 22.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate the inhabitants of Georgetown, and to repeal all other acts heretofore passed for that purpose; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill to repeal part of an act passed by the State of Maryland in the year 1784, and now in force in Georgetown, entitled "An act for an addition to Georgetown in Montgomery county."

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the laws now in force, as to the issuing of original writs, and final process, in the circuit courts of the United States within the State of Tennessee," reported the same without amendment, and it was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the same committee, to which was also referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act authorizing the disposal of certain lots of public ground in the city of New Orleans and town of Mobile,'" reported the same with an amendment to the title thereof, viz: strike out the words "and town of Mobile;" which amendment was concurred in by the House, and it was ordered that the said bill be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a joint resolution authorizing the delivery of rifles promised to Captain Aikin's volunteers at the siege of Plattsburg; which resolution was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A motion was made by Mr. WALKER, that the House do now proceed to consider the unfavorable report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the petition of Julia Plantou; and the question thereon being taken, it was determined in the negative.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the House agreed to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole, striking out the first and only section of the bill for the relief of Benjamin Freeland and John M. Jenkins.

A debate of considerable length ensued upon the question of concurrence with the Committee of the Whole in their report; in which the concurrence was opposed by Messrs. HENDRICKS, COOK, MALLARY, CHAMBERS, MOORE of Alabama, WALKER, and SLOAN, and supported by Messrs. RANKIN, HILL, CANNON, HARDIN, and TOMLINSON, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 65, noes 61, and, consequently, the bill was rejected.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, on the subject-matter of the petition of George Simpson; which, on motion, was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act for the relief of Holden W. Prout, administrator on the estate of Joshua W. Prout, deceased;" and "An act for the relief of Andrew Mitchell;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of George Simpson; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

EXCHANGE OF STOCKS.

The House again resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, (the bill to authorize the exchange of certain stocks.)

Mr. LOWNDES, after some prefatory observations, submitted the following amendment, to be inserted after the words "United States," in the 22d line of the first section:

"Provided, always, That, where different terms may be offered for the exchange of the same stock, the Secretary of the Treasury shall allow to all the subscribers of the same stock terms equally favorable. And provided, also, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall accept only such amount of subscription under each loan as he may deem most conducive to the public interest; but he may afterwards admit, at any time before the next session of Congress, a further subscription, on the terms of the subscription before accepted, provided the whole amount shall not be more than twenty-six millions of dollars."

Mr. TRACY was apprehensive that this amendment would increase his principal objection to the bill, by giving greater effect to the combinations of those who hold the stock which it is proposed to exchange. He was also opposed to it on a ground which applied, perhaps, equally well to the bill itself—that this was nothing more nor less than a provisional loan of twenty-six millions; and he proceeded in an argument at considerable length, to show the inexpediency of such a loan. It was of greater amount than the Administration called for, and this amendment narrowed the field of competition.

Mr. LOWNDES made a small modification of his amendment, and replied briefly to the observations of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. TRACY,) and contended that the reverse of the position he (Mr. T.) had taken, relative to the combination of the stockholders, would result from adopting the amendment; and he contended that it would hold out an inducement to the holders of stock in every part of the Union to make a liberal bid to the Government.

Mr. WALWORTH made a few further remarks in opposition to the amendment; when

The question was taken thereon, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 65, noes 42.

On the question whether the bill should be engrossed for a third reading—

Mr. TOMLINSON rose and said, that, when this bill was presented to the consideration of the House, he was inclined to favor its passage, but, by an examination of the subject, he had arrived at the conclusion that it ought not to be adopted. His mind had been brought to this result, in consequence of the amendment adopted, on the motion of the honorable member from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG.) He had, he said, on a former day, assented to that amendment, but more mature reflection had convinced him of his error. Thus circumstanced, he deemed it his duty briefly to explain his views of this matter, and he hoped he should not be considered by the House as unnecessarily prolonging a discussion which had already occupied so much of its time. He said he had uniformly advocated the policy of extinguishing the debt of this country as speedily as possible, and had hoped to see the day when the United States should present the solitary example of a nation unencumbered with the public debt. Sir, said he, need you be told that such a nation will be secure in its institutions—will be powerful—will command the affections of its own citizens and the respect of the world?

Against the doctrine, that "a national debt is a national blessing," he had heretofore protested, and was not now prepared to give it his sanction. Such a debt might tend to render stable a despotic Government, because it enabled such a Government to derive that support from the interest of its subjects, which it could not expect from their affections. But in our Government it is otherwise. Founded upon the great and just principles of liberty and self-government, to its permanency the aid of a public debt is not necessary. The strong bonds of mutual attachment which now exist, and he trusted ever would exist among the people of the United States, would, he hoped, render perpetual that form of Government, whose benign influence was so universally felt and acknowledged.

MARCH, 1822.

Exchange of Stocks.

H. OF R.

In 1820, Mr. T. said, when the national debt was reduced to $88,899,333 57, he thought he saw a reasonable prospect of its further reduction, but he was sorry to be compelled to say that he had been disappointed in that expectation, and that the debt had, on the first of January, 1822, risen to $93,423,605 73, making, in the two years, an increase of $4,524,272 16.

What is now proposed, said he, by the bill as amended? It is to effect a loan of $26,000,000, payable, at the pleasure of the Government, in the years 1831, 1833, 1836, and 1838. He used the term loan, for that was the proper term. The operation proposed could be considered in no other light than a loan, for the purpose of discharging the debt which will be payable in 1825 and 1826; restricted, it was true, to stockholders, but not the less objectionable on that account. Why, asked he, will you make this early preparation to meet that portion of the debt? Why not postpone it until the debt shall become payable? Will it not then be in season to make provision for this payment in case your income should be inadequate to do it?

It is urged by the honorable member from Massachusetts (Mr. GORHAM) that the credit of the Government is now good, and it is prudent to carry that credit into market and now avail ourselves of it. But, sir, said Mr. T. what reason have you to apprehend that your credit will not be as high two years hence as now? Is there any thing in our political or commercial relations which justifies the belief that the credit of the Government will depreciate? On the contrary are not those relations such as to lead the mind most decidedly to a different result? The character of the nation abroad is elevated—the ability of the Government, to sustain itself against opposition from within, and assaults from without, has been fully and satisfactorily tested. The resources of the nation are known to be adequate to meet all its engagements. No stock deserves to be considered, and none is, in fact, considered more safe than that of the United States. Ask foreigners, well informed and candid, what they think of your credit, and, rely upon it, they will tell you that it is constantly appreciating and will continue to do so. Tell me not, then, that your stock will command a less premium in 1825, than it now does. Is it not probable that the price of stock will be enhanced? Should that event take place, it is arithmetically certain that you lose by the proposed exchange of stock. This will not be denied.

But, Mr. T. said, if it be admitted that the value of money shall not appreciate, or, in other words, the rate of interest continue as it now is, and the five per cent. stock command in 1825 the premium which is now given for it, it is demonstrable, that, by the proposed measure, the Government will sustain an actual loss. The five per cent. stock is now at nine per cent. above par, and the six per cent. at an average of six per cent. above par. Now, if you secure to the Government the difference between the price of five per cent. and the six per cent. stock, which will be three per cent. and you save one per cent. interest, for about two years, as this bill is to go into operation near the close of the present year; then, the whole gain to the Government, by this operation, will be but five per cent. But should you wait until 1825, when the six and seven per cent. stock shall have become payable, those stocks, instead of being at six and nine per cent. above, will be at par; that is, the Government will then have a right, by the terms of the original loan, to compel the holders of those stocks to receive their pay, and to surrender their certificates. If your credit should then be as good as at present, and five per cent. stock command the premium which it now bears, the whole of that premium of nine per cent. will be gained by the Government, and a clear profit made to the nation of the difference between the premium thus secured, and the excess of interest paid for two years. The result then is, that, by deferring this loan until 1825, when your debt is payable, a clear profit will accrue to the Government, of at least four per cent. on $26,000,000, amounting to more than one million of dollars. This, he said, was arithmetically certain, if the credit of the Government remained the same as at present. If the value of money be either depreciated, or the same as it now is, in 1825, then the Government will certainly lose by adopting the present bill. This proposition seemed to him incontrovertible. Here then are two chances against you. In what event are you to gain? Only, in the very improbable one, that the price of five per cent. stock, in 1825, shall have experienced a considerable depression. What will produce this state of the money market, and thus increase the rate of interest? Why, say gentlemen, our foreign commerce is increasing, and becoming more extended and profitable. South America, too, it is said, is to be opened to us, with which we shall be enabled to carry on a very lucrative trade, and the surplus capital of the country will thus find employment. Let us not be too sanguine; these bright and cheering anticipations may not be realized; other nations may, and probably will, participate with us in these commercial advantages. Every commercial nation, said he, is making uncommon efforts to extend its commerce. But, is it, said Mr. T., true, that the rate of interest increases, in proportion to the commercial prosperity of a country? Does not a profitable commerce bring into the country a surplus capital which, from time to time, the owners may wish to invest in permanent and safe funds? Did the rate of interest increase in Holland, with the advancement of her commerce? It is not true, that when the commerce of that country was at its highest point of prosperity, the rate of interest was most depressed? Is not the same true of England, and every other distinguished commercial nation? But, said Mr. T., if the expectations of gentlemen be well founded, and commerce should give that employment to the capital of the country which is anticipated, will not the necessary and inevitable result be, that the revenue of the country will be increased? A prosperous commerce will fill the Treasury. From the commencement of this Government to the present moment, has not experience shown, that the income of the nation has been graduated by its commerce? Does commerce flourish?—then your Treasury is replenished. Is it depressed?—the Treasury is in want of money. If then our commerce is to be so flourishing and extensive, as to absorb all the capital of the country, the Treasury will be furnished by the customs with the means of paying this debt. In any aspect, therefore, in which this subject can be viewed, it was inexpedient to adopt the plan of converting the present outstanding stock into stock irredeemable for periods so long as those fixed in the bill now under consideration.

Mr. T. said, he did not understand this subject very intimately, much less did he feel disposed to dictate a course to be pursued in relation to this subject; but it seemed to him that the mode most expedient for the Government was, to defer the whole matter until 1825, when the war loan of 1813 will be payable, and then, if no other mode could be devised for its discharge, to go into the market with a loan for such portion of that stock as the Government shall not then possess means to pay. Should this course be adopted, a fair competition would be afforded, not only to the holders of stock, as proposed by the present bill, but you would avail yourselves of the additional competition created by the capital which money lenders might wish to invest in stock. In my judgment, said he, this is the proper course for the Government—it is the fair and honorable course, and one which will preserve the Government from the imputation of stockjobbing, to which the amendment in its operation would render it liable. Mr. T. said, he was gratified to perceive, that, in the opinion which he had just expressed, he was supported by the Secretary of the Treasury, given to this House in his annual report, who might be considered as having some little knowledge on this subject, as well as the honorable gentleman, by whose amendment the only valuable feature of the bill had been destroyed.

Mr. T. referred to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of showing, that, should such an exchange of stocks be deemed inexpedient or impracticable, “a saving of equal, if not greater extent, may be effected in the years 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828, by borrowing, at the rate of 5 per cent. in the first and each successive year, a sum equal to the difference between the amount redeemable and that portion of the Sinking Fund applicable to its redemption; and thus a saving be secured to the extent of that difference by the latter process.” There is, said he, much wisdom in this plan. You borrow the money when you want it; you pay off your debt at par; and by going into the market with a loan of a small amount you will probably secure a high premium. But what does the amendment propose? To bring into the market $26,000,000 of 5 per cent. stock at one time. Does not every one know that the effect of throwing into market such an immense amount of stock, at a given period, would be to diminish the value of it? The amendment is indeed framed upon the idea that a premium is to be obtained on stock when there is $26,000,000 in market. Sir, said he, this idea is perfectly fallacious, not to say visionary. The stockholders and brokers understand this matter; they know that by sending a large quantity of a given article into market you reduce its price; and depend upon it, sir, their conduct will be influenced by that knowledge.

But this is not the most objectionable feature of the bill, as amended. A general subscription of stock is authorized by that amendment, without designating the particular stock to be received. What is the consequence? What every man who examines the subject with the least attention cannot fail to understand. The stock which is the least valuable—the 6 per cent.—will be subscribed, and the 7 per cent. left unextinguished, and bearing interest until it shall become payable, and the Government be in possession of the necessary funds to discharge it.

In this, Mr. T. said, consisted the decided superiority of the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means over the amendment under consideration. The bill reported by that committee wisely requires that the $8,606,355 27 of 7 per cent. stock shall be exchanged and extinguished. The amendment leaves it optional with the holders to subscribe that or any other stock. The 7 per cent. stock is at $109, while the 6 per cent. is at $106. Will the holders of stock then continue to hold their 6 per cent. and surrender the 7 per cent.? He did not believe the stockholders would be guilty of such folly. They understand plain arithmetic, and will by a very easy process arrive at the result, that, by surrendering the 7 per cent. in lieu of 6, they must inevitably lose 4 per cent. Will they do it? They are not apt to disregard their own interest; certainly they are not blind to it.

There were other views which might be taken of this subject, Mr. T. said, but that which he had attempted to present to the House would induce him to vote against the bill.

After Mr. TOMLINSON had concluded his remarks—

Mr. DWIGHT, of Massachusetts, rose and observed that he had on yesterday voted in favor of the amendments (postponing still further the redemption of the new stocks) which had been proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MIRON,) and which were adopted by the House. He now moved to reconsider that vote, and briefly stated the reasons which had induced him to change that opinion. He thought it was a sound rule in public as well as in private affairs to defer payment of debts no longer than necessity requires; and he had become satisfied that in 1831, 1832, and 1833, we should be able to pay off these debts, and he was therefore unwilling to extend them beyond those periods. There were but two reasons, he said, which had been or he thought could be urged in favor of the amendments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—the first, that the resources of the Government would not enable them to redeem the stock to be created by the bill at an earlier period than 1838; the second was, that stock at 5 per cent., created according to the provisions of the original bill, redeemable in 1831, 1832, and 1833, would not acquire sufficient value in the market to induce the holders of the 6 and 7 per cent. stocks, redeemable in 1825 and 1826, to exchange such stocks for 5 per cents., redeemable at no later period than 1833. In regard to the first of these reasons, he would undertake to show that, so far from the Government being unable to redeem these stocks at an earlier period than 1833, there would be, upon the basis of the present revenue, more than the sum of $9,000,000 in each of the years 1831, 1832, and 1833, disengaged from any other objects contemplated by the act of 1816, creating the Sinking Fund, and applicable to none of the objects of the Government, unless these stocks were (as he hoped they would be) made redeemable in those three years. Gentlemen, he said, by recurring to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, would be enabled to see a calculation by which the whole of the national debt, except the 3 per cents. of thirteen millions and a quarter, would be redeemed in 1839, upon the basis of a sinking fund of 8,000,000, commencing in 1825. If this calculation were correct, he might assume that the whole debt would be paid in 1837, provided the above sinking fund should be made applicable to that object as early as 1823. But gentlemen, he said, had asked, from what sources a sinking fund of $8,000,000 was to be obtained? He thought he could answer that question satisfactorily to every member of the House.

Exchange of Stocks.

H. of R.

It was apparent, that, out of the revenue of the present year, the Government had appropriated to the extinguishment of the interest and principal of the public debt, the sum of	$5,722,000
Add to this sum the probable balances in the Treasury at the end of each year, upon the basis of the present expenditure	1,000,000
And the sum which will be raised annually, by the correction of the duties	1,500,000
And the sum which will be, in 1824, disengaged from the payment of the deferred stock	600,000
And the sum which will, in 1827, be disengaged from the Navy appropriation	500,000
And you have the sum of	$9,322,000

Here, then, he said, was a surplus of 9,322,000 over the proposed sinking fund of eight millions, which surplus would be more than sufficient to counterbalance the deduction to be made on account of the two last mentioned sums not being disengaged until 1824 and 1827. If, he said, he had shown, as he believed he had, incontrovertibly, that the Government would have surplus means to constitute a sinking fund of eight millions, applicable to the public debt, in each of the succeeding seventeen years, the first ground taken in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania had failed entirely. He would detain the House but to say one word upon the second ground, which he thought equally untenable. It would be seen by a recurrence to the prices of stocks, that our six per cents, created in 1812, redeemable in 1825, were worth 105 to 106, while the sixes of 1815, payable in the year 1828, were now worth 110 to 111, and that the five per cents, payable in 1830, were worth as much in the market as either the sixes or sevens proposed to be exchanged by the bill. There was, then, no necessity for going beyond the years 1831 and 1833, to effect the objects of the bill; and he hoped the House would agree to reconsider the vote, and subsequently to reject the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MERCER asked if it was in order to reconsider a proposition after it had been amended? and, if so, what would be the effect of such a reconsideration upon the amendment?

The SPEAKER decided that the motion to reconsider was in order.

Mr. CAMBRELENG opposed the reconsideration, and replied to the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. TOMLINSON.)

The motion to reconsider was further supported by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, Mr. LOWNDES, Mr. RHEA, and Mr. EUSTIS, and opposed by Mr. MILNOR and Mr. BUCHANAN; when the question was taken, and the motion of Mr. DWIGHT to reconsider was carried.

The amendments of Mr. MILNOR being then before the House de novo, the question was taken on the same collectively, and they were negatived.

Mr. COLDEN then moved to adjourn; which motion was lost.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote taken on yesterday, upon the amendment of the first section of the bill, as proposed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG.) Mr. W. remarked that he should make no observations on the motion; and for his reasons he should refer to the remarks which had fallen from the gentlemen from Connecticut, (Mr. TOMLINSON,) in which he fully concurred.

The question was then taken thereon, and the motion to reconsider prevailed—ayes 77 noes 43.

Mr. MERCER moved to adjourn. Lost.

The main question on Mr. CAMBRELENG's amendment being now before the House—

Mr. WALWORTH moved to strike out that part of it which had been added this morning as a proviso, on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES.)

This motion was also negatived.

Several questions of order were then raised, as to the effect of the propositions, positively and relatively, as they now stood before the House; in which Messrs. WALWORTH, GORHAM, MERCER, RICH, LOWNDES, and CAMBRELENG, expressed their views on the subject.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the House had negatived the motion of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. WALWORTH,) to strike out the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES.)

The question being taken, the motion to reconsider was negatived.

Proceedings.

MARCH, 1822.

Mr. COOK moved to insert, after the word Treasury, in the first and nineteenth lines, respectively, the words, "under the superintendence of the President of the United States."

Mr. BASSETT opposed the motion; and the question being taken thereon, it was also negatived.

Mr. FARRELLY renewed his motion to adjourn; which was again lost.

The question then recurred on the original amendment, as proposed by Mr. CAMBRELENG, and amended on the motion of Mr. LOWNDES.

Mr. SERGEANT observed, that he would vote for the amendment, but against the bill altogether. He considered it in the light of a bet to be made between the United States on the one hand, and the stockholders on the other, as to what would be the state of things in the year 1825, in which the odds were in favor of the latter. It was putting our wisdom in money matters against all the collected wit of the United States, and in a case in which the Government was bound, and the creditors left free. It was therefore an unequal bargain, for we must judge now, and they have all the chance of the intervening period to aid their judgment. These calculations were their trade, but were not within the ordinary range of Congressional business; and he had a further objection to the bill, that it was imperfect without the amendment of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) and that amendment required the proviso of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES,) and the whole involved the Secretary of the Treasury in a dilemma, in which it was not right to involve him, and from which no ordinary good fortune could enable him to escape.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. CAMBRELENG, and negatived—yeas 36, nays 74.

The original bill, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, being now before the House—

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to amend the same, by introducing his original amendment, in the form first proposed, without the proviso of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES.)

Mr. RHEA moved the previous question, but the motion was not accorded by the House—ayes 52, noes 55.

Mr. F. JOHNSON moved to lay the bill and amendment on the table. This motion was also negatived—ayes 50, noes 68.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama moved to adjourn—lost.

Mr. CAMBRELENG withdrew his amendment, whereupon—

Mr. McDUFFIE again proposed it.

Mr. DWIGHT submitted to the Chair whether it was in order.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion was in order.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, called for the yeas and nays—but the call was not sustained by the House.

Mr. RICH moved to amend the amendment by inserting in the sixth line, after the words "per annum," the words "the six per cent. stock of the year 1820 excepted."

This modification was assented to by the (now) mover.

Mr. RICH then further moved to amend the amendment by adding, as the second proviso, the following:

"And provided, also, That of the seven per cent. stock, and of the six per cent. stock of the year eighteen hundred and twelve, inclusive, no more than twelve millions of dollars shall be exchanged in the manner provided by this act."

The proviso was also accepted as a modification by Mr. McDUFFIE.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and negatived by a large majority.

The main question then recurred upon ordering the original bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. RICH called for the yeas and nays, which was refused, and after a few remarks by Mr. CHAMBERS, in opposition to the bill, the question was taken thereon, and the bill was rejected—yeas 61, nays 65. And then the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 23.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel H. Walley and Henry G. Foster," made a report thereon, recommending the rejection of the said bill; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of James Randall and wife: whereupon the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition and accompanying documents.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the fair and equitable adjustment of titles to lots in the town of Mobile; and titles to land derived from the Spanish and French authorities, which have not been embraced by any former law, situated in that part of Alabama called West Florida, and in the State of Mississippi, east of Pearl river.

On motion of Mr. VAN WYCK, the Committee on the Public Buildings were directed to consider and report what disposition had better be made of the paintings by Colonel Trumbull, authorized by Congress.

On motion of Mr. BATEMAN, the Committee on the Militia were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making further provision, by law, for the more equitable enrolment and faithful return of the militia of the United States.

An engrossed bill from the Senate to amend the laws now in force as to the issuing of original writs, and final process in the circuit courts of the United States, within the State of Tennessee, was read a third time and passed.

A bill from the Senate for the relief of Holden W. Prout, administrator of the estate of Joshua W. Prout, deceased, was twice read, and committed to the Committee of Claims.

A bill from the Senate for the relief of Andrew

Mitchell was read twice and committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. STERLING, of New York, moved for a reconsideration of the vote taken yesterday on the bill for the relief of Benjamin Freeland and John M. Jenkins, when the question was taken thereon and negatived—ayes 52, noes 65.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the House agreed to consider the bill supplementary to an act for the better organization of the courts of the United States within the State of New York; when

Mr. WALWORTH moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions so to amend the same as to provide for the establishment of a circuit court in the northern district of the State of New York.

Mr. SERGEANT made a few remarks in opposition; when

Mr. WALWORTH withdrew the motion to recommit with instructions, and proposed to recommit the bill generally; when, on further motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill from the Senate, supplementary to an act entitled an act authorizing the disposal of certain lots of public ground in the city of New Orleans and town of Mobile, was read a third time.

Mr. RANKIN expressed his doubts of the propriety of passing the bill without further investigation, and concluded his remarks by moving to recommit it to the Committee of the Whole, which, at the suggestion of Mr. CONDUCT, he modified by moving that the reference be made to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The motion was further supported by Mr. BUTLER, and opposed by Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON, Mr. SERGEANT, and Mr. COOK, when the question was taken thereon, and the motion negatived.

On the final passage of the bill, it was opposed by Mr. BUTLER and Mr. WILLIAMSON, and, the question being taken thereon, the bill was passed.

EXCHANGE OF STOCKS.

Mr. BAYLIES moved to reconsider the vote taken yesterday upon the bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange stocks bearing an interest of five per cent. for certain stocks bearing an interest of six and seven per cent. He remarked that the bill had been prepared with great care and attention, and after much reflection by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. It had been decided upon, when nearly fifty members were absent, and he thought it but fair that it should be reconsidered.

Mr. COOK observed that there were fewer members now in the House than at the time the vote was taken; he therefore moved that the motion be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. COOK) was not in order, as the motion to lay on the table applied only to primary propositions.

Mr. HARDIN thought the object of the gentleman from Illinois might be obtained, by reconsidering and then laying it on the table, and giving it a final disposition when the House should be more full.

The question was then taken, and the motion to reconsider prevailed—ayes 65, noes 61.

Mr. RICH moved that the subject be postponed for further consideration until Tuesday next.

On this motion, a debate of some length took place, in which Messrs. J. T. JOHNSON, CONDUCT, TOMLINSON, RHEA, HARDIN, and RICH, took part.

Mr. HARDIN moved to amend the motion by substituting Monday week for Tuesday next; but the motion was negatived.

The question on Mr. RICH's motion was then put and carried—ayes 77.

ALTERATION OF THE HALL.

Mr. MERCER then called for the consideration of a resolution he had some days since submitted, relative to the practicability of preparing a room in the centre building for the accommodation of the House.

Mr. M. advocated the expediency of adopting the resolution, and was followed by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, on the same side, when

Mr. TAYLOR proposed to modify the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MERCER) in a manner which he hoped and presumed would meet his assent. The modification was as follows:

Resolved, That the canvass covering the Hall of the House of Representatives be removed, under the direction of the Speaker.

Mr. WOODSON was about to make some observations on the subject, when the SPEAKER reminded the House that the period had arrived in which it was no longer compatible, with the rule recently adopted, to continue the debate on the resolution, the hour having passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved that the resolution and proposed modification be laid on the table.

The question was taken thereon and lost; and the SPEAKER decided that the question, (it being past 12 o'clock,) was now from before the House, and a discussion took place upon an appeal by Mr. MERCER on a point of order, in which the mover and Messrs. RICH, WOOD, RHEA, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, SMITH of Maryland, SMYTH, EDWARDS of North Carolina, and ARCHER, took part, when the decision was narrowed and the appeal withdrawn.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee, on the Post Office and Post Roads in the case of Lemuel Fitch.

The report was unfavorable to the prayer of the petitioner, which was for exoneration from his liability as a surety for Ivory Holland, a postmaster at Richfield, in the State of New York.

Mr. HAWKS moved to amend the report by inserting the word "not," so as to grant the prayer of the petition; but the motion was negatived by a large majority.

H. OF R.

Proceedings.

MARCH, 1822.

No further amendment having been offered, the Committee rose and reported the same to the House, where the report of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was concurred in.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of James May and the legal representatives of William Macomb, deceased, of Detroit, and on the bill for the relief of John Anderson, when the Committee rose and reported the same severally to the House without amendment, where the reports were concurred in, and the said bills were respectively ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on a bill for the relief of Gad Worthington, a bill for the relief of Solomon Porter, jr., and a bill to remit the duties on a sword imported for Commodore Macdonough, and reported the same to the House without amendment, where the said reports were respectively concurred in, and the bills were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then resolved itself a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate to authorize the State of Illinois to open a canal through the public lands, to connect the waters of Lake Michigan and Illinois river; also, on the bill to provide for the examination of titles to lands lying between Rio Hondo and the Sabine river, in the consideration of which a discussion arose on a proposition to amend the bill so as not to require the opinion of the register and receiver on the validity of the titles, but to authorize and require them to collect the testimony thereto; in which discussion Messrs. HARDIN, J. S. JOHNSTON, RANKIN, and COOK, took part. The amendment was finally withdrawn, and

Mr. HARDIN moved to insert in the 27th line, after the word "emanated," the following:

"And it shall be the duty of the said register and receiver to procure, receive, and record, all evidences of fraud, or all other evidences which can be obtained going to show that the claim set up is unfounded and ought not to be confirmed."

The amendment was adopted; also, on the bill to authorize the State of Illinois to open a canal, &c., (being of similar import with that acted upon, which came from the Senate,) the Committee reported the first to the House without, and the second with, an amendment, and on the third, to sit again.

In the House, the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate to authorize the State of Illinois to open a canal, &c., was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and, after a brief discussion, the report of the Committee of the Whole (with the amendment) on the bill relative to the examination of titles to land between the Hondo and Sabine rivers, the same was ordered to be laid on the table; and the House refused to grant leave to sit again to the Committee of the Whole on the bill (originating in the House of Representatives) to authorize the State of Illinois to open a canal, &c., the object of the bill being contained in that which had been concurred in from the Senate. And then the House adjourned.

MONDAY, March 25.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, presented a memorial of James H. McCulloch, collector of the customs for the port of Baltimore, complaining of the uncertainty in the laws providing compensation for the officers of the courts of the United States, and of the various constructions given thereto, and praying that the compensation of said officers may be more precisely and definitely fixed in relation to seizures under the revenue laws of the United States.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Walker," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Matthew McNair," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLANE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of James H. Clark," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, made a report, accompanied by a bill making appropriations for said buildings; which bill was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1822.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Nathan Ford; whereupon it was ordered that the said report be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the petition of Jonathan S. Smith; whereupon it was ordered that the said report be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the State of Illinois to open a canal through the public lands to connect the Illinois river and Lake Michigan," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill to authorize the State of Illinois to open a canal through the public lands, to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with the Illinois river; the bill for the relief of James May and the representatives of William Macomb; the bill for the relief of Gad Worthington; the bill for the relief of Solomon Porter, jr.; the bill to remit the duties on a sword imported to be presented to Com. T. Macdonough; and the bill for the relief of John Anderson, were respectively read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

MARCH, 1822.

Revolutionary Pension Bill.

H. OF R.

On motion of Mr. VAN WYCK, the Committee on the Public Buildings were instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the office of Commissioner of the Public Buildings; and also the expediency of transferring the duties of that office to the Engineer Department.

The SPEAKER then stated the next business in order to be the resolution heretofore submitted by Mr. MERCER, with the modification proposed by Mr. TAYLOR, which had occupied the attention of the House on Saturday, and the further consideration of which had been suspended. The SPEAKER remarked that his first impression had been that, by the rule of the House, the resolution was no longer before them, and could be revived only by being proposed anew. But from further reflection, and having understood that the committee who reported the rule did not contemplate its being placed from before the House, he was inclined to consider it as unfinished business; and he was the more satisfied with this construction (although it was a new case) from the consideration that the rule was intended to further the convenience of the House, and it would be more convenient in its practical operation to regard it as the unfinished business of the morning, than as being laid upon the table.

A division of the question was called for by Mr. SAWYER, when the modification was adopted, and the original resolution negatived.

Mr. REID submitted the following resolution:

Resolved. That the Committee on the Public Buildings be instructed to inquire into the expediency of substituting a glass ceiling for the canvass now covering the Hall.

After a few remarks on the subject by Messrs. REID, MERCER, and WALWORTH, at the suggestion of Mr. WHIPPLE, and with the assent of the mover, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

FLYING MACHINE.

Among the petitions this day presented was the following by Mr. MILNOR:

"James Bennett, a mathematician of the city of Philadelphia, to the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, most respectfully sheweth:

"That your petitioner having invented a machine by which a man can fly through the air—can soar to any height—steer in any direction—can start from any place, and alight without risk of injury; and whereas a like machine has never been invented in any country or age of the world, so as to be applied to purposes of practical utility, and as it is more than probable that artificial flying would not, for a thousand years to come, be brought to the same degree of perfection, had not your petitioner, under Providence, accomplished it; and, as it must be evident to all that Letters Patent would be of little use to the inventor in consequence of various modifications or improvements which might be made, and which never would have been thought of, had not the way first been opened by your petitioner: He therefore solicits a special act of the Congress of the United States, to secure to him and his heirs for the term of forty years, or for such other term as in their wisdom may be deemed just, the right of steering flying machines through that portion of earth's atmosphere which presses on the United States, or so far as their jurisdiction may extend.

"By granting your petitioner's request, the honor of the invention shall be conferred on the United States.

"J. BENNETT, A. and M.

"PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 13, 1822."

Mr. MILNOR moved to refer the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SERGEANT opposed the motion. He said that that committee did not undertake to soar into regions so high. Their duties were nearer the earth. He moved to lay it on the table.—Negatived.

Mr. WALWORTH moved to refer it to the Committee on Roads and Canals.—Negatived.

The question then recurred upon referring it to the Committee on the Judiciary, which was resisted by Mr. SERGEANT, on the ground not only that it was above their reach, but also that they had so much business before them of a terrestrial character, that they could not devote their time to philosophical and aerial investigation.

The motion was lost; when Mr. LITTLE renewed the motion to lay it on the table.—Carried.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill supplementary to the act to provide for persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war.

Mr. KEYES submitted the following amendment to the first section: "and in all cases he shall be considered unable to support himself if he is over the age of sixty-five years, and his property does not exceed one hundred dollars."

Mr. KEYES observed that this was a bill supplementary to two acts passed by Congress. The first was passed March 18, 1818, which was favorable to a certain proportion of the American Revolutionary Army. The other act of Congress, which was in addition to the act of 1818, was passed May 1, 1820, and in my opinion, said Mr. K., it had torn out a part of the bowels of the act of 1818; for it gave one man authority to drop from the pension roll as many men as he should please—and it had been his pleasure to drop from the pension roll, in pursuance of said act, more of the old soldiers than the British, and their allies, the Hessians and Indians, ever slew in any one battle during the Revolutionary war. And the striking off of the pension roll, is the cause of so many prayers and petitions being presented to this Congress from the old heroes—stating that they were wrongfully struck off the pension roll, and now begging Congress to restore them to said roll again; and I ask Congress, said Mr. K., what will you do with these old worthies? Time is short—I mean it is short with the remnant of that Revolutionary Army. Mr. Chairman, let us make a calculation. Many of that Army, in the year 1775, were rising of sixty years of age forty-seven years ago. That would make this class of soldiers one hundred and seven years old. Where are they, Mr. Chairman? They are all in their graves. No pensions are needed for this class of soldiers. But, sir, generally speaking, that Army were from the age of forty-five to eighteen years of age. Take forty-five and add forty-seven years, since the commencement of that war, and it would make that class ninety-two years old at the present time. I ask where are they? They likewise are all in their graves, or nearly all. You will not have any pensions to give them, or, if any, but few. We will now speak of the youngest class, or nearly so—eighteen at the commencement of the war, forty-seven since, will make that class sixty-five. This class is in the evening of their days, and will you not afford them a little relief? Mr. Chairman, I was one of those American Revolutionary rebels, as the British were pleased to call us, when we fought under the authority of the thirteen colonies, and I well remember the cold and hunger, the fatigue and slaughter which that Army had to meet with. Yes, Mr. Chairman, that Revolutionary Army, under the confederated States, underwent every thing but death, in defending their country from the oppression and tyranny of their mother country, and thousands and thousands of them were slain in that bloody and awful conflict. These old heroes were undoubtedly the bravest men that the world ever produced, ever since David fought Goliath, the Lion, and the Bear. And how, Mr. Chairman, were these worthy soldiers paid for the great services they had rendered their country? I answer, they were paid in rags, made into Continental bills, which bills represented gold and silver. But these bills were never redeemed, therefore the soldiers were never paid according to contract. But these old heroes, after they had spent the glory of their days in defending the liberties of their country, sat down easy and contented. No murmuring—no complaint was heard from them. No prayers—no petitions were presented by them to Congress to give them pensions; and so the old heroes would have remained in their poverty until death, had not the Congress in March, 1818, of their own free will and accord, unsolicited by the indigent soldier, passed a generous law, inviting the soldier and sailor who were poor and needy, to come and take a pension for life. Congress pointed out the road for them to come; and what, said Mr. K., were the requirements of Congress in that bill? I answer, the applicant was to make a declaration under oath, before a United States judge, or one of the judges of the State, Territory, or county, where the applicant resided, stating his reduced circumstances, and need of his country's help—the time he engaged in the United States service—the company, regiment, and the line of the Army he served in, the time and manner of his discharge from the Army, and what other proof was in his power to make; and when he had thus sworn under oath before the said judge, and made what other proof he, could—if the judge was of the opinion he had served against the common enemy, according to the requirements of the act, and was in such reduced circumstances as to need the assistance of his country, the judge was to transmit the testimony in the case, and the proceedings had thereon, to the Secretary of the Department of War, and if he was satisfied that the soldier or sailor comes under the provisions of said act, it was his duty to put him on the pension roll. And was this all, Mr. Chairman? No—there was a clause in the act which provided that, if any applicant gave false testimony in his declaration, he should be liable to indictment for wilful and corrupt perjury. And now I ask every lawyer in this Congress the question, whether there was any other legal way to have dropped any soldier from the pension roll, except to first convict him of wilful and corrupt perjury? And I am fully persuaded that every lawyer of good understanding will join me in the opinion that there was not any other legal way to drop any off of the pension roll.

Sir, I will also ask every farmer, merchant, or mechanic, in this Congress, if there was any other equitable way of dropping off these heroes from the said roll? And I think I may say they will agree with me. No, Mr. Chairman, the act of 18th March, 1818, brought rising of eighteen thousand of the remnant of that Revolutionary Army upon the pension roll; and who was to blame? The old worthy heroes were invited to come—and after they had taken a little refreshment of their country's bounty, they state they were wrongfully dropped off the pension roll, whilst others, under as good circumstances, were retained—and I submit it to Congress whether it is not cruel to feed a few of these old heroes, and starve the rest, or leave it for their poor children to support them, or for the towns where they reside, to be at this expense. I would rather repeal the act which invited the old soldiers to come and take a pension, and let them all starve together, than to feed a part, and let the other part stand, and look on, and suffer. But, Mr. Chairman, you have put your Secretary of War into an awkward situation, and extremely difficult it must be for him to do justice in this pension business, to the poor old worthy heroes; his living at such great distance from them, and not knowing their individual wants and inability to provide for themselves, and his having to apply to the Attorney General for his opinion was never intended, I presume, by the act. I therefore, for the benefit of the Secretary of War, and for the sake of giving relief to the poorest class of old soldiers, have thought best to propose an amendment to this bill, that is to say, in all cases where the old soldier is over the age of sixty-five years, and his property does not exceed one hundred dollars, he shall be considered unable to support himself.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to long speeches, and great waste of time, and will leave much for others to speak—and will only say, if there are any of those old Revolutionary soldiers in Congress who know by experience the fatigues, dangers, and hardships, which the Revolutionary Army had to endure fighting for independence, I hope they will speak, and let the young men of Congress know by word of mouth, the suffering of the old heroes of the aforesaid war; for the young men who have been born since the beginning of the Revolution, know but little or nothing about it, only by reading the history; and reading will give but little information, compared with enduring the hardships of war.

Revolutionary Pension Bill.

Mr. MONTGOMERY made some observations in favor of the general provisions of the bill, and announced his intention to submit the following proviso:

Provided, However, that no person shall be restored to the pension list, whose estate, clear of all encumbrance, shall be of the value of three hundred dollars or more: And provided further, That the evidence already submitted shall be deemed competent, and to authorize such restoration.

Mr. KEYES withdrew his amendment to give way for the proviso of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. MONTGOMERY) which was thereby in order.

Mr. COCKE had hoped this bill would be suffered to pass, without any amendments or modifications to obstruct it. The Secretary of War, he observed, was left to judge of the merits of the respective applicants, according to their circumstances, and he thought this was a far preferable provision to that proposed in the amendment.

Mr. FARRELLY remarked that it was impossible to do adequate justice by any general and uniform rule, and, therefore, it was much better to confide the matter to the discretion of the Secretary, who can adapt the extent of the relief to the necessity that requires it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY replied, and suggested to try the principle of the proviso, by erasing the words "three hundred dollars," so as to read it in blank.

Mr. WOODCOCK opposed the amendment, and, among other remarks, observed that he had rather leave the discretion proposed to the officers of the Government, than to hold out inducements to the old soldiers to reduce their property to a sum so small as to obtain the relief contemplated by the act, and he thought the bill was sufficiently guarded to attain the benefits which it was intended to confer.

Mr. KEYES made some further observations in support of the proviso.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, opposed it, and expressed his apprehension that, if the gentlemen from Vermont and Kentucky (Messrs. KEYES and MONTGOMERY) persisted in the amendment, they would defeat the bill, and he proceeded at some length in support of the bill as originally reported.

After further remarks by Messrs. MONTGOMERY, COCKE, and FARRELLY, the blank was proposed, by the mover of the proviso, to be filled with the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars; and the question being taken on the proviso as amended, the same was negatived.

Mr. ALEXANDER, of Virginia, said, in order to try the sense of the House as to the principle of the bill, he would move to strike out the first section, which was extremely obnoxious to him. He was not so much opposed to the second, which resulted from the necessity of the case; but rather than gain that at the expense of the other, he would be willing to give up the whole. He must confess his surprise to find his friend from Tennessee (Mr. COCKE) among the advocates of this bill, who had at all times evinced such a disposition to economize every department, and to bring the expenditure within the means of the Government. It was not so surprising to find a support elsewhere, when he recollected, at a former period, that every effort was made to destroy the provisions of the last act upon the subject, which, however reluctantly, gentlemen are obliged to admit have been extremely salutary. No one ever thought, under the original act, we should be compelled to appropriate three millions of dollars to carry it into effect. And no one can take upon himself to say—not even the gentleman from Tennessee—if the bill passes in its present shape, that we shall not be called upon to add five hundred thousand or a million to the present fund for this purpose. These contingencies, like some others, will be presented at a time when we are least prepared to meet the demand, and will have to be put down under the head of deficiencies. And I do deem it of some consequence to know what will be the probable estimate, if gentlemen are determined to entail this system upon the nation. The amount, however, out of the question, and I am opposed to the bill in principle.

Gentlemen may call it by what name they please, it is little else than the original act itself, liable to the same system of fraud, perjury, and corruption, which have heretofore been practised upon the Government. For, sir, what is the character of it? It provides that "in all cases where persons are stricken from the pension roll, and they are afterwards from any cause so reduced in circumstances as to be incapable of supporting themselves, they may be permitted to come in and take advantage of the act passed in 1820." And, my word for it, there will be scarcely one who will not bring himself within the rule; for we know how easy a matter it is for an individual, if you prescribe to him the nature of the evidence required, to make out his case. It is in fact an invitation—nay, an encouragement—to those who, with a proper share of industry and exertion, are capable of supporting themselves and family, to get rid of the little property which they have as an encumbrance, by putting it to hazard in dissipation or any other way, provided it does not appear to be done with a fraudulent intent; and (as the ingenuity of man is always capable of the task) well knowing that, let the worst happen, they can here take the benefit of the insolvent act, by which they will be placed in a more solvent condition.

I do not say that it will be the case with all of them, but that it will with the greater part there is every reason to believe, notwithstanding your oaths, your schedules, and every thing besides; particularly when we have been told that an individual who once claimed the honor of a seat on this floor, and it is presumed stood well in the confidence of the people, felt no scruples upon this subject. And with such high examples before their eyes, is it at all wonderful that they who move in a much humbler sphere should equally disregard the solemnity and obligation of an oath?

I do not mean to disparage the claim of the Revolutionary soldier, but, as my honorable colleague (Mr. RANDOLPH) very properly remarked on a former occasion, it is disparaged by the very act itself. For you know, sir, it is one thing to face your enemy, and another to turn your back upon him; and no one will pretend to say, that these are equally deserving the affections of the American people.

Gentlemen tell us that the Revolutionary soldier is fast hastening to his home; and the one who spoke first in this debate (Mr. KEYES) undertook to prove—what is reduced to almost arithmetical certainty—that the first enlistment is fairly off the stage, and the last well turned of sixty, and a few more days will light their “way to dusty death.” Yes, sir, labitur et labetur is applied to the progress of time, and I wish it may not with some propriety be applied to the Revolutionary course of the soldiers; for in truth, from the evidence before us, they put me very much in mind of the buckram gentry, who, instead of diminishing, multiply in a geometrical ratio. The system, sir, is wrong in itself; and the more it is attempted to be mended, the worse it is for the nation.

Mr. WHIPPLE regretted that a bill of this sort should have occasioned debate, but he thought the gentleman last up had mistaken the object of the bill. Its only purpose was to restore the law to the situation in which it stood, prior to the decision of the Attorney General on the subject; and he extended his remarks in favor of retaining the first section.

Mr. COCKE explained at some length the views of the committee in reporting the bill, and, after further remarks by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, WHIPPLE, REID, and WALWORTH, the question was taken on Mr. A.’s motion, and negative.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the second section so as to extend the provisions of the section to justices of the peace, but the amendment was negative.

Mr. WHIPPLE moved to strike out all the part of the third section which follows the word “enacted,” and to insert in lieu thereof the words:

“That pensions granted upon schedules made subsequent to the passing of this act, shall commence from the time such schedules shall be filed in court.”

The amendment underwent some discussion, in which the mover and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, took part, when,

Mr. COOK proposed to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. WHIPPLE) by adding thereto, as a proviso, the 3d section as originally reported in the bill. The question being taken thereon, the motion was lost.

Mr. RICH then submitted the following amendment:

“Provided, That any pension which shall be granted in conformity with the provisions of this act, and upon evidence heretofore exhibited, shall commence from the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and twenty-two.

After a few remarks on this motion by the mover, the question was taken thereon and lost; when the original proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. WHIPPLE) recurred, and a decision being had thereon, it was negative.

Mr. REED then proposed an amendment, the purport of which was to limit the beginning of the pensions to the passage of the act.

A discussion ensued thereon, in which the mover, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. TRACY participated; but, before a decision,

Mr. FARRELLY moved that the Committee rise and report, which was refused.

The subject was further discussed by Mr. FARRELLY and Mr. COCKE; when the question was put, and carried in the affirmative.

Mr. COCKE moved to amend the first section by inserting, after the word “pensioners,” in the 13th line, the words “shall have heretofore furnished, or hereafter shall furnish,” &c.; when the question was taken, and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to amend the bill by adding thereto, as a second section, the following:

“And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall be authorized to place on the pension list such applicants (being in all other respects embraced by the existing laws) as were rendered incapable of active service for the term, or part of the term of their enlistment, by reason of wounds or disabilities received while in the line of their duty.”

The amendment was supported by the mover; when the question was taken thereon and negative.

Mr. CUSHMAN proposed the following as an additional section:

“And be it further enacted, That every officer and soldier of the Revolutionary army, not embraced by the provisions of the pension act of 1818, who engaged or enlisted for three years or during the war, prior to the year 1780, and served out the time for which he engaged, or was honorably discharged, shall be entitled to receive, if an officer, — dollars, and if a non-commissioned officer, musician, or private soldier, — dollars, per month, during his natural life.

In support of this amendment—

Mr. CUSHMAN said, the object of the amendment was to extend the bounty and justice of the nation to that portion of the Revolutionary army which he considered the most deserving. This portion, he said, engaged in the war without bounty, and served virtually without pay. It endured the greatest hardships, fought the battles for liberty, and achieved the independence of the country. He would not pretend to do it justice by any praise he could bestow. It might suffice to say, that no army ever deserved better of any country; none under circumstances so discouraging ever performed more glorious achievements; none ever better supported the character of a patriot army. But I repeat, said Mr. C., that I will not expatiate on the merits of the Revolutionary army. Its prowess, its fortitude, and its exploits, are recorded in history and applauded by the civilized world. These speak more forcibly in its behalf than the most finished eulogiums.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

The amendment was opposed by Mr. COCKE and Mr. RHEA, and lost.

Mr. WALKER submitted, as a further section, the following:

"And be it further enacted, That when any applicant, whose name does not appear on the rolls of the State in which he enlisted, establishes by his own oath, accompanied with other corresponding circumstances, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, that he did serve faithfully nine months or more, during the Revolutionary war, he shall be placed on the pension list: Provided, however, That the judge or other officer before whom the evidence is taken shall certify, that, from the moral character of the applicant, no doubts exist of the truth of his declaration."

The amendment was supported by the mover, and lost.

Mr. CANNON then submitted, as a further section, the following:

"And be it further enacted, That all those who have performed nine months' service on one or more tour or tours of duty in the militia or volunteer service during the Revolutionary war, shall also be entitled to the benefit of this act, and also the acts to which this is a supplement, under the same rules, regulations, and restrictions, as are provided for those of the Continental service."

The amendment was supported by the mover, and opposed by Mr. WHIPPLE, when the question was taken thereon, and the motion was negatived; and thereupon, on motion of Mr. COCKE, the Committee rose and reported the bill as amended.

In the House, the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole were respectively concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to insert the words "the justices of the peace," to take the evidence of application, &c., in addition to judges.

Mr. COOK proposed to amend the amendment by striking out the words "of the peace" after the word "justice," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "of a court of record."

This modification was assented to by the mover, but was opposed by Mr. REED and Mr. WRIGHT, and supported by Mr. COOK and Mr. GILMER; and the question being taken thereon, the amendment, as modified, prevailed.

Mr. ALEXANDER moved to adjourn, which was lost.

Mr. MCCOY moved to lay the bill on the table, which was also lost; when the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

TUESDAY, March 26.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill which originated in this House, "to provide for paying to the State of Missouri three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands within the same," and which bill was returned from the Senate with an amendment, embracing also the States of Mississippi and Alabama, reported the same with an amendment to the amendment of the Senate, to the following effect:

"That no part of the three per cent., &c., shall be paid to the States of Alabama or Mississippi, until the sum of $1,250,000, stipulated to be paid by the United States to the State of Georgia, for the cession of the Mississippi Territory, &c., nor until the whole of the Mississippi stock shall have been redeemed."

This amendment was adopted, and the amendment of the Senate, thus amended, was concurred in.

Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," and that the said bill be referred to the select committee appointed on the memorial of the president and directors of the said bank.

The SPEAKER laid before the House two pamphlets which had been transmitted to him as Speaker, by Monsieur Franchieu, a citizen of France, containing a projet for the protection of the liberty of the press, which he desired to be laid before the House of Representatives. They were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, made a report, recommending the appointment of a joint committee of the two Houses, to inquire and report upon the proper disposition of the paintings executed by Colonel Trumbull, under the authority of Congress; which resolution (being a joint one) was twice read and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. HILL, the House proceeded to the consideration of a resolution submitted by him some days since, relative to the distribution of certain books, and proposed a modification thereof, so as to inquire into the expediency of purchasing a suitable number of the sixth volume of the Laws of the United States, which had been recently published, for the use of the public Library and of the members of the present Congress.

Mr. RICH moved to amend the same by striking out the words "and the members of the present Congress." The motion was lost, and the question being put on the resolution, as modified, it was adopted—ayes 55, noes 46.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, stating the progress that has been made in the settlement of the arrears in the accounts of the Post Office Establishment, and, also, the difficulties which have interfered in the final liquidation thereof; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on the Public Lands, on the memorial of Stephen P. Chazotte, and others, composing the East Florida Coffee Land Association; whereupon, it was ordered that the said report be committed to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill granting to the State of Alabama, and to the Territory of Arkansas, the right of pre-emption to certain quarter sections of land.

claims of 1792-3-4, adverse to the allowance of the same; which, on motion of Mr. E., was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have disagreed to the amendment of this House to the title of the bill supplemental to an act, entitled "An act authorizing the disposal of certain lots of public ground in the city of New Orleans and town of Mobile," and they have passed a bill, entitled "An act to continue in force, 'An act declaring the consent of Congress to acts of the State of South Carolina, authorizing the city council of Charleston to impose and collect a duty on the tonnage of vessels from foreign ports; and to acts of the State of Georgia, authorizing the imposition and collection of a duty on the tonnage of vessels in the ports of Savannah, and St. Mary's," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill concerning the commerce and navigation of Florida, which was reported to the House without amendment, when the same was ordered to a third reading.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES on the subject of the military fortifications at Dauphin Island and Mobile Point, accompanied by sundry documents. The Message and documents were read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and the Message was ordered to be printed.

[For this Message, see Senate Debates, March 27, ante page 345.]

EXCHANGE OF STOCKS.

The House then agreed to consider the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange certain stock bearing an interest of five per cent., for certain other stocks bearing six and seven per cent.

Mr. S. SMITH, proposed certain amendments to the bill, in order to meet the wishes of other gentlemen—the effect of which, if agreed to, will be to include in the stocks to be redeemed by five per cent. stock, the six per cent. stocks of 1814 and 1815, in addition to what is already embraced by the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be printed, and the further consideration of the bill postponed to Thursday next.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSION BILL.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the acts providing for the relief of certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war," was read the third time.

And, on the question, Shall the said bill pass? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 128, nays 23, as follows:

EXPENDITURES ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. NELSON, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings, made the following report:

The Committee on the Expenditures on the Public Buildings, report: That it appears from the statement of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, laid before the Committee, that his disbursements on account of the centre building of the Capitol, during the year 1821, were as follows, viz:

For materials	$32,209 50
For freight, wharfage, drayage, tools, smith's bill, fuel, stationery, &c.	7,922 49
For compensation to architect, clerk, and three persons at the head of carvers', stonecutters', and carpenters' departments	8,250 00
For labor, including pay of five persons employed as foremen and overseers	53,932 30
Amount expended on centre building of Capitol, in 1821	$102,314 29
And there was expended upon the President's House, in the same year, the sum of	5,405 32
For old Executive offices	5,736 67
For ground round the Capitol	2,017 56

Amount expended on the public buildings and Capitol square, in 1821 - $115,473 8.

Appropriations.

March 3, 1821. For the work on centre building of Capitol, in addition to unexpended balances of appropriations to other buildings - $80,000 00

centre building, as appears by the Commissioner's letter, of the 25th of January, 1821, was	35,664 19
The unexpended balance of appropriations of the 11th of April, 1820, for wings of Capitol and Senate Chamber, transferred by act of 3d March, 1821, was	993 26
March 3, 1819. For covering the old Executive offices with slate	10,000 00
March 3, 1821. For covering the roof of the President's House with copper	7,845 00
March 3, 1821. For graduating and improving the ground around the Capitol	2,000 00
Amount applicable to public buildings and Capitol square, in 1821	$136,502 45

From the foregoing statement it will be perceived that, with the exception of a small excess in the disbursement on Capitol square, the expenditures have been kept within the appropriations; that, on the 1st January, 1822, there was an unexpended balance of appropriations for the centre building and wings of the Capitol, of $14,343 16, applicable to the work on the centre building; and that the amount of the sums expended upon the President's House, the old Executive offices, and the ground around the Capitol, in 1821, is less by $6,685 45 than the amount of appropriations for those objects, by the acts of the 3d of March, 1819, and the 3d of March, 1821. An appropriation of $700 by the act of the 3d of March, 1821, for improvements in the Senate Chamber, and in the Hall of the House of Representatives, and in the Library, is not embraced in the above statement. The committee are of opinion that the materials were purchased at moderate prices; that the labor was procured on reasonable terms; and that the work has been executed in a substantial and workmanlike manner.

The report was, on motion of Mr. NELSON, ordered to lie on the table.

PENSIONS TO WIDOWS, &c.

Mr. LONG submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reviving and continuing in force the law that allows half-pay pensions to the widows and children of deceased soldiers of the late war.

Mr. LONG observed that, notwithstanding the justness of this proposition, he was aware that it would probably meet with opposition, inasmuch as it would be attended with some little expense, if acceded to. But he felt a degree of confidence that this House, on a little reflection, would not be disposed to reject it. By this resolution, it is proposed to revive and continue in force a law that was made, no doubt from the purest motives, for the benefit of surviving widows and orphan children of deceased soldiers, who died in the service during the late war, but now, within a very few days past having expired, before all that it was intended for have had the benefit of it. It may be said that they ought to have applied before the law expired, as there was sufficient time. But the situation of those unfortunate women and children is well known; they have not the advantage of the earliest information. Indeed, it was by mere accident that they ever knew any thing about the acts of Congress. Some, however, had been apprized of it through their friends or otherwise, and have applied and received the benefit of the law; others have now applied, but unfortunately too late, the law having expired. I hope it will not be the sense of the House to reject their claims, merely because they have not applied within a certain day. We may reasonably suppose that all would have applied as soon as convenient after they knew of the law. There was one case that had come within his knowledge, and to which it had become his duty to attend to, wherein all the necessary papers had been made out but one, which was the relinquishment to the right of land, and consequently the petitioners were denied that which was intended for them by the law. If Congress should now refuse to revive the law, the prospect that has been held out to those poor women and children by this law, will not only be blasted, but the expense they have been at in preparing their papers, will be lost; he therefore hoped the resolution would be adopted.

After receiving a modification, at the suggestion of Mr. SERGEANT, by assent of the mover, the object of which was to refer the subject to the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business—

Mr. MCCOY moved that the resolution be ordered to lie on the table; which motion was negatived, and the resolution was adopted.

GOVERNMENT OF FLORIDA.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on a bill from the Senate to establish a Territorial government in Florida.

Mr. HILL proposed to insert in the 20th line of seventh section, after the word "court," the words "who shall reside in or near St. Augustine and Pensacola, respectively." The amendment was supported by the mover, and opposed by Messrs. SERGEANT and MOORE, of Alabama, when the question was put, and the amendment negatived.

Many amendments were proposed and considered; among which were two by Mr. SANDERS, of North Carolina, which gave rise to some debate, one of which was withdrawn by the mover, and the other was adopted. Among the gentlemen who proposed or spoke to amendments, were Messrs. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, BURTON, RHEA, and many others.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, after a few prefatory remarks, submitted, as a substitute for a section which it was proposed to strike out, the following:

And be it further enacted, That all the principles of the United States Constitution, for the security of civil and religious freedom, and for the security of property, and the sacredness of rights to things in action; and all the prohibitions to legislation, as well with respect to Congress as the Legislatures of the States, be, and the same are hereby declared to be, applicable to the said Territory, as paramount acts.

Before any decision thereon, Mr. COLDEN submitted an amendment to be inserted in the 11th line, on which a question of order arose, in which MESSRS. ARCHER, BARBOUR, MONTGOMERY, and HILL, took part, when the Chairman decided that the motion of Mr. COLDEN was in order.

Mr. SERGEANT suggested to the mover that the object of the motion was fully provided for in other parts of the bill, on ascertainment of which, Mr. COLDEN withdrew the amendment.

The question then recurred upon the amendment proposed by Mr. MONTGOMERY, in which a debate ensued of considerable length, in which MESSRS. TRIMBLE, McDUFFIE, ARCHER, RHEA, and GILMER, took part.

Mr. RHEA said, he would vote against striking out the section under consideration. We have, said he, lately obtained the sovereignty of Florida. The people inhabiting that country have not long been comprehended within the territory of the United States. The ninth section of the bill contains three great principles, namely: one securing the right of conscience, one securing personal liberty, and another securing the right of property. The people of Florida (except citizens of the United States who may have removed there either temporarily or permanently) know little of our Constitution and laws; to these they are strangers. Many principles of the Constitution of the United States require laws of the United States to carry them into operation. It has been intimated that the Constitution of the United States covers the people of Florida, and that is sufficient. The treaty whereby Spain ceded Florida to the United States might as well be urged in this argument as the Constitution of the United States; for that treaty provides for the security of the people of Florida in the enjoyment of their religion, and personal liberty, and right of property. The Constitution of the United States provides that new States may be admitted into this Union; the treaty with Spain provides that the people of Florida shall, in due time, be admitted into this Union; but laws of the United States, providing for such admission, are necessary. Who has heard of a new State being admitted into this Union without laws of the United States providing for such admission? This "bill for the establishment of a Territorial government in Florida," provides that certain laws of the United States shall have full force and effect in Florida. The reasons urged for striking out the ninth section may, with equal propriety, be urged for striking out the eighth section of this bill, which provides that the said laws shall be in force and obtain in Florida, because the eighth section of the first article, and the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States give power to Congress to enact such laws. That the Constitution of the United States shall obtain and have full force and effect in a territory not included within the bounds and limits of the territories of the old thirteen States, or either of them, but which has been acquired by treaty from any foreign Power since the adoption of that Constitution, and that the inhabitants of such Territory shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities, sanctioned and confirmed by the Constitution to citizens of the United States; it appears necessary and consistent with the Constitution of the United States, that the sovereign people shall, by the Congress of the United States, enact laws preparatory to, and declaratory of, the admission of such territory to a participation of the rights, &c. derived from the Constitution, and afterwards to be admitted a State of this Union on the same footing as one of the original States; the people of such new State will then have their full representation in both Houses of the Congress of the United States, and then the Constitution of the United States is in full operation in and over such new States as it is in one of the original States.

Religious liberty, the right to worship the Eternal, agreeably to the dictates of conscience, is the highest rights an human being can possess. The treaties made by the United States with foreign Powers, by which territory has been acquired, do guaranty religious liberty—the right to worship the Eternal, agreeably to the dictates of conscience, to the people of that acquired territory. The first article of amendment, to the Constitution of the United States, declares that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the exercise thereof—the Constitution of the United States guaranties to each State a republican form of Government; and the Constitution of each State respectively guaranties to the citizens thereof the freedom of religious opinions, professions, or worship—and the citizens are protected in their liberty and property. The 9th section of this bill provides that the inhabitants of Florida shall be protected in their liberty, property, and the exercise of their religion; thereby confirming, by the sovereign powers of the United States, the rights which the Florida Treaty reserved to them.

This ninth section, so far as it goes, may be considered as a constitution containing principles of a permanent nature; on which is bottomed, so far as this bill provides, the Constitutional compact of the people of the United States with the people of Florida; this section declares to the inhabitants of Florida that they shall be protected in their liberty, property, and the exercise of their religion—and it notifies them that no law shall ever be valid, which shall impair, or in any way restrain them in the freedom of their religious opinions, professions, or worship.

In all ages, men who sincerely worshipped the Almighty, in any manner or form, have deemed the rights of conscience and the freedom of religious opinions most sacred; of this right they have been most tenacious, and have suffered persecution of every kind rather than surrender or give it up to the arbitrary will of others. The inhabitants of Florida are presumed to be tenacious of their religious opinions, as well as of their liberty and rights of property. They may have been informed that the Florida Treaty provides that they shall possess these rights—they may understand that they are to be admitted as soon as possible into this Union, under the Constitution of the United States; let the ninth section of this bill be retained, and they will be expressly informed that the rights enumerated in this section are to them confirmed by the sovereign power of the United States.

The question was then taken upon striking out the 10th section, (of which Mr. MONTGOMERY'S amendment was proposed to be inserted as a substitute) and the motion was lost.

Mr. WALKER then moved to amend the bill so as to authorize the people of Florida to elect their Legislative Council. The question was taken and lost—ayes 15.

Mr. COLDEN called for the reading of a memorial of certain citizens of the city of New York, praying for the suppression of slavery in Florida, and which had been referred to this committee; and the memorial was read.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill as amended to the House, when the amendments were respectively concurred in.

Mr. HILL moved to amend the 7th line of the 5th section, by inserting after the word "law," the words "which is now in force or which shall hereafter be passed."

The amendment was opposed by Mr. McDUFFIE, and negatived.

Mr. MONTGOMERY again submitted the substitute he had offered in the Committee of the Whole, which was again negatived.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, moved to increase the wages of the Legislative Council per diem, by striking out the word three, so as to allow them an allowance of five dollars per day, which was lost, as was also a subsequent motion to make the compensation four dollars per day.

No further amendment having been offered, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, March 27.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, on behalf of Colonel Samuel Dale; which was read, and the resolution therein submitted was concurred in by the House as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from further considering the petition of Samuel Dale, and that so much of it as relates to a donation of land to the petitioner, be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. McLANE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for instructing and disciplining the midshipmen in the Navy of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LITTLE presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the District of Columbia, praying that the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in said District, in civil causes, may be extended to a sum not exceeding fifty dollars; which petition was committed to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill to extend the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the petition of James Bennett, presented on the 25th instant, be referred to a select committee, and Mr. MILNOR, Mr. COLDEN, Mr. STEVENSON, Mr. FULLER, and Mr. POINSETT, were appointed said committee.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the petition of the General Assembly of Alabama, for permission to tax certain lands; and the said report was again ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WARFIELD, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating a sufficient sum of money to turnpike the post road leading from the City of Washington to Fredericktown, in the State of Maryland.

And the question being taken thereon, the resolution was negatived.

Mr. REID called for the consideration of a resolution submitted by him yesterday, for placing a glass ceiling under the dome of the Representatives Hall, but the House refused to consider the same, ayes 52, noes 64.

Mr. REID submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the canvass lately covering the Hall, be replaced, under the direction of the Speaker.

But the House refused to consider the same.

Mr. COOK called for the consideration of the bill for the relief of James McFarland. The House agreed to consider the same, and concurred in the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole. On the question of engrossing the bill for a third reading, it was opposed by Messrs. COCKE, ALEXANDER, and MCCOY, and supported by Messrs. COOK, STERLING of New York, and MOORE of Alabama; when, after a further amendment, at the suggestion of Mr. RANKIN, had been adopted, the said bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A message was received from the Senate announcing the disagreement of that House to an amendment to the bill granting certain lots of lands in the city of New Orleans and town of Mobile, &c.; and, on motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the House receded from their amendment, and the bill was passed.

A bill from the Senate to continue in force an act declaring the assent of Congress to acts of the State of South Carolina, authorizing the City Council of Charleston to impose and collect a duty on the tonnage of vessels from foreign ports; and the acts of the State of Georgia, authorizing the imposition and collection of a duty on the tonnage of vessels in the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's, was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution submitted yesterday, by Mr. BLACKLEDGE, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, relative to the proper disposition of the paintings of Colonel Trumbull, was called up, and, by unanimous consent, the following substitute was received in lieu thereof:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, consisting of three members, jointly with such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to examine and report to the respective Houses the most eligible disposition to be made of the national paintings executed by Colonel Trumbull, under the authority of Congress.

The resolution was ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, gave notice that he should, on Friday next, call up the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1822.

GOVERNMENT OF FLORIDA.

The bill from the Senate providing for the establishment of a Territorial government in Florida, with the amendments adopted in this House, was then read a third time.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, rose and said, he had proposed to have taken the occasion of the passage of this bill to have presented to the House some views of the matters connected with Florida, and having avowed to several members this intention, he thought it proper to state why he forbore. He perceived that the members were exhausted by the sitting of the House; and, from other indications, he found that the sense of the House was clearly against the commencement of debate on the subject. In deference to this sentiment, he waived the right, which he had intended to have exercised, of declaring his sentiments; and he hoped the House would appreciate the motive by which he was actuated.

The question on the passage of the bill was then taken without debate, and carried without opposition. [The bill has to go back to the Senate for concurrence in the amendments.]

The bill concerning the commerce and navigation of Florida, was read a third time and passed.

FUGITIVE SLAVES.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape to any other State or Territory.

No amendment having been proposed to the first section of the bill, the second was read, when

Mr. COLDEN moved to strike from the different parts thereof where they occurred, the words "or justice," so as to limit the exercise of the power contained in that section, to judges of a court of record. He contended that the great powers contemplated, ought not to be given to justices of the peace, who were, in rank, the most inferior officers to whom the administration of justice is confided.

Mr. WRIGHT replied, and observed that he had no great objection to this specific proposition; nor did he wish to extend the powers contemplated by the bill to justices of the peace, but contended that the word justice, in the bill, was used in its primitive sense. Mr. W. extended his remarks to considerable length, not only in respect to the amendment, but on the general principles of the bill, which he contended were in conformity to the Constitution, which each member of the House was sworn to observe.

Mr. MOORE, of Virginia, observed that he felt a strong and peculiar interest in the passage of the bill. He thought he should be correct in saying that the district he represented sustained an annual loss of four or five thousand dollars by runaway slaves. The law of 1793 was inadequate to the object it proposed to effect; and he believed a bill of this sort was indispensably necessary, and urged a variety of reasons in favor of the principle of the bill.

Mr. COLDEN then withdrew the amendment he had proposed, and moved to strike out the enacting clause to test the principle of the bill. He observed that no man would go further than he would to give effect to the Constitution, which all agreed to denominate sacred. He was not one of those visionary philanthropists who would contend for immediate and universal emancipation. He was aware that such an attempt was impracticable, however greatly it was to be desired. As a primary consideration, it was first to be determined whether this bill contained any necessary and valuable provisions beyond those already existing, and under this view of the subject he examined with minuteness the present laws on the subject, and contrasted them with the provisions of the bill. He thought the latter were inconsistent with the principles of liberty, and had a direct and efficient agency to promote the traffic which had been carried on to a great extent of seizing free blacks and selling them for slaves. He contended that it was not competent to violate the principles of civil liberty merely because some districts had sustained injury, as had been expressed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MOORE.)

Mr. WRIGHT believed that the bill was sufficiently guarded for the protection of civil liberty—expressed his devotion to its cause, and to the principles of the Constitution, and his wish that the gentleman from New York (Mr. COLDEN) would unite in guarding the bill from encroachments upon that instrument, if he feared it was about to be impaired. Mr. W. referred to cases that had occurred in Maryland and elsewhere, which called imperiously for the passage of the bill.

After some further remarks by Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, against the motion, and by Mr. CHAMBERS in support of it, Mr. WOODCOCK moved that the Committee rise and report progress, which was agreed to, and leave was given to the Committee to sit again.

THURSDAY, March 28.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of Benjamin Desobry, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the select committee to whom was referred the petition of Henry S. Tanner, reported a resolution authorizing the Clerk of the House to purchase ten copies of his Atlas for the use of Congress; and, on motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

South American Governments.

H. OF R.

Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the consideration of the petition of sundry inhabitants of South Carolina, referred on the 22d ultimo, and that it lie on the table; also, from the consideration of the petition of C. W. Neale, and that it be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia; also, from the consideration of the petition of James H. McCulloch, and that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill to limit the compensation of marshals in certain cases.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel Ewings, which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act concerning the lands and salt springs to be granted to the State of Missouri, for the purposes of education, and for other purposes."

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from Senate, entitled "An act granting a tract of land to William Conner and wife, and to their children," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STERLING, of New York, from the same committee, reported a bill directing the sale of certain tracts of land in the State of Ohio, heretofore reserved on account of salt springs; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill making provision for the survey and disposal of the public lands in the Territory of Florida.

On motion of Mr. BLAIR, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing additional compensation to William Drakeford, assistant marshal of South Carolina, for taking the fourth census of Kershaw district.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Enos Terry; whereupon it was ordered, that the said report be committed to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of John Thomas, of Ohio.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee "to confer upon the subject of such disposal as may be suitable, for the national paintings executed by Colonel Trumbull," and have appointed a committee on their part.

The resolution was concurred in by the House; and Messrs. BLACKLEDGE, GORHAM, and VAN RENSSLAER, were appointed of the committee on the part of this House.

Mr. RANKIN called for the consideration of the bill which is lying on the table, providing for the examination of the titles to lands lying between the Rio Hondo and the Sabine river; which was agreed to.

Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON submitted an amendment to constitute a third section of the bill, the purport of which was to grant a right of pre-emption to the present settlers on said land. The amendment was earnestly advocated by Mr. JOHNSTON, and opposed by Messrs. RANKIN and COCKE.

Finally, on motion of Mr. STERLING, of New York, the bill was laid on the table.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of James McFarland," was read a third time and passed.

VACCINATION.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution of this House, requiring that committee to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the law of 1813, on the subject of vaccination, moved that the said committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. BURTON said, that it was a matter of much more importance than those not immediately interested believed it to be. Ten of our fellow-creatures, he said, had lost their lives—and by whom? By the act of a man who styled himself the agent of the United States, and a law of the United States had placed it in his power to do this irreparable injury. If this subject was not to be inquired into, what would be the impression on the public mind? Would not the boasted protection of life, liberty, and property, be considered a solemn farce, if the lives of our fellow-citizens were to be taken, and passed over with the same indifference as if there had been so many cattle slaughtered? My object, said Mr. B. is to repeal the law, or place the institution on a more respectable footing, and make the agent in some way responsible, that the same accident may not again occur. He further said, he believed he could prove, to the satisfaction of any impartial mind, that the present agency was not only a nuisance, but a nuisance of the most dangerous kind.

Mr. B. then moved that the subject should be referred to a select committee.

Messrs. BURTON, HALL, WHIPPLE, HOLCOMBE, and DARLINGTON, were appointed said select committee.

SOUTH AMERICAN GOVERNMENTS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, recommending the recognition of the independence of the South American provinces, and proposing an appropriation to carry the same into effect.

The resolutions with which the report concludes are as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives concur in the opinion expressed by the President, in his Message of the 8th of March, 1822, that the American provinces of Spain, which have declared their independence, and are in the enjoyment of it, ought to be recognised by the United States as independent nations.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill appropriating a sum, not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, to enable the President of the United States to give due effect to such recognition.

Mr. TRIMBLE said, that as he had, some weeks past, offered a resolution requesting the President to acknowledge the independence of all the South American Governments, and as the proposition before the Committee was in accordance with his feelings and his wishes, it might be expected here, as he was sure it would elsewhere, that he should say something on the occasion. When he offered the resolution referred to, it was his intention to discuss the subject freely and at large. He would have entered upon that discussion with much zeal he was sure, but, he feared, without much ability. Happily, the Message and documents had given a new face to the whole subject, and saved the people the unpleasant necessity of expressing an opinion against the course of policy which their fears had prepared them to expect. Had the President failed to recommend the recognition of those Governments, impartial history—if men may look dimly into futurity—would have torn from his temples the garland which a grateful country had placed there, as a reward for his public and revolutionary services. But he has not failed. Faithful to the principles which gave birth to our own revolution, and regardless of the voice and wishes of his country, he has recommended an acknowledgment of all the nations of America. It was a Message of good tidings to twenty millions of freemen. It fills up the measure of his fame, and now he may go down to the grave, with his patriot compeers, ripe in age, and full of honor and renown.

It was proper, Mr. T. said, that he should do justice to the Executive on this occasion, especially as it was well known that he differed widely from the Cabinet upon some other subjects. Frankness, he hoped, was still in fashion. He had no favors to repay, nor disappointments to resent. He asked no pension, place, or office, in the gift of the Government, nor ever would so long as he retained his seat upon that floor; and, so long as the privilege of speech was tolerated, he would use it where he ought, to disapprove with firmness, or applaud with candor and sincerity. He felt it his duty to make some reference to a distinguished person, (formerly the presiding officer of that House,) who had always stood foremost in the great cause of the Patriots; but there were reasons, well understood, which made it proper to be silent, and those reasons should prevail. But, if he had full liberty to speak, what could he say of his late colleague, that is not known and felt by every one? The efforts of that citizen in favor of the Americas, and his exertions to procure an acknowledgment of their independence, are well known to this country and to the whole civilized world. He has erected for himself a monument of imperishable fame—a monument as broad as the continent whose cause he advocated, as high as the towering Andes that rise above its clouds. Two hemispheres have witnessed his exertions, and both will hold his services in grateful recollection.

Mr. T. congratulated the President and the country, and the friends of freedom every where, upon the great political event just struggling into birth. The friends of America, he said, are not called upon now, as formerly, to show that its Governments are independent. The President affirms the fact, and none will question his veracity. The letters of Mr. Torres prove all that is material to know, and the Message admits his statements to be true. They are known to be so by all Europe and America. Those letters, said Mr. T., do honor to the heart and head that wrote them. They equal in merit the finest State papers of the age. Colombia may claim the writer and the facts as her's but the papers are the property of nations. Free governments will preserve them as invaluable treasures. Such a man is an ornament to his country, as his country is an ornament to others. Every thing, he said, from that Republic fills us with admiration. The valor of its armies—the patriotism of the people—their devotion to the cause of independence, entitle them to our profound regard. But, above all, their constitution, similar in all its important features to our own, is most flattering to our pride, and most consoling to our hopes. We have the best authority for believing that Buenos Ayres, Chili, and Peru, are advancing in the science of self-government; and, although we know but little of the internal affairs of Mexico, yet what we do know gives assurances that it also has a Bolivar. Much, it would seem, is in the power of Iturbide. Let us hope that he will not sacrifice his country on the altar of ambition, and that Mexico, like Colombia, will have its Washington.

He did not intend, he said, to trouble the Committee with a history of the rise and progress of the Revolution; nor to array before them the great events which had conducted the Spanish colonies to independence. He would omit a summary of sieges; "of battles lost and won;" of invading armies, and the means and measures taken to conquer or expel them; nor would he digress into statistical estimates or geographical details, especially as all these were better known to a member near him, (Mr. POINSETT,) who, he hoped, would assist the Committee with his information; and also to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NELSON,) both of whom, he was sure, would be listened to with much pleasure by the House.

One fact, said Mr. T., is clear: All the Spanish nations of America are free. They have all thrown off the yoke of Spain, "holding her as they do the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends." Each has declared itself independent, and all enjoy the rights of self-government, under the guaranty of written constitutions, adopted or preparing for adoption. Hitherto we have maintained a strict neutrality between the two Spains. We shall do the same in future, but there is a period beyond which nations cannot safely refuse to acknowledge the independence of each other. No statesman has asserted, or will assert, unless he intends to invite the execrations of his country, that we ought always to refuse a recognition. All agree that we must, at some time or other, act upon the subject. The President informs us that the time has come, and there ought to be but one opinion about the manner of making the acknowledgment. The respect which free Governments owe to themselves, and to each other, ought to decide the question. It was the known usage, he said, among crowned heads, to send ambassadors of the highest rank to each other, and ministers of the lowest grades to republics, and for that very reason, republics ought to send ambassadors of the highest rank to each other, and ministers of the lowest grade to crowned heads. This ought to be decisive, in extraordinary cases like the present. He would not advance an opinion as to the number of ministers that ought to be sent out, but he felt himself bound to say, in justice to the country, that ambassadors extraordinary ought to be sent to Colombia and Mexico; and if ever the best talent in the nation ought to be selected for a mission, this was surely the occasion. If a free people ought at any period to appear in all their weight of character and talent, arrayed in all the pride of plain republican simplicity, this was the time. He was much mistaken if the country would tolerate any selection, made from among citizens of second rate capacity.

South American Governments.

He did not intend, he said, to go into an investigation of the great agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests of the American nations, but there was one or two suggestions on those subjects, peculiarly proper at this time, and under existing circumstances. It was well known that Europeans had been endeavoring for years past to persuade the people of Spanish America, that their agricultural and commercial interest, and those of the United States, are hostile to each other. Such assertions, if true, would have no weight upon the present question; and yet, if false, they ought to be refuted. Foreigners had no doubt put them forth for the purpose of creating jealousies among the nations of America, hoping themselves to profit by the discord and confusion. Fortunately they were contradicted by all experience, and by the whole theory of free trade. No instance could be named, in which an agricultural people had, by its competition, brought ruin on another. Nations, said he, have been ruined by desolating wars, by repeated invasions, by rapine, plunder, monopoly, oppressive taxes, and wasteful prodigality; but there was no case in which industry had ruined industry. God, in his providence, had placed the economy of nations on a better basis, and blessed the industry of man with brighter hopes and better prospects. Nothing in his view was more easy than to show, that the leading interests of all the nations of America are in perfect harmony, and that their prosperity and happiness would be greatly increased by establishing friendly relations and active intercourse. If he had been called upon to name the events which would give the most powerful and permanent support to all the great interests of our hemisphere, he would have said—

The independence of all the Americas;

The independence of the West India islands;

And commercial intercourse with all, upon the basis of exact equality.

Mr. T. said the nations of America had suffered more from the severity of commercial inter-dictions and colonial monopoly than they had from the cruelty of arbitrary power—that commercial vassalage had been more oppressive to them than political dependence; and that they are as deeply interested in the establishment of free trade as they are of free government—that the radical change made in their political condition would necessarily be attended with a corresponding change in their commercial intercourse and maritime relations—that their case, in all its aspects, was similar to that of the United States, and would terminate in similar results—that the entire emancipation of the new from the old continent could only be effected by two great revolutions: the one political, the other commercial—that both had commenced in the United States under the most favorable auspices, and were progressing southward in the “full tide of successful experiment”—that these revolutions had been preceded by a “wide spread range” of moral reformation—that the new hemisphere had produced a new catalogue of civil maxims—a new family of political institutions—a new code of commercial regulations—that all civilized nations were under the dominion of two great social systems, differing widely from each other—that one was established in the Occidental, the other in the Oriental world—that the spirit of the age was against the European system—that the American system had invaded Europe, and spread alarm and consternation everywhere among its kings and emperors—that a coalition of crowned heads was created to oppose it, and two millions of armed men embodied to expel it from that continent. And what, said he, are these systems? What is the American system? Why is it that it agitates two worlds? Why should kings shudder at it while their subjects bid it welcome? Of what is it composed? What is the element that thus, when unresisted, operates unseen, but, when opposed, launches its thunderbolts at diadems, and shakes the nations like an earthquake? It has two aspects, two essential principles—one political, the other commercial. The first is known and distinguished by written constitutions, representative government, religious toleration, freedom of opinion, of speech, and of the press. The second, by sailors’ rights, free trade, and freedom of the seas. Contrast it with the European system. The political character of that system is aristocracy, monarchy, imperial government, arbitrary power, passive obedience, and unconditional submission. Its commercial character is prohibition, restriction, interdiction, impressment, colonial monopoly, and maritime domination. These systems, said he, are the antipodes of each other. They are sworn enemies, and cannot harmonize.

The American system is free government and free trade; monarchy and monopoly is that of Europe: But the European system is artificial, and will perish with the spurious causes that produced it. The American system is natural, and, therefore, durable—natural, because it springs from public opinion—from the embodied will of nations acting freely for themselves; durable, because it reposes upon written constitutions. Its first appearance struck the despots with dismay. Our Revolution gave it birth. Its nativity was cast among these States. It grows with their growth, and strengthens with their strength. The impulse of the age accelerates its motion. Nothing can impede its march, because it moves in the majesty of national opinion, and public opinion is a power that cannot be resisted. From every zone we hear of Congresses, elected by the people, assembled and assembling to establish written constitutions. The system spreads like light—its rays fall every where. The nations hail it as the harbinger of peace and happiness. They act wisely in laboring to adopt it, seeing that the people of this Union have prospered under it beyond all former parallel. He said that the tendency of the American system was manifest to every statesman. That its political progress and extension could be seen by every observer, and time would develop its maritime results. A single instance would explain its commercial operation. The Continent is free: not so, the Islands. Europe, as to them, will continue its system of colonial monopoly—its system of interdictions, prohibitions, and restrictions. These will act and re-act upon all the Americas, but more especially upon Colombia, Mexico, and the United States. Those Powers will retaliate, and unite in their retaliation. The common injury will find a common remedy. They will adopt the counter-check of navigation laws, and, by simultaneously protecting regulations, exclude all foreign tonnage from their ports and harbors. A blow like that, he said, would be decisive. It would forever prostrate the colonial system and open a free trade to all the Islands. The measure, when adopted, would finish the commercial revolution. It would subvert the whole system of maritime domination, and restore the freedom of the seas. And thus the Americas, by the re-action of internal laws and regulations, well concerted and well directed, may enforce their system of free trade. Thus, without the waste of blood or treasure, they may sustain the general system, and vindicate the rights and honor of the continent. Hitherto, he said, the American system of free trade had been struggling, single-handed, with the European system of colonial monopoly, and had maintained itself against the fearful odds. Hereafter, all the Americas will co-operate. The subject ought to have their prompt attention. It required a careful examination, because the course of policy to be adopted by them would settle, finally and forever, whether the American system shall prevail, or that of Europe triumph over it.

Mr. T. was anxious to show, for various reasons, that the great interests of the West India Islands were in unison with the interests of the Continent, and for that purpose went at some length into an explanation of their present condition, and their future prospects. It was his opinion that they would soon throw off the yoke of Europe, and declare their independence. Perhaps they would form a league, and Cuba, in that event, would be the head. Perhaps they would claim a guarantee, and become dependencies of the American nations. In any event, he said, they would adopt the American system, because their interests are all American, and their moral feelings and social habits are acclimating themselves, and every day becoming anti-European.

It was his impression that the nations of America would derive as many advantages from treaties, placing their commerce on a footing of equality, as they would from a recognition of their independence. In that respect the United States could do them double favors. In doing which, she would herself receive an equivalent of benefits. Geography, he said, had been considered as the mistress of political and commercial policy. All experience had proven that near neighbors would be warm friends, or open, active enemies. This was true of men and nations; and, if true, would furnish solid reasons to justify the prompt establishment of friendly intercourse. It was his decided opinion that treaties of amity, commerce, and navigation, should be made with all the Americas as soon as possible, but especially with Colombia and Mexico. The existing interests of the Continent, as well as its future peace and harmony, require it. That our ambassadors, when sent, ought to be instructed to negotiate such treaties. That those treaties ought to be discussed and formed upon the basis of exact equality—of perfect reciprocity. That nothing should be asked on any side, or granted, that would become onerous to the others. Let all, he said, start fairly in the race of emulation, and each would lend a helping hand in times of need. Nations rarely change their course, and, therefore, should be careful at the outset. He hoped that the great elementary principles of political and moral justice would be consulted by the Americas, at the commencement of their diplomatic intercourse. The nations of America, he said, by acting as they ought to do, would have the honor of establishing three new systems—a system of free government, a system of free trade, and a system of honest, fair diplomacy. That, in justice to themselves, they ought to disabuse the reputation of Republics, by an abjuration of all diplomatic chicanery and treacherous overreachings. That each nation ought to do every thing within its power for the preservation and prosperity of all, and that none should strive to strengthen or enrich themselves at the expense of each other. That each ought to be left in the free enjoyment of all its natural advantages, and none be made the victims of clandestine treachery or odious extortion. That all advantages gained by false pretences or dexterous circumvention, would terminate in jealousy, and discord, and disruption. That it is the sacred duty of nations to preserve equality in treaties, and that the Americas are called upon, in an especial manner, to give the world examples of disinterested justice and magnanimous forbearance. That their prosperity and happiness would be best promoted by adopting a liberal policy, in which the various interests of all shall be equally consulted. That it was the peculiar good fortune of the nations of America to have the power of affording equal protection to the rights and interests of each other, without any violations of neutrality. That if, in making the experiment of social intercourse, any discrepancy of interest should be found, (a thing not probable,) each nation ought to yield something for the purpose of insuring general harmony and concord. That the United States ought to set the first example, by making the first and greatest sacrifice. That disinterested liberality on her part would find its equivalent in the generous confidence of her sister Republics.

He had great satisfaction in uttering these sentiments, because he knew that they were in unison with those of the most influential and enlightened statesmen of Colombia; and he believed, of all the nations of America. They ought, in his opinion, to have full weight in the proposed negotiations, because they were the strongest guarantees of perpetual friendship; the best equivalents for treaties; the surest pledges for the faith of nations; pledges, which the European system of diplomacy had never given, and could not give; equivalents, beyond the power or control of monopoly or domination.

If, said he, we consider this subject in reference to ourselves, and our relations, foreign and domestic, we shall find no solid reasons for delay. If we consult the great political and commercial interests of the Americans, we shall find inducements to hasten the acknowledgment. It is agreed, he said, that those nations are able to maintain their independence. That their means of defence are superior to any armament with which the mother country can assail them. That they exercise all the various powers of self-government, legislative, executive, and judicial; the powers of peace and war; of protection and defence. That they make and administer domestic laws, and regulate all intercourse with foreign nations, and enforce these regulations. In this situation we must either recognise them as free and independent, or put them in abeyance, by a denial of their rights, and thereby incur all the injuries which might justly be inflicted on our commerce with them. No nation has a right to ask another to do itself a voluntary injury—the laws of neutrality do not involve such dangerous and onerous consequences—Governments, like men, owe duties to each other, and a failure to perform them is often punished by national compunction, and forfeiture of reputation. The first duty of one people to another is, to declare who shall be respected as members of the great family of nations—the power, and the right to do so, exists in every government, no matter what may be its form. There is no other mode, save that of military force, by which the peace and harmony of nations can be kept in preservation. And shall the people of this continent forego the advantages of free and friendly intercourse, to indulge the mother country in her love of dominion? Shall we, as a nation, stifle all our sympathies in favor of free governments, to gratify the vain glorious pride of Spain? If we do, we shall betray the rights and interests of republics. Heaven, in giving freedom to us first, made it our primal eldest duty to go forth first, and acknowledge it in others. Honor and duty call alike upon us to perform the rightful obligation. The same Providence that gave us succor in the perils of our Revolutionary struggle, is conducting the other nations of America, through bloody wars, to peace and independence. Our approbation may inspire them with fresh confidence, and stimulate their love of liberty. If there are any who have fears that the proposed acknowledgment will produce a war with Spain, let them remember that Cuba is a hostage for her peace. The moment she fires a gun at us, we shall occupy that island, and her dominion over it will cease forever. And England, in aiding Spain, would only hasten the downfall of her favorite colonial system—a coalition between Colombia, Mexico, and the United States, would convince her of her folly. It would be better for us if our statesmen would look less eastward, and more southward than they do at present.

Some statesmen hold, he said, that nations, whose political principles and opinions have been formed in the school of despotism, must undergo long periods of probationary preparation, before they can be qualified to manage the affairs of self-government. This is but a modification of the exploded maxim, "that the people know not how to govern,"—that kings must save them from their worst enemies, themselves. Such opinions, if true, form no argument against the policy or justice of acknowledging the nations of America. If true, in former ages, and on the old continent, they are more than doubtful in modern times, and in the new hemisphere. The fact is, that the present and past ages are alike in nothing. The whole civilized world is under the dominion of a different mind. Men and nations are shaking off their mental imbecilities, and preparing themselves to regulate their own affairs. It was necessary that moral regeneration should precede political reform; and thus it has happened. A great moral revolution has occurred, and is occurring. The spirit of the age is busy—reformation is every where at work, and upon all subjects. We see the beginning, not the end of revolutions. No statesman, no nation, should mistake the character and fashion of the times. Every thing, in fifty years, has changed, and every thing is changing. "Nothing of the future will resemble what is past." We live in the crisis of all ages. The whole civilized world is laboring in a crisis—a great moral crisis—a great political crisis—a great commercial crisis. Nations have changed their moral characters, and political opinions, and Governments must change their form and purpose. Formerly, the sword was umpire of the world; and then the maxim grew, that nations were incapable of self-command. Now, public opinion is the great chancellor of nations. All tongues and kindreds own its jurisdiction, and kings and subjects are submissive to its rule; none dare oppose its high authority—none with impunity resist its just decrees. Wars were fought formerly, for families, and dynasties; for the rights of thrones, and prerogatives of crowns; and then, the people were assuredly their own worst enemies. Now, men fight for written constitutions; for the rights of man and prerogatives of nations; and fighting, learn to govern for themselves. The contest now is not between dynasties and diadems, but between creeds, and principles, and institutions. Nations formerly had no volition; kings thought and acted for them, rudely pretending, that their subjects had no capacity for affairs of State. But now, the will of nations has supremacy of rank, and speaks by delegation in assembled Congresses; and now, we find more talent—more patriotic feeling—more public virtue—more every thing, that strengthens and improves the social system. Time was, when kings held power by arrogation, and used it at their pleasure and discretion; and then the people were denounced as “a many-headed monster.” The people now reclaim all power as inherent in themselves, and delegate it only as a trust; and now nations are more peaceful, more prosperous, more happy, and more just, than formerly. History speaks only of alliances, or wars, between contemporary despots—now, nothing is talked of but Congresses, and Constitutions, and Representative Governments; and do we find things changing for the worse? The spirit of the age is, peace and moderation. It is the spirit of free government and written constitutions. Its conservative principles are—wide-spread knowledge, equality of rights, freedom of opinion, and frequent and free elections. The spirit of past ages, was war and domination. The trade of man, of all the sons of men, was war—from the first conqueror down to ’76. It was the storm of empires. It raged unspent and unabated. It swept along the field of time, and all was desolation that was left. It had no limits but the margin of the world. Its stream of blood flowed on from age to age; its sources, like the Nile, unknown, lost in the desert of forgotten years; but still, the stream rolled on, increasing with a thousand tributary torrents, and spreading far and wide its overwhelming floods. Such was the history, he said, of past times, and of the olden world. Our continent, on the contrary, is the chosen land of liberty—vineyard of the God of peace; and we, its husbandmen, selected by the unseen will of Providence to till the soil, and feed the famished nations with the food of independence. Let us perform the sacred trust impartially. It is our duty, as a free people, not to sanction, but refute the heresies, that nations are incapable of managing their own concerns. They have disabused themselves by illustrious examples, and we should be careful not to weaken their effect.

It was the will of Providence, he said, that this continent should be the arena of successive revolutions—of moral, and political, and commercial revolutions—the theatre of man’s political regeneration—the hemisphere in which nations should be reinstated in their rights, and reinvested of their “long lost liberty.” On the 4th of July, 1776, the Congress of the thirteen States declared their independence. On this day, (28th March, 1822,) the assembled Congress of the Union will announce the independence of all the Nations of America. These are glorious epochs. Let history commemorate them as co-essential in the works of reformation. Freemen are this day called upon to fraternize with freemen; nations to fraternize with nations. All the Americas are summoned to embrace as friends and equals, and make a lasting covenant of peace. It is not the flight of a false prophet, or the foundation of a city; the birth-day of a petty chieftain, or an heir apparent, that we are assembled here to celebrate. No; a continent has disenchained itself, and stands unfettered and erect. It is the birth-day of a hemisphere redeemed. It is the jubilee of nations. Let the world rejoice.

If experience and long-suffering can create the faculties of self-government, then the people of America are prepared to manage and control their own affairs. For three long centuries they “clanked the chains” of lawless power; for three long lingering ages they felt the “keen lash” and galling yoke of despotism—each generation leaving its manacles to posterity as their only heritage. Continued agonies had worn away the memory of better times. The light of hope had left the Children of the Sun, and dark despair, like soporific drugs, had stupified the powers of will and faculties of life. They slept to mitigate their pain; for nations sleep and never die. But the day of their deliverance was at hand. The Spirit of God was abroad in the sky. It called, and the slumbering nations awoke. It breathed the electric fire of freedom on the air, and a whole Continent ran simultaneously to arms! One great, one god-like purpose, animated all—it was death or independence! Like us, they pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, to live as freemen, or die in its defence. They fought from field to field. A thousand battles left the cause in doubt; a thousand passions mingled in the fray; and all that history has told of savage cruelty, ferocious vengeance, rapine, plunder, treachery, cold-blooded massacre, and every violence and every crime that shocks humanity, was perpetrated over and over again upon all ages, sexes, and conditions. But the God of Battles fought on freedom’s side, and, sickening at the scene of carnage and of desolation, and hastening to end it, he took a Bolívar and consecrated him a Washington, and putting in his hand a flaming sword, commanded him to go forth to the uttermost ends of the Continent, conquering and to conquer, until oppression should surcease, and man learn tyranny no more. And behold the work is finished, and Colombia is free, and all the Americas are free—free as ourselves; for there all power is acknowledged in the people, and vassalage abolished and unknown; for there all officers are elective, and held by the tenure of the law and the constitution; for there, free in their property, their persons, and religion—

“They own no Lord but him in heaven,
No power but what consent has given.”

This, said he, is not more true of ourselves than it is of the people of Colombia; and to refuse an acknowledgment of them would be idle and preposterous. They have maintained their independence through a lingering war of eleven years—sinking, we all know, in its first stages, under a pressure of adverse fortune, that left the friends of freedom no comforter but hope, and rising afterwards with a tide of prosperity that left the enemies of liberty nothing but despair. It was a war of freedom against foreign domination; and the people that waged it saw all the vicissitudes and encountered all the calamities incident to civil wars and revolutions. But the long agony is over, and the struggle has terminated in the most complete success. Their fortitude and patience in the long and doubtful conflict were equal to their suffering and privation, and victory was the reward of valor and firmness. In war their measure of renown is full, and history will commemorate the glory of their deeds in arms. In peace they manifest the civil virtues of free Governments—temperance, justice, economy, moderation. Their wisdom is conspicuous in the annals of their policy.

But experience is an able teacher; the chronicles of the times are filled with useful lessons, civil and political, and Colombia has graduated in a school of blood. Her institutions are regulated by the spirit of the age, and accord with the established system of the new hemisphere. She has adopted a constitution of which ours is the prototype; she has formed a federation, over which a second Washington presides, to wield its destinies. The consanguinity of this Union, and that Republic, is established beyond a doubt. Her face, her figure, and her conformation, show the line of her descent. The parity is manifest, the consimilitude complete and obvious. She is a rib taken from our side in a deep sleep, and given to us for a helpmate. When shall we awake from our slumber, and salute her as the fairest among the fair, as the loveliest among thousands? How long shall cold delays and bloodless caution interdict consent, and sever hearts that hasten to unite? Let us this day awake ourselves, and celebrate the rights of nations. Let us this day unfold our arms, and consummate the union of Republics. We interchange Ministers with European Powers as a thing of course. We speak, and are spoken to, by Kings and Emperors. What they say, we listen to as the music of many harps; what they give us, we roll under our tongues as sweet morsels; but this Republic, bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, is excluded from the communion table of acknowledged nations. We are deaf when she speaks to us, and dumb when she asks for an answer. If there is light in our countenance, why should we hide it? And wherefore do we turn away from her, as an offended person? The time has gone by, when we might have consoled with her, and softened her sufferings with the witchery of kindred sympathies. The time has come, when we are bound, by all that is just among men, and magnanimous among nations, to acknowledge her independence; he believed it, as he hoped for salvation in the blood of a Redeemer. That people, said he, have dissolved the political bands which united them to Spain; they have assumed among the Powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them; and a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that we should acknowledge their independence; a decent regard to the memory of our Revolutionary sires makes it an imperious duty. "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, Governments were instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right, it is the duty, of the people, to alter, or abolish it, and institute new forms." And who were the men that first proclaimed these godlike truths to an astonished, but admiring world? Our fathers. Who swore unto each other to establish them, or die in their defence? Our fathers; who pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, upon the desperate, but glorious hazard. And shall we, their immediate offspring, turn recreant in the cause, and treacherously deny ourselves and them, as Peter did the Saviour of mankind? Shall the last of the Revolutionary heroes leave the high station which he fills, without officiating, in his robes of office, at the baptism of this young Republic, and of all the new Republics in America? Shall the nation first free be the last to acknowledge it in others? No! Let us boldly fill up our page of destiny, and leave no blank for after-time to write an execration of our memory. Let us make the acknowledgment at once, and do it gallantly as men—as freemen—as gods, if it were possible, and laugh the fear of despots into scorn. Suppose a change of cases: suppose these people had yielded to the importunities of European Powers, and made Kings to reign over them, and constituted family successions: Would the crowned heads of Europe have invited us to co-operate in their recognitions? Would they, from courtesy, ask our consent or delay through fear of our resentment? No! Not one moment. They would hasten to kill the fattened calf, and dish up the gorgeous feast. They would fill their bowls brimfull, and quaff it merrily; their joy would have no end; they would

"Sing, and dance, and shout, and sing,
And make the heavenly arches ring," with their imperial acclamations. Ay, sir, and toast it too. Fill full your goblets. "Let the trumpets speak to the earth, the cannon to the heavens," the allies drink to Bolivar the First. And shall we ignominiously refuse to glorify the nativity of Republics? We can refuse—we may refuse. But mark—there is a power that will command us to our duty. A power that speaks and is obeyed; a power that is omnipotent in the affairs of nations; the power of public opinion. Let us beware of the reaction of that power; it is the great Jupiter of the age, and statesmen, obedient, tremble when it speaks. That power has spoken in the Patriot cause. In the cause of all the nations of America.

"Hear its decree, and reverence what you hear;
Who yields not recognition, nor wills to yield,
Back from our sight, with shame he shall be driven;
Gash'd with dishonest wounds, the scorn of Heaven."

The scorn of men and patriots, as well as Heaven.

When Mr. TRIMBLE had concluded—

H. OF R.

South American Governments.

MARCH, 1822.

Mr. POINSETT addressed the Chair as follows :

I shall offer, said Mr. P., no apology to the Committee for addressing them on this occasion. I have resided so long in the countries we are now called upon to place in the rank of nations—am so intimately acquainted with the causes and character of the revolution they have undergone, that I feel it to be my duty to convey to the Committee, as briefly as I can, the information I possess on this subject.

Sir, if ever there was an occasion that justified a revolution, that called upon a people to recur to first principles, and to seek relief from the abuse of power, by an appeal to arms, this was one. The revolution of the Spanish colonies did not arise from a mere question of abstract right, but from actual suffering and grievous oppression; from causes radical and certain, though gradual in their operations; causes that would have inevitably produced the revolution without the violent crisis to which the mother country was exposed, and which only accelerated that event. It was felt in their Government, in the administration of justice, in their agriculture, in their commerce, and in their pursuits of happiness. Governed by Viceroy responsible in name, but, in fact, as arbitrary as the King of Spain himself, who commanded, not only the military Governors and intendants of provinces, but presided over the tribunals of justice, and let any one imagine what government the miserable colonist must have enjoyed under European Spaniards vested with such powers, and who had nothing to dread but an examination of their conduct before a tribunal, two thousand leagues from the theatre of their injustice. The colonist could not even enjoy the natural advantages by which he was surrounded.

The eyes of a jealous and suspicious Government constantly watched the progress of his industry. No sooner did a settlement betray symptoms of prosperity, than it became the subject of oppressive legislation, and was overwhelmed by a swarm of officers, who, like locusts, destroyed the fair prospects of the harvest. The trade was not only confined to certain specified articles, but to a few favored towns. Rich as these favored regions are, and capable of bringing forth the productions of every climate, possessing great facilities of internal and of foreign commerce, they were reduced to indolence and penury by absurd and oppressive restrictions on their industry, on their trade, and on their private enjoyments. Without a market for their produce, it rotted on the ground. I have seen the most fertile districts of that fine country barren and desolate—I have seen the inhabitants, surrounded by all the bounties of nature, destitute of the ordinary comforts of civilized society. To those who have followed the progress of this revolution, and compared it with our own, the difference must appear striking, and from the civil dissensions that have agitated those countries, it has been argued by some that the Spanish Creoles were incapable of enjoying the blessings of liberty—were unfit for self-government. In making this comparison between the two countries, it ought never to be forgotten that our civil and political institutions, our habits, our customs, our laws, our rights of property, scarcely suffered any alteration by the transition from a colonial to an independent state. The principles of free government, republican principles, had deep root in this country before our Revolution; and if they have grown with our growth, and strengthened with our strength, they were as well understood then as now. The Spanish colonies had never been intrusted, as we had, with any part of the internal administration, and were ignorant and unpractised in government. The means of education, I mean of a liberal and enlightened education, were withheld from the Creole; printing presses were to be found only in a few of the larger cities, where, under a rigid inspection, a gazette and an almanac were permitted to be published. The policy of Spain repressed the advancement of knowledge in her colonies—ignorance and superstition were the powerful means employed to keep them in subjection. The despot is aware that those who possess knowledge will struggle for freedom, and will achieve it; for knowledge is power. Dread of religious toleration, and of what was worse, of spoliation, excited the clergy to oppose the revolution. The influence they exercised over the minds of the people was unbounded; and, had not a few virtuous, well-enlightened priests espoused the cause of liberty, the colonies would still have been dependent. The aristocracy formed another and a powerful obstacle to the progress of this revolution—a class that abhor every constitution founded on an equality of rights—a class that would rather be deprived of those rights than see all participate in them; that prefer any state of suffering rather than see power exercised by their inferiors. I speak now of the mass of the titled men in the colonies. Some few were distinguished for their zeal in the cause of independence.

Another and very essential difference between the two countries, consisted in the number of Europeans, who had distinct privileges from the Creoles, for oppression did not there fall equally on all. They were, to be sure, the smaller party, but the wealth and power they possessed, their union, their influence, the habitual respect in which they were held, their ideas of their own superiority, rendered them a very formidable body. They were aware that their proud pretensions had roused against them a feeling of indignation; that the oppressive measures they had promoted against the interests of the land, had produced hatred and an eager thirst for revenge; and common interest and common danger united them against the Creoles. They could not suppress the revolution, but they retarded its progress, and procrastinated the contest. If, therefore, we regard the little advancement of these countries, their ignorance of the principles of government, their civil dissensions, and the procrastinated struggle for liberty after all opposition had ceased on the part of Spain, it impresses us more strongly with the urgent necessity that existed of shaking off the colonial Government. It was the Government that placed obstructions in the way of agriculture and commerce. It was the Government, that, forgetful of its primary obligations, suffered, nay, encouraged the daily violation of the rights and properties of its subjects. It was the Government, in short, that sought to keep the people in the profoundest ignorance, as the means of keeping them in subjection. A revolution proceeding from such causes, was not to be prevented by empty declarations of abstract rights, such as were made by the mother country when struggling for her own existence. The decrees of the different Governments established in Spain during that period, were magnificent in promise. The colonies were told they had the same rights as the mother country, but were treated as if they had none. They were deluded with hopes that were never realized, and were mocked with the semblance of a representation. Deputies assigned them, not elected by them. At no time was there more peculation, violence, and oppression, than during the interval between the invasion of Spain and the insurrection of the colonies. These causes operated alike on all, and the revolution commenced without previous concert, almost at the same moment in every part of this vast continent. It has triumphed not only over the opposition of the mother country, but over civil dissensions, and the storms of party. In Caraccas, where the revolution first commenced, its success was retarded by one of the most awful events recorded in history. The city was almost entirely destroyed by an earthquake, on the anniversary of their revolutionary movement. The clergy availed themselves of this event, and, assisted by the superstition of the people, re-established, for a short time, the royal authority. The brave and patriotic Bolivar kept up the spirit of the revolution. His active exertions renewed the struggle for liberty; and his zeal and perseverance restored his country to freedom. By his conduct and valor, the most formidable armament ever sent across the Atlantic, has been destroyed. His efforts have united Caraccas and New Granada into one Republic, and he has spread the principles of independence and of free government to the shores of the Pacific.

Buenos Ayres has triumphed over the repeated and formidable efforts of the mother country to subdue them. They have had, besides, to contend against a powerful party of royalists in the interior provinces. The wealthy creoles of that country could not be easily roused to take an active part in a contest, the issue of which was uncertain. No doubt they preferred a national government, and freedom of commerce, but that was not strong enough to vanquish their love of repose and indolent habits; to urge them, in short, to long and painful sacrifices. The royalists are still in possession of some of the finest provinces of La Plata. The interior provinces of the vice royalty of Lima are still in the hands of the royalists; were, I should have said, for it is reasonable to expect that the example of the capital will be followed by the provinces. Chili, agitated for some time by civil dissensions, and overrun by the army of the royalists, has at length established tranquillity at home; and not only driven out the invaders, but carried the war successfully into their stronghold. The revolution in Lima is due to the efforts of this brave people. Mexico, where the revolution commenced at an early period, and where, after a desperate struggle, it appeared to be quelled, is now independent. The spirit of the revolution continued to exist among the people. Hidalgo, and the gallant men who fell in the first revolutionary movement, did not perish in vain.

To prove the utter inability of Spain to recover possession of these countries, it is only necessary to take a view of their vast extent, of their population and resources, and to compare them with those of Spain, agitated as she now is, by intestine commotions, and, for many years past, regarded as the country of Europe the most destitute of industry, of commerce, and of enterprise. The mere recital of the names which distinguish the Spanish colonies in America, extending over 79 degrees of latitude, with a space of at least 1900 leagues, interposed between its most distant settlements; the vast extent of their mountains, their magnificent rivers, the varied productions of the soil, the riches of their mines, impress us at once with the magnitude of their resources. Buenos Ayres, comprising the finest provinces of Peru, the rich mines of Potosi, and the fertile province of Cochabamba, with a population of one million and a half; coining annually upwards of five millions of dollars, exporting ten millions, and importing about the same amount. Chili, the garden of the world, possessing the most fertile soil, productive of all the fruits of Europe and of the tropics, equally rich in the precious and in the useful metals, with a population of more than one million, coining three millions of dollars annually, exporting four millions, and importing more than three millions. Lima, I mean the Vice Royalty of Lima, including Cusco, the ancient capital of the Incas, with a population of 1,200,000 souls, coining annually five millions of dollars, importing ten millions, and exporting thirteen millions. New Granada, containing not less than two millions of inhabitants, with a trade of more than six millions of imports, coining annually three millions of dollars. Caraccas, with a million of inhabitants, and about the same resources as New Granada. These two countries have since been united under one Government, the Republic of Colombia. Guatemala, the country which comprises Costa Rica, and Nicaragua, and bounds on New Granada, a fertile and well cultivated country, containing one million and a half of souls. New Spain, or Mexico, contained in 1808, a population of five millions, nine hundred thousand, a population not likely to have been diminished since that period. Coining at that time twenty-three millions of dollars annually, importing twenty millions, and exporting between twenty and thirty millions. The detached Governments, contained nearly a million of inhabitants, making an aggregate of fifteen millions.

I will not detain the Committee by going into an examination of the resources of each particular State. It will be sufficient for my purposes to particularize those of Mexico. The whole annual agricultural product of Mexico was estimated at twenty-nine millions of dollars. The annual product of the precious metals at twenty-three millions; the annual product of the manufactures at eight millions; the exports at twenty-two millions; the imports at twenty millions; the revenue of Mexico, for customs and taxes, amounted to not less than twenty millions.

If, says Baron Humboldt, the political strength of a nation depended only upon the extent of country, and number of inhabitants, New Spain might rank with the United States. Such was the state of these countries under all the disadvantages of the colonial system, for I have purposely taken the statement previous to the revolution. Thus we see that the total population of the Spanish colonies exceeded fifteen millions; the imports were never less than sixty millions, and the exports seventy.

The estimated population of those countries is more likely to fall short of the truth, than to exceed it. The census was taken for the purposes of taxation, which induced the inhabitants to conceal their real numbers. And here let me remark, that this population is more effective, and the proportion of whites greater than has been generally supposed. The most favorable statement ever published of the population of Spain, previous to the late wars, made it amount to 10,409,879. A population much thinned by wars, and pestilence, and famine, within the last ten years. The exports of Spain amounted to about sixteen millions of dollars, and the imports to between fourteen and fifteen millions. Let me ask then, whether it is probable that Spain, with not quite two-thirds the population, with inferior resources at all times, and those much diminished by this defection, can reconquer countries at a distance, some of them of two thousand leagues, and none less than one thousand? The history of Spain herself is an answer to this question. With a courage and energy that a determination to be free alone could give, Spain repelled the hosts of France that invaded her territory; weak in numbers and resources when compared to France, they successfully resisted the utmost efforts of that Power to subdue them. One word, sir, on this subject. It is too much our custom to speak contemptuously of this brave and high-minded people; they were long bowed down by an iron despotism. But other days have dawned on that fair country; after resisting with unexampled resolution, foreign usurpation, they have resolved to be free. Their sufferings from the vices and defects of long servitude, ought to excite our sympathies, and their efforts to establish free and liberal institutions, entitle them to our respect.

It has been supposed by some, that the independence of these colonies would injure the prosperity of the United States; possessing a more fertile soil, and raising the same productions, they would drive us from the markets of Europe. It has been said that colonies are safer neighbors than free States, and that so long as they were bound down by the oppressive restrictions of Spain, they would neither be dangerous rivals nor formidable competitors. It is unwise, therefore, in us to offer them any encouragement. Not only the best feelings of the heart revolt at such a conclusion, but it is manifestly false; it is our interest that they should be free. With an extensive line of coast, with numerous navigable rivers, facilitating their internal trade, with a population of more than fifteen millions, almost without manufactures, with a demand for one hundred millions of dollars, and without the means of carrying on their foreign commerce, these countries present a market for the skill and industry of our merchants, which promises the greatest advantages. Let any one look back and observe how the demand has every where increased with the increasing produce.

The wars and revolutions which have lately afflicted Europe, are known now only by their beneficial effects. Effects to be seen in the amelioration and extension of their agriculture, in the increase of their towns and villages, in the augmentation of manufactures, in the benefits of education, the desire of freedom, and in the general welfare and prosperity of the country. It is impossible to pass through any part of Europe, at present, without being struck with the improved condition of the people. An improvement which, as it advances, will augment the demand for all the productions of the West. The intercourse of the provinces of Spanish America with these countries, will augment their means of information, and will enlighten them on the subject of government, on public welfare and private happiness. With the increase of knowledge, will arise free and well-organized institutions, the refinements and various wants of civilization. This cannot fail to produce a demand for all the manufactures of this country, and for all the objects of trade. I had intended to have entered, fully, into the importance of our political relations with these countries. I fear, however, that I should exhaust the patience of the Committee were I to attempt it; and I feel that I should exhaust my own strength. I am compelled, therefore, however reluctantly, to waive this part of the subject. The question for the consideration of the Committee is, whether we shall now adopt a measure called for by every motive of feeling and of policy, at a moment when it may give us weight and influence in those countries; a measure by which we shall at once assume the station that becomes our character, among the great Republics of this hemisphere; or whether we shall wait the slow and unwilling consent of Spain, or the uncertain policy of the other Powers of Europe.

The latter have refused to co-operate with us. It does not accord with their avowed principles to countenance any resistance against the abuse of power, however flagrant and unjust. In all ages, Spain has been slow to acknowledge the independence of those countries which have been driven to rebellion by her oppression. It is not probable that she will pursue a different policy with regard to her colonies in America. In this particular, and in this alone, I differ from the report now under consideration. It proves incontrovertibly the right and the expediency of adopting the measure recommended by these resolutions.

MARCH, 1822.

South American Governments.

H. OF R.

It is a clear and convincing argument, highly honorable to the committee, and, as I entertain great deference for their opinion, it is with reluctance I differ with them in this particular. The committee think it manifest, from the report of the Committee of the Cortes, "that Spain had 'not only renounced the feelings of an enemy towards the colonies, but had been prepared, a year ago, to consent to their independence, but for 'particular occurrences.' They are led to this conclusion from the terms in which the committee speak of "the measure demanded by the crisis, as 'one indicative of a new and glorious resolution ; that it was demanded by America and by the 'true interests of the Peninsula ; that, from it 'Spain might reap advantages, which otherwise 'she could never expect ; and that the ties of kindred and the uniformity of religion, with commercial relations and those emanating from free institutions, would be the surest pledge of mutual 'harmony and close union."

I agree with the committee, "that no measure short of a full recognition of unconditional independence could have deserved the character nor been capable of producing the effects ascribed to it." But, sir, what say the documents on your table? The American deputies, disappointed in their expectations, presented propositions, in substance, Mr. Brent tells us the same as those that at first met the approbation of ministers, and which would have been adopted, but for particular occurrences. These propositions contain no demand for an acknowledgment of independence; but merely for permission to establish an internal administration, dependent upon the mother country, freedom of commerce and equal rights with European Spaniards. This was, in substance, the measure first proposed by the committee of Cortes, and which was subsequently rejected by the king, "as a violation of the Constitution ; that public opinion was not prepared for it, that it was against the interests of Spain and of America." Something less favorable must be intended by the king, when he says that "his Government, urged by the Cortes, to propose the measures they may think most proper for their welfare, or a consideration of the state of these countries, they will do so immediately, and with the utmost generosity." No, sir. The recognition of the independence of the Spanish colonies would be opposed both by the interests and by the prejudices of the Spanish nation. Independently of the revenue derived by the Crown from those countries—a revenue of more than eight millions of dollars—the patronage they afforded was immense. Places in Spanish America were the reward of services and the means of corruption. The aristocracy, who profited by those places, and who regarded them as the means of maintaining their splendid establishments in Europe, will abandon, with reluctance, the prospect of wealth America presented. The clergy will exert their influence to prevent it. America was to them a source of ambition and of profit. The possession of America extended their spiritual dominion and augmented their temporal wealth. The merchants, who, by a code of laws framed in the spirit of restriction and oppression, monopolized the trade of the colonies, will oppose their recognition ; and the people generally will not consent to relinquish, without a desperate struggle, the dominion over the colonies, connected, as it is, with their most pleasing recollections of national honor and glory.

It is in vain to say that they are really independent. The Spaniards will not abandon all hope of recovering possession of them until they are recognised by the Powers of Europe. It is well known that there are many of the former inhabitants of St. Domingo, now in France, who still cherish the hope of being restored to their estates in that island.

These motives will operate powerfully upon the Spanish nation, and, it is to be feared, will not only prevent their recognition of the independence of these countries, but lead them to view this measure, on our part, as an unfriendly, perhaps as a hostile act. They certainly have no right to do so according to the laws and usages of nations. But the resentment of wounded pride is not always restrained by considerations of national law.

But, sir, this risk, even if it were less remote, ought not to deter us from adopting the resolutions on your table. It is a measure called for both by justice and policy. The conduct of the Government, in relation to this contest, has given the best evidence of our respect for the rights of Spain. So long as that nation made an effort to recover her dominion over her colonies, the United States abstained from recognising their independence. But now, when all opposition has ceased on the part of Spain ; now that those countries are free from the intestine commotions which divided them into factions, and rendered it difficult to distinguish which was the legitimate government, it would be unjust to withhold it.

I hope, therefore, the Committee will adopt the resolutions now under consideration. It is due to the rights of the free and independent Governments that expect it at our hands, and due to our own character and station.

Mr. RHEA and Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, delivered their sentiments, generally in favor of the propositions before the House.

The Committee then rose, and reported to the House their agreement to these resolutions.

The question being about to be put on agreeing to the first resolution—

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, objected to the phraseology of the resolution, and proposed to substitute the word "nations" for "provinces," where it occurs.

Some other member mentioned the word "Governments" as proper, and Mr. TUCKER so varied his motion.

Mr. RUSSELL had no particular partiality, he said, for the phraseology of the resolution, but he objected to the word "Governments," because, according to our system, the word "Government" is different in meaning from the word "nation." He would not himself acknowledge any nation to have a free and independent government which is not a government of the people.

Proceedings.

MARCH, 1822.

After some further conversation, in which Messrs. WOOD, WRIGHT, RHEA, TUCKER, and H. NELSON, bore part, Mr. TUCKER varied his motion so as to make the resolve read, "the late American provinces of Spain;" which amendment was agreed to.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on agreeing to the said first resolution; and the yeas and nays thereupon stood—yeas 167, nays 1, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Archer, Baldwin, Ball, Barber of Connecticut, Barber of Ohio, Bassett, Baylies, Bayly, Bigelow, Blackledge, Blair, Borland, Breckenridge, Brown, Buchanan, Burrows, Burton, Butler, Cambreleng, Campbell of New York, Campbell of Ohio, Cannon, Cassedy, Chambers, Cocke, Colden, Condict, Conkling, Conner, Cook, Crafts, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dane, Darlington, Denison, Dickinson, Durfee, Dwight, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Edwards of North Carolina, Eustis, Farrelly, Findlay, Fuller, Gebhard, Gilmer, Gist, Gross, Hall, Harvey, Hawks, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hill, Hobart, Holcombe, Hooks, Jackson, F. NAY—Mr. Garnett.

So the first resolve passed unanimously, with the exception of a single vote.

The second resolution being under consideration—Mr. CHAMBERS wished that some gentleman who was conversant with the views of the committee, in relation to the subject, would explain the reasons for the particular sum that had been reported. For himself, he was not entirely prepared to say what sum ought to be appropriated.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, proposed to modify the resolution so as to leave it optional with the Committee of Ways and Means to report a specific bill, or to include the amount in a general appropriation.

The motion was opposed by Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, and Mr. TRIMBLE, who were unwilling to alter the resolution as recommended by the committee, and preferred that this should be disconnected from any other appropriation.

Mr. SMITH remarked that his only view in making the motion, was to get at the object of the friends of the measure more readily than could perhaps be done, by a special bill for this purpose. But, in conformity with the wishes that had been expressed, he withdrew the motion.

The question was then put upon the second resolution, and carried unanimously.

And then, on motion of Mr. H. NELSON, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 29.

As soon as the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read—

Mr. EUSTIS addressed the Chair and stated that he was necessarily absent yesterday when the vote was taken on the resolution relative to the recognition of the independence of the late provinces of Spain in South America, and that he wished to record his vote thereon.

On this proposition the unanimous consent of the House was required, to dispense with the rule which provides that no member shall be entitled to vote on any question who was not within the bar of the House when his name was called; and some conversation took place on the expediency of granting the leave asked for—in the course of which,

Mr. TAYLOR quoted the case of the Declaration of American Independence, to which were affixed the names of several members who were not present when the same was agreed to, but came in afterwards and were allowed to subscribe it. The case now before the House, if not analogous, was as little likely to be drawn into precedent as that.

Mr. COCKE quoted the case which occurred yesterday—in which, a member coming in after his name had been called, was yet allowed by unanimous consent to record his vote as though he had been present. On this occasion, Mr. C. contended, the same liberality ought to be extended to all who were absent.

These considerations prevailed with the House, and, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. EUSTIS, and Messrs. REID, DICKINSON, MATLACK, McDUFFIE, NEW, SCOTT, and EDDY, for similar reasons, and they severally voted in the affirmative, when the vote was declared to be—yeas 167, nay 1.

Mr. WRIGHT requested a similar liberty to Mr. REED, of Maryland, who was necessarily detained by sickness, but it was decided by the Chair to be impossible to grant such liberty to a member not present.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Benjamin Stephenson; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Two Messages, received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES yesterday, were read as follows, viz:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit the original reports on the subject of the fortifications on Dauphin Island and Mobile Point, being those on which the works were undertaken, and have been in part executed. The doubt expressed as to the propriety of the publication is applicable to this document, which would have accompanied the Message of the 26th, had it been prepared in time.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 28, 1822.

The Message and report were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 1st instant, requesting "the President to communicate such information as he may possess relative to any private claim against the piece of land in the Delaware river, known by the name of the Pea Patch, and to state, if any, and what, process has been instituted in behalf of such claim," I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of War, furnishing the information required.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 8, 1822.

The Message and report were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting sundry statements in relation to the receipts and expenditure of the Government, and of appropriations, and unexpended balances of appropriations, at sundry periods, as called for by the resolution of this House, on the 13th ultimo; which letter and statements were ordered to lie on the table.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of William E. Meek, and on the bill for the relief of Cornelius Huson, which were respectively reported to the House without amendment; and the bills were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

GRADUAL INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

Mr. McLANE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, who were instructed, by resolution, "to inquire into the expediency of modifying the act, entitled 'An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States,' so as to require a part of the annual appropriation to be expended in the construction of vessels of an inferior force to those now authorized by said law to be built," made a report thereon; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLANE, from the same committee, also reported a bill to fix and render permanent the Naval Peace Establishment of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The report is as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th instant, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of modifying the act, entitled "An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States," so as to require a part of the annual appropriation to be expended in the construction of vessels of an inferior force to those now authorized by said law to be built," make the following report:

That, by the act above referred to, passed the 29th April, 1816, the sum of one million of dollars per annum was appropriated for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States; and the President of the United States was authorized to cause to be built nine ships, to rate not less than 74 guns each; and twelve ships, to rate not less than 44 guns each, including one 74 and three 44 gun ships, authorized by a previous law. The President was also authorized to procure steam engines and all the imperishable materials necessary for building and equipping three steam batteries; and by the 4th section of the act, it was provided that "the moneys appropriated by this act shall not be transferred to any other object of expenditure." By the act of 3d March, 1821, instead of the appropriation contained in the original act, the sum of $500,000 per annum, for six years, was appropriated to carry into effect the purposes of the said act; and that the whole of this sum will be required to complete the objects contemplated by these acts. That, pursuant to the instructions and objects of these laws, there has been built and equipt one ship-of-the-line, viz: the Columbus; and that there has been built and launched three ships-of-the-line, viz: the Ohio, the North Carolina, and the Delaware, and one frigate at Washington, the Potomac; that there is now on the stocks, built and ready to launch, one ship-of-the-line at Boston—that there are now on the stocks, nearly finished, one ship-of-the-line at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, one frigate at Philadelphia, and one frigate at New York—that there is on the stocks, about half finished, one ship-of-the-line at Gosport, Virginia—that preparations have, for some time past, been making, for putting on the stocks one ship-of-the-line at Boston, one frigate at New York, one frigate at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, and one frigate at Washington; and that the frames, and nearly all the timber, and other materials have been provided for building one ship-of-the-line at Philadelphia, one frigate at Washington, one frigate at Boston, and one frigate at Norfolk—that the live oak frames, and nearly all the other timber, and two steam engines, have been provided for two steam batteries at New York, and one steam battery at Washington. The committee further report that the articles on hand, and those contracted for, could not be advantageously applied to the building of vessels of a smaller class than those for which they were provided and designed. "The frames of our ships-of-the-line are all got to moulds; each particular piece has its appropriate place in the frame," and the labor of reducing them to a size suitable to smaller vessels would be nearly, if not quite, equal to the expense of a new frame. The copper provided, too, is generally heavier than is used for sloops of war.

In the opinion of the committee, the frames being cut to moulds, which, being the cheaper and better plan, the commissioners of the Navy, with a due regard to the before recited acts, were authorized to direct, there would be great risk of losing them entirely, by their warping out of place, if they are not put together.

The committee are of opinion, also, that the funds appropriated for the gradual increase of the Navy, cannot be diverted to any other objects, consistently with good faith, or the real interests of the nation.

The policy was adopted upon great consideration, and with a view to the defence of our seacoast, and in a well founded conviction that it was wise and prudent gradually to increase our naval force in time of peace, and to render it efficient in the exigencies to which the country must be always more or less exposed. It is believed that the best defence for this country, and that on which it must principally rely, not only for the protection of our commerce, but to prevent the actual invasion of the soil, is the naval force. The act for the gradual increase of the Navy was founded on this presumption, and designed by gradual means, in a manner least oppressive to the country, to lay the foundation of an efficient naval power, and to prepare, in time of peace, that description of force, which could not be easily raised up in time of war, but which would be indispensable in such a crisis. It requires much time and great care to prepare the materials, and construct the vessels of the class provided for in the acts, and the experience of the late war has fully demonstrated the necessity of such a force; by teaching us the facility with which the enemy could blockade a large portion of our coast with a single ship-of-the-line.

The committee are of opinion that it would be unwise to change this system, founded upon so many important considerations, without some urgent necessity, and in their opinion none such exists; on the contrary, there seems to be even stronger reasons for adhering to the policy, and cherishing the growth of our naval power, now that foreign nations are modeling their naval architecture after our improvements, and at a moment when our foreign relations are about to be extended, upon a scale which should, at least, admonish us against any diminution of, or an indifference to the means of national defence.

The committee are aware of the importance of sloops of war, as a class of naval force, indispensable both in time of peace and war; but they are a class which may be provided in a shorter time, and with considerable advantage, even after the exigency has arisen, and, though they would be useful in time of peace for many services, and especially for the discipline of our officers, and the more effectual suppression of the piratical marauders upon our commerce, the committee believe it would be unwise to break in upon the fund for the gradual increase of the Navy, even for such objects; and, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to modify the act, entitled "An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States," so as to require a part of the annual appropriation to be expended in the construction of vessels of an inferior force to those now authorized by the said law to be built.

INSPECTION OF LAND OFFICES.

Mr. McLANE, from a select committee, delivered in the following report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

The committee, to whom was referred the several communications from the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 28th of January, and 18th of February, 1822, in obedience to several resolutions of the House of Representatives of the 4th of January, and — February, 1822, respecting the manner in which the several land offices have been examined, by whom examined, and the moneys paid for such examination, &c.; having examined the subject submitted to them with great deliberation, make the following report:

That, by the laws of the United States, it is made "the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause, at least once every year, the books of the officers of the land offices to be examined, and the balance of public moneys in the hands of the several receivers of public moneys of the said offices to be ascertained." That, previous to the year 1816, this examination had been made by persons residing in the vicinity of the respective offices; but, in progress of time, the augmentation in the receipts of these offices rendered more information necessary, and gave an importance to the examination which it had not previously possessed. These circumstances proved the inadequacy of the old system, and, in 1816, induced the late Mr. Dallas, then Secretary of the Treasury, to direct the examination to be made by one of the clerks of the General Land Office, who was also permitted to make a similar examination in 1817; and received for his services, in each year, at the rate of three dollars per day, in addition to his salary as clerk. That, since the year 1817, the examination has been made by persons disconnected with the Department, and who have received for their services at the rate of six dollars per day, and six dollars for every twenty miles travel.

That, in the year 1824, Jesse B. Thomas, Esq., a Senator of the United States, from Illinois, was permitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to examine the offices in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, for which, as appears by the documents before the committee, he received a sum amounting to the allowance which has been established since the year 1817. That the principal inducement to permit the said Jesse B. Thomas to make the examination, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, appears to have been an expectation that he would be enabled to secure to the United States a large amount of public money in the Bank of Vincennes at the time that bank stopped payment, which service he performed, and for which he has not received or demanded any compensation.

Although the committee consider the duty of suggesting or recommending any alteration in the mode of examining the land offices, to be properly within the province of the Committee on Public Lands, to whom this part of the subject naturally refers itself, they are nevertheless free to declare it as their opinion, that the public interest does not require any change in the mode which has been pursued since the year 1817.

The committee presume, however, that this was the least important object of the reference of the subject to them; and that the design principally was, that they should consider and report upon the effect of permitting Jesse B. Thomas, Esq., a Senator of the United States, to examine the said offices, in 1821, in which it has been supposed that both the Constitution of the United States, and the act of Congress "concerning contracts," passed the 21st of April, have been violated.

Although the committee freely admit the power and jurisdiction of the House of Representatives to guard the purity of our institutions from violations, which it is the peculiar province of Congress or of the people to punish or remedy; they cannot recognise either its justice or dignity in conducting ex parte investigations into breaches of highly penal statutes, and the commission of misdemeanors amenable by the laws to a different tribunal. Such precedent might lead, in worse times, to consequences of a ruinous and most troublesome character. They might be used to authorize Congress to become the expositors of their own laws, or improperly to throw the weight of their opinion into the deliberations of the legitimate tribunals. They would be very apt to be seized upon to produce a public excitement, and be perverted to the purposes of ambitious men and individual resentments.

MARCH, 1822.

Inspection of Land Offices.

H. OF R.

At the same time, the committee would not be understood as ascribing the present investigation to such motives, and, as well on this account, as from a just sense of the policy of our institutions, and the character of the individuals concerned, they submit to the House the general views which they are constrained to entertain.

The committee are clearly of opinion that the examination of the land offices by Jesse B. Thomas, Esq., was not a violation of the Constitution of the United States.

That instrument forbids the appointment of members of Congress, during the time for which they were elected, to any civil office, created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during that time; and, also, prevents any person holding an office under the Government from being a member of Congress during his continuance in office.

The object was to take from Congress the means or inducement of creating place or emolument for themselves, and thereby guard the rights and interests of the people from the encroachment of Executive power. The committee are the advocates of this policy, and would be the last to weaken its influence in the Government. But the case of Mr. Thomas is clearly not within the words or the spirit of the first, and if it could be considered as embraced in the latter clause, his appointment would, nevertheless, be Constitutional, since only the holding incompatible offices at the same time is prohibited, with which idea the daily practice of the Government, from its organization, is in strict conformity. In fact, the Congress of the United States has hitherto been the theatre on which the ablest men of our country have become distinguished for their virtue and intelligence, and recommended themselves to the highest honors and places in the Government. The same theatre has matured their experience, and conducted our greatest statesmen to the Executive and Judicial Departments at home, and to foreign Courts abroad, with equal advantage to the ornament and real interests of the nation.

If, therefore, there could be such an incompatibility as is imagined, it would then resolve itself into the question, whether Mr. Thomas, by accepting the appointment, had vacated his seat in the Senate, and with that body your committee would, in that case, be disposed to leave it.

But your committee are of opinion that the duty of examining the land offices is not such an office as was contemplated by the Constitution of the United States, which opinion seems to have received the sanction, and regulated the practice, of the Government since the adoption of the Constitution, by those who bore a principal share in composing it; and must, therefore, be supposed to have understood its real import.

The committee refer to the appointment of Mr. Tracy, a Senator of the United States, by President Adams, in the year 1800, to inspect the posts on the northern and northwestern frontier. For this service, Mr. Tracy received a liberal compensation, and extra mileage, which is stated on the records of the Senate of that day. Under the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Dawson, a member of the House of Representatives, from Virginia, was appointed as the bearer of a treaty to France, and was paid for performing the duty; and during the Administration of the same President, Mr. Smith, a Senator from Tennessee, was appointed a commissioner to treat with the Indians, and actually executed two treaties under this appointment. They also refer to the instance, at a still more recent period, during the Administration of President Madison, of the appointment of Mr. Worthington, a Senator, and Mr. Morrow, a Representative, from Ohio, to negotiate with the Indians. In each of these cases, the individuals referred to executed the trusts confided to them, still retained their seats in Congress; and, in the Senate, passed upon their own acts. The committee content themselves with these instances, without enumerating others, as affording a clear exposition of this clause in the Constitution.

The act of Congress, which it is supposed has been violated by permitting Mr. Thomas to examine the land offices, was passed the 21st April, 1808, and is entitled "An act concerning contracts."

The first section provides that, from and after the passage of this act, no member of Congress shall, directly or indirectly, himself, or by any other person whatsoever in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in the whole or in part, any contract or agreement hereafter to be made or entered into with any officer of the United States, in their behalf, or with any person authorized to make contracts on the part of the United States; and further imposes a penalty on any member of Congress so offending.

The act further provides, "that if any officer of the United States, on behalf of the United States, shall, directly or indirectly, make or enter into any contract, bargain, or agreement, in writing or otherwise, other than those therein excepted, on conviction thereof shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and fined in the sum of three thousand dollars."

The 5th section provides, that "after the passing of this act, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, Secretary of the Navy, and Postmaster General, annually, to lay before Congress a statement of all the contracts which have been made in their respective departments during the year preceding such report," &c.

Without meaning to pronounce any opinion, whether a court of justice would so interpret the law as to be applicable to the case of the examination of the Land Office by Mr. Thomas, the committee are aware that the words are extremely broad, and, if such could be supposed to be their true intent and meaning, would be capable of embracing every imaginable case in which a member of Congress could be called to perform any duty, or render any service in behalf of the United States, and which, by any possibility, could be termed "a contract, bargain, or agreement."

They could especially be extended to the appointment to negotiate treaties, whether the member should afterwards resign or not; to the appointment of printers to publish the laws of the United States; and to the employment of counsel in causes in which the United States have an interest—than none of which, it is apprehended, is the duty of examining the land offices more plainly within the scope of the words. But, by the contemporary practice which occasioned the law, and which followed its enactment, among those who were liable to its provisions and always disposed to comply with its terms; who either aided in making, or lived and were familiar in the times and circumstances in which it was made, and were conversant with the men and their objects, by whom it was passed; it has received a different construction, and has never been considered as prohibiting any of the employments above enumerated.

From the organization of the Government, down to the passing of the law in 1808, it had been usual to give such appointments to members of Congress; and though in the case of Mr. Tracy his demand for mileage was not deemed reasonable, neither the legality nor policy of the usage had ever been questioned. But, in the years 1807 and 1808, John Smith, a Senator from Ohio, had entered largely into contracts with the War Department for supplying the Northwestern army; and Matthew Lyon, a Representative from Kentucky, had numerous contracts with the Postmaster General for carrying the mail. These contracts had produced considerable excitement in Congress, where their influence had been manifested; and especially the former, under the supposition that John Smith had become connected with the schemes of A. Burr, and used his contract to subvert them. After a fruitless attempt to expel him from his seat in the Senate, the law in question was passed. From the date of this law, all contracts of the nature of the two last ceased to be given to members of Congress; while all other trusts and agencies, as before referred to, continued to be given, and the returns from the different departments made accordingly, without serious complaint.

The appointment of Mr. Worthington and Mr. Morrow (both active in their respective places in passing the law of 1808) as commissioners to negotiate with the Indians, was made very soon after the law was passed, and by President Madison, who was Secretary of State at the time of its enactment, and could no more be supposed to be ignorant of its general objects than disinclined to obey its injunctions in their true spirit and meaning.

It is believed by the committee that the late William Pinkney was employed as counsel in behalf of the United States, while he was a member of the House of Representatives from Maryland, and argued some causes in the Supreme Court, and received a liberal compensation for his services.

It appears too that in 1818, upon the occasion of certain complaints made at the office of the Secretary of the Treasury against a receiver of public moneys at Vincennes, the present Chief Magistrate of the United States directed the Senators from Indiana to investigate the subject; and though the investigation did not proceed, one of the Senators who lived at a distance, and attended for the purpose, was afterwards allowed his travelling expenses.

On another occasion, (in the year 1819,) the Hon. Benjamin Ruggles was directed to aid the Superintendent of the Cumberland Road in taking proper security from the persons entering into the contracts, and received from the Superintendent seventy-two dollars for his services.

In the Department of State there exist few occasions for giving a construction to this law "concerning public contracts:" though in this Department the employment of a member of Congress (being the editor of a newspaper) to print the laws of the United States has not been considered by John Quincy Adams, Esq., "or by his predecessors, as prohibited by the act of Congress, or as coming at all within its purview." Accordingly, your committee find that James J. Wilson, Esq., a Senator from the State of New Jersey, and the editor of the Trenton True American, was employed to print the laws during the time he was Senator, from 1815 to 1821, and from the year 1804.

In the Navy Department, the committee have heard of no particular cases, or of any particular practice, other than that arising from the annual returns under the fifth section, which are exclusively confined to contracts for work and supplies.

The committee believe it to have been usual in the War Department, also, to employ members of Congress as counsel in behalf of the United States; and they refer particularly to the instances of Mr. Baldwin of the House of Representatives, and of Mr. Rodney of Delaware, of the Senate, employed and paid as counsel under the direction of the present Secretary of War.

The committee refer, also, to the case of a member of the House of Representatives, in the present Congress, who is employed, under the authority of the War Department, as the superintendent of a fortification of the United States, for which he receives an annual compensation.

Upon these instances the committee forbear any comment; proceeding to remark, however, that in this practical construction, there has been an uniformity, which could scarcely have resulted from any thing else than a universal impression of the real meaning of the law. By the fifth section it has been perceived that the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, and of the Navy, and the Postmaster General, are directed to make annual statements to Congress, of such contracts, made in their respective departments, as are comprehended in the law. But in none of these returns, which have been annually made, are included any of the cases enumerated, whether the service had been performed by a member of Congress, or any other person, and under the idea that these were not of the description of contracts to which the law had reference, the returns embrace only contracts for labor, for furnishing supplies, and for carrying the mail; and it is also worthy of observation, that, though this fifth section designs to compel a return of all contracts within the law, it does not require any such return from the Department of State, in which, though it is true no such contracts as gave rise to the law are ever made, it has, nevertheless, an extensive patronage, a part of which is that of authorizing the publication of the laws, which may be dispensed to members of Congress, and as we have seen, falling clearly within the general scope of the words of the law of 1808. Neither has it been usual, or deemed necessary, to make a record in either of the Departments, of any such instances, whether the service was performed by a member of Congress, or others, pursuant to the law, requiring all contracts made by the respective Departments, in behalf of the United States, to be recorded.

The committee do not wish to be understood as referring to these instances, and to this course of practice, to justify or excuse an error in one Department, by detecting similar abuses in others; nor as affording an interpretation which, if erroneous, should have the force of judicial decision; but merely as the means by which the subjects and meaning of the law may be ascertained, as illustrative of the sense in which its provisions have been received and understood by the most distinguished statesmen, and the ablest constitutional lawyers of the country, and by the common consent of all whose duty it was to obey them.

They refer to them, as demonstrating a contemporaneous practical construction, which has prevailed, without concert, in all of the Departments, and to which an officer, entering an office long after the construction had become adopted, might naturally conform his conduct.

On the whole, the committee have seen nothing in the case submitted to them, which can lead to the presumption, that either of the individuals concerned had any intention either to violate the provisions of the law, or to abuse or disregard the spirit and policy of our institutions.

They are of opinion that the employment of Mr. Thomas to examine the land offices originated in a desire honestly to discharge an important public duty; that the peculiar importance of the trust at the time, and the character and elevation of the individual employed, were calculated rather to invite than forbid the selection. Nor have the committee any reason to believe that the duty has not been faithfully performed, and in a manner conducive to the public good.

Under these circumstances, and with such impressions, the committee do not deem it necessary to single out this case for particular animadversion, or to pronounce upon the comprehensiveness or precise import of the act of 1808. They content themselves with referring to the construction which it has uniformly received in practice, and to the conviction that the public good, and not any sinister or improper purpose, was intended; and they therefore recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. Cook stated, that it was due to himself and to the committee to say, that the committee were not unanimous in agreeing to the report, and to express the views which he personally had of this subject, which he considered, in some points of view, as of great importance, he offered a counter-resolution, which he requested might accompany the report, and be laid on the table with it.

Mr. McLANE said he was sorry that, on the present occasion, the gentleman from Illinois had thought it proper to deviate from the usual practice on making reports, in stating, as he had done, that there was a division in the committee on the subject of the report. An obvious objection to such a proceeding was, that each member of the committee might feel himself called upon to say how he had voted, if any one of the committee did so. He believed, he said, that he should be authorized in saying that the honorable gentleman himself was the only one of the committee who disagreed to the resolution now on the table. Mr. McL. did not think this course to be the proper one to be pursued. It would be an encroachment on propriety to suffer a committee to make a report, and accompany it with another report, which might possibly be of a very different tendency. The object of the gentleman, besides, could be as well attained by moving his proposition in the shape of a separate and distinct resolution, as in the way he proposed.

The SPEAKER, deprecating the debates growing out of incidental questions, uselessly consuming the time of the House, pronounced his decision, that nothing can be received as the act of a committee but what is the report of a committee, and that a committee can make but one report. Nothing, therefore, but the report of the committee was now under consideration. He adverted to the famous case of the Seminole war, in which a counter report had been offered by one of the committee, and received by the House, but he considered it an erroneous proceeding, and not to be drawn into precedent.

Mr. MERCER concurred in the view which the Speaker had taken of this point, and added that, in the case of the Seminole war, the counter report had not been received until after considerable debate, and it was afterwards a subject of general regret that it had been received at all.

Mr. Cook said, he was not sure he had understood the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. McLANE) correctly—but, repeating what he had said when before up, Mr. C. now justified it. It was no new thing for it to be announced, on the presentation of a report, that the committee was divided in relation to it. He quoted the example of the case of the report at the last session on the admission of Missouri into the Union. He did not know whether the member from Delaware meant to intimate that he had made an incorrect statement or taken any undue advantage. He would rather abandon his seat—he would rather never have set foot in this House, than do a dishonorable act, or even an act of unkindness to any of his fellow-members. He deemed it a matter of importance even to the persons about whom, on this subject, so much had been said, to frankly present to the House his views, that no man should be taken by surprise in voting on a question deeply connected with the purity of the legislative body—

The SPEAKER here arrested the debate as going improperly into the main subject, on a question merely incidental.

Mr. McLANE disclaimed any intention, in what he had said, to alarm the feelings of the gentleman from Illinois, or impeach his motives. He considered it an act of justice to himself and to the committee to state the facts of the case, and he had done no more.

The question was taken on laying the report on the table, as moved by Mr. Cook, and carried.

Mr. Cook then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the employment of members of Congress by the Executive, or any Executive officer of the United States, in the performance of any public service, during the continuance of their membership, for which they receive compensation out of the public Treasury, is inconsistent with the independence of Congress, and in derogation of the rights of the people, and, if it be not already, ought to be prohibited.

Mr. CANNON required the question of consideration of the resolution; and, that question being taken, the House agreed to consider the same.

Mr. Cook moved for a reconsideration of the vote taken upon the disposal of the resolution reported by the committee; on the ground that his object was to offer the last resolution as an amendment or rather as a substitute for the resolution reported by the committee.

A question of order occurred, in which Messrs. Cook, H. NELSON, CANNON, and TAYLOR, took part, when the proceedings ended in deciding to lay Mr. Cook's resolution on the table, in the same manner as the report had been; and both were ordered to be printed.

FUGITIVE SLAVES.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory.

The question was, on the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. F. JOHNSON was willing to legislate on the subject, but he thought this bill was calculated to introduce new and unknown rules in relation to property. Its operation was not confined to the slaveholding States, and he thought its tendency would be injurious to society, and the administration of justice. He was also opposed to it on the ground that it authorized a suspension of the right of the writ of habeas corpus. He hoped that the bill would be laid on the table, or recommitted, in order that these objections may be removed; and with that view, he proposed that the Committee rise and report; which motion was put and carried, ayes 55, noes 43.

In the House, leave to sit again was refused to the Committee; and

Mr. F. JOHNSON moved to recommit the bill to a select committee, which was agreed to; and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. COLDEN, Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. NELSON of Virginia, and Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, were appointed said committee.

EXCHANGE OF STOCKS.

The House then took into consideration the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange certain stocks bearing an interest of six and seven per cent. for stock bearing an interest of five per cent.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, proposed the amendments which he had submitted some days since, and which the House had ordered to be printed, accompanied with a few explanatory observations.

Mr. COLDEN was opposed to the amendments, because he wished to strike out the words twelve millions, and to insert in lieu thereof five millions, so as to reduce the amount of stocks to be exchanged; and, also, to sell the seventy thousand shares of stock in the Bank of the United States which are owned by the Government. The amount of dividends which had been received upon the bank stock belonging to the United States during four and a half years, had been 13 per cent. for the whole period, amounting in the aggregate to $910,000, whilst the interest on the seven millions which was borrowed to pay for that stock, had amounted, during that period, to the sum of $1,575,000, making a loss to the United States of $665,000. But Mr. C. stated that, from the present price of that stock in the market, $980,000 would be gained to the United States from the surplus price of the shares above par; so that the operation of the amendments he proposed would be, as he contended, to save to the United States $196,000 per annum, and to put more than half a million of dollars into the public Treasury. Mr. C. entered into a variety of considerations to evince the propriety of the project he had submitted, and concluded by observing that he should vote against the bill, yet, if it should be adopted, he thought the plan which he had suggested was altogether the most expedient course that could be pursued.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland remarked, that the gentleman from New York, (Mr. COLDEN,) had admitted that $980,000 were obtainable from the present value of the stock above par. Nor was that all; for the Bank of the United States had performed the duties of the loan offices, which had saved the United States $100,000 annual expense. Mr. S. proceeded at considerable length in explaining and enforcing the expediency and necessity of the measures that had been resorted to, in relation to the Bank of the United States, and he contended that the stock of that Bank had already fallen, by the refusal of one branch of the Legislature at this session to aid it; and if the seventy thousand shares belonging to the United States should be thrown at once into the market, he believed the stock would fall down to ninety, and perhaps to eighty, so that the United States would utterly fail of obtaining the expected premium. It would evince such an hostility on the part of the Government to that institution, as would destroy all confidence in the value of the stock.

Mr. COLDEN replied to the observations of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH.)

Mr. CAMBRELENG was in favor of the amendment, and opposed the scheme proposed by his colleague, (Mr. COLDEN.)

After some further observations of Mr. COLDEN, the question was taken on the amendments as proposed, and respectively carried without a division; and the bill was thereupon ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, ayes 79.

HORSES LOST IN THE SEMINOLE WAR.

The House again went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims unfavorable to the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, claiming payment for horses lost in the Seminole campaign.

Mr. F. JONES moved to amend the report of the committee by striking out the word "not," so as to give it an affirmative character.

The motion was supported by the mover, and by Mr. ALLEN, of Tennessee.

Mr. ALLEN said: This claim presents itself very differently from most others which we are called upon to decide. It rests upon a positive contract between the soldier and his Government. We find the Commander of the Southern division of the Army of the United States inviting mounted volunteers to enter the service under a promise to pay them forty cents per day for their horses, and furnish them with forage and subsistence, at a time when a law existed to pay the soldiers, who had just returned from service, for their horses that had been lost on account of a failure on the part of the Government to forage them. The inspection roll of the Army proves that these men entered the service, and performed their duty faithfully, and were honorably discharged. It is admitted that, during a long and rapid march through a wilderness, no forage whatever was furnished. What was the consequence? Death to the horse and loss to the owner, but a gain to the Government of all that forage and transportation would have cost. If that has been done in violation of the contract with the soldier, is it not reasonable to pay the damages that accrued to the soldier who performed his part of the covenant? His claim would be sustainable in law, were the Government suable? and, because it is not, are we to reject it? I hope not; I will not agree to do so without stronger reasons than are to be found in the report of the Committee of Claims. I cannot see how the soldier's demand for his horse is at all impaired by any thing paid him for his services. He performed the duties required of him, and only received the wages promised for doing so; yet this ingenious report tells us that that payment exceeded the average value of the horses, and infers, from it, that the soldier is already overpaid. Agreeably to this mode of reasoning, if one of these soldiers had served six months longer, the Government would have had a claim against him equal to the value of another horse. If he is to be charged with his wages when he receives credit for his horse, it is evident that the longer he served the greater would be the balance against him. This may be good argument, but, in my opinion, very poor pay. There is a laboring, throughout this report, to draw the mind off from the merits of the claim, and fix it upon charges and expenditures that attended the campaign, for which the soldier is not at all accountable. After all the trouble of searching every department in the War Office, it is discovered that, out of the arms put in the hands of the volunteers, forty-nine muskets were never returned. This, I think, might easily be accounted for by looking at the number of men that never returned. The killed and wounded could not be expected to return their arms, and certainly their comrades are not to be made accountable for them. Is it believed that we are never to want another Army? If we do, does any one think we will get soldiers, if they are to be made accountable for all the expenses? Was that the course adopted during the last war? No; the mounted men then engaged, were paid for their services and their losses. These troops only ask the same measure of justice all others received. If the policy even is doubtful, is it just to change it now, and exclude a few that have been deceived by confiding in it? Certainly not. If you want the confidence of the people, remember that, next to their liberty, they claim from their Government equal justice. I hope it will not be denied to these meritorious men—soldiers, I would say, if I was not well aware that the very name of soldier sounds an alarm here, not for their valor, but for our money. Sir, these soldiers are too proud to beg. Give them justice or give them nothing.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the Committee rose and reported progress, and asked leave to sit again, which was granted.

SATURDAY, March 30.

An engrossed bill for the relief of William A. Meek, and an engrossed bill for the relief of Cornelius Huson, were respectively read a third time, and passed.

Mr. LATHROP, from the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, reported a bill to revive and continue in force acts concerning the allowance of pensions, upon the relinquishment of bounty lands; which was twice read, and ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, reported a joint resolution assigning certain rooms for the national paintings, executed by Colonel Trumbull; which was twice read, and, by unanimous consent, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SECURITY OF THE MAIL.

On motion of Mr. HOOKS, the House agreed to consider the report of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, relative to the adoption of Imlay's invention for the security of the mail, &c.

Mr. F. JOHNSON proposed to modify the resolution in such manner as to authorize the Postmaster General to adopt the plan or not, at his discretion. Mr. J. expressed his doubts of the efficacy of the plan proposed, but he was willing to submit it to the discretion of that officer.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, was also in favor of submitting the subject to the discretion of the Postmaster General.

The modification was opposed by Mr. OVERSTREET, when the question was taken thereon, and carried.

On the resolution as amended, Mr. TAYLOR expressed his opinion that the resolution ought to be joint, and he moved an amendment to that effect, which was agreed to, and the resolution was thereupon read, and committed. The resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Postmaster General be authorized, in his discretion, to introduce, as soon as conveniently may be, on one or more of the most exposed routes, Richard Imlay's plan of copper cases, secured in iron chests, with inside locks and sliding bars, in such a way as to test its efficacy in preventing robberies of the mail: Provided, the extra expense for each mail carriage shall not exceed one hundred and fifty dollars; and to charge the cost thereof to the contingent expenses of the Post Office Department."

SOUTH AMERICAN GOVERNMENTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter, which, by unanimous consent, was ordered to be entered on the Journals of the House.

WASHINGTON, March 30, 1822.

To the honorable, the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

SIR: Severe indisposition prevented me from attending the House on Thursday, and recording my vote in favor of the Independence of the South American Governments; the same cause prevented me from attending the House yesterday; nor was it until the hour of adjournment that I was informed that the members who were absent when the above vote was taken, were yesterday permitted, by universal consent, to have their votes entered on the Journal. Thus circumstanced, I shall feel highly honored by the House if they will permit my name to be recorded in the affirmative on that question, by placing it with the yeas; or if that cannot be done, by placing this letter on the Journal. I have the honor to be, &c.

PHILIP REID.

Mr. GARNETT asked if it was in order to make a motion; he said he wished to make one on the subject of the vote he had given on Thursday last, on the recognition of the late South American Provinces. That it has been his misfortune, not only to differ with all his colleagues, but with the whole House on this subject; that he did not wish to recall his vote, for he was fully prepared for all the consequences that could arise from it, when he gave it; but there was one view of the subject which occasioned regret; the event of our recognition would necessarily be announced to the world, and his vote would be probably misinterpreted by the public, who might believe that he was unfriendly to the independence of the South Americas; and that he did not wish it to be believed, that there could be an American Legislator in the 19th century, who could be unfriendly to civil liberty, and the rights of man, any where. That he felt great gratification in common with the rest of his countrymen, in the success in which the struggle of the South Americans had eventuated; and that he refrained from voting to recognise them, from considerations of policy, which he wished to make known, by spreading them upon the Journal of the House, the only permanent and authentic record. This was partly a national, and partly a personal motive; but there was a secondary motive, which was entirely personal. He wished it to be known that he had not voted entirely without reflection, or from caprice or prejudice, by making known his reasons, which, whether well or ill founded, would show that he had bestowed some consideration on the subject. With this view he offered the following declaration, and moved to have it inserted in the Journal:

I voted against the recognition of the late American Provinces of Spain, not because I am opposed to their independence, on the contrary, I rejoice in its accomplishment, and believe that it would be even better for them to be independent with a worse form of government, than to be dependent with a better; but I voted against it because I am of opinion,

That recognition must be either the mere formal declaration of a fact which will be inoperative, and therefore useless, or it must be substantial, and propose some advantage to one or both of the parties—that, if it be substantial, it must be intended either to impart to the party recognised the physical means, or the moral force, necessary to accomplish their revolution, or to establish relations for the mutual benefit of both the parties concerned—that the idea of assistance, to consummate a revolution, concedes that it is not completed, and is incompatible with the neutral obligations to the country claiming jurisdiction; and that the second alternative of mutual benefit reduces it to a question of policy, in which it is only necessary to balance the good with the evil:

That we have no right to recognise nations because they have adopted forms of government congenial with our own, if our recognition would not otherwise be proper; and, to maintain this doctrine, would be to assert the odious principle of legitimacy, that nations have a right to interfere with the internal concerns of each other, which must be beneficial or injurious, accordingly as free principles or despotism happens to prevail in the world; and that, for this reason also, the present is a question of policy, not of principle:

That, the period having past when our recognition of the independent Governments of South America could be of any substantial benefit to them; their independence being already firmly established, it is impolitic in us, for the sake of any advantages which either party is likely to derive from an intercourse at this time, to risk those we already possess:

That the European Powers do not, at present, appear to be disposed to molest them in the enjoyment of their independence; that our acknowledgment may have the effect to bring on them, as well as ourselves, the ill will of those Powers, and that, if this ill will develops itself in actual opposition, it will impose on them the necessity of maintaining a defensive attitude which will greatly retard their progress and improvement in the arts of peace and the principles of free government, whilst, by renewing the bonds of sympathy and interest between Spain and the European Powers, it will equally retard her progress towards liberty, so auspiciously began, and so desirable to the whole world to see continued:

That, although apparently, so nugatory an act as the mere declaration of a fact, to be followed by no efficient measure, ought not to excite the hostility of the European Powers, we are to consider their actual disposition towards us, which, on account of the example of our free institutions, we must know to be unfriendly; and not count on their inability to commence a contest, without making allowance for their prejudices and their folly; and that, although considerations of prudence, or the prospect of a European war, may prevent direct hostility, we should not forget that we have matters of difference with France, Russia, and England, the adjustment of which should be promoted by the cultivation of their good will:

That, if Spain only, through mistaken pride, resents our act, though perhaps too feeble to carry on a war with us, she may interdict our commerce with her remaining colonies, and thus deprive us of a trade more valuable than any we can expect to substitute, for a long time, with the independent provinces:

That, if the importance of this trade to those colonies should induce them to revolt, or our recognition itself should produce in them revolutionary movements, the island of Cuba, the most valuable to us, will either fall under the dominion of the colored population, or of our jealous and ambitious commercial rival, England, or we must occupy it ourselves, at the expense of a war with that rival, who will certainly seek to prevent that occupation at the same cost:

That, to be deprived of so valuable a source of revenue as we derive from our commerce with the remaining possessions of Spain, and incur the risk of war, would greatly increase our fiscal embarrassment, render inexpedient the plans of economy it is so desirable to pursue, and probably compel a recurrence to internal taxes :

That we cannot, for a great while, repair this loss by the substitution of an equally valuable commerce with the Independents, as, until their internal strifes entirely cease, and their labor can be productively employed, their trade must be limited, and we shall not be able to compete with the Europeans in their markets, but by a new commercial system, under which we shall supply them with the various products of other countries, more in demand among them than our own, and thus become at once their merchants and their carriers :

That the elements of new revolutions still exist in Mexico, in consequence of the power and influence of the priesthood and the landed aristocracy, who gave their aid to the late revolution, under the belief that they were to have an imperial government, which secures to them their property—which probably cannot be carried into operation, and which, if attempted, it is said, will be resisted by the Republic of Colombia—and that these commotions will still farther retard the return of their productive labor to domestic industry :

That the situation of Mexico is somewhat equivocal in relation to its claim to recognition, as it appears by the letter of the American Chargé d'Affaires near the Court of Madrid, that the authorized agents of that Government, after the revolt of Iturbide, and the adoption of articles of government, was known to them, still contemplated the integrity of the Spanish Empire, as it concerns this province.

And, finally, that circumstances do not warrant precipitancy—that the great interest of both parties will be endangered without any adequate motive for the risk ; and that the temporary eclat which priority of recognition may obtain for us, is not to be put in opposition to the great permanent interests of both countries, which will be best promoted by adhering, on their part, to the sage monitions inculcated in the language of one of their most distinguished patriots, Rivadavia, who declared, as late as September last, that they did not seek the recognition of other nations, because it must operate, if unsuccessful, to the humiliation of the provinces, and if successful, to mislead the people by persuading them that such recognition was all sufficient to their political existence and happiness ; that the most efficacious system would be to establish order and wise institutions of government, throughout the provinces, and to show themselves worthy of the fraternity of other nations, when it would be voluntarily offered ;”* and, on our part, by abstaining to propose that fraternity, until the elements of their political society, purified from the crimes and corruption engendered by former oppression, have settled down into order, and they have fully demonstrated their capacity for self-government ; and until we are mutually in a condition to derive advantages from a free intercourse, which will overbalance the considerations of the evil, which immediate recognition presents, without a prospect of good.

ROBERT S. GARNETT,
A member from Virginia.

The question being taken upon entering the said written declaration on the Journals of the House, it was negatived, yeas 49, noes 51.

EXCHANGE OF STOCKS.

An engrossed bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange certain stocks bearing an interest of five per cent. for certain stocks bearing an interest of six and seven per cent. was read a third time.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, called for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill ; which were thereupon ordered.

Mr. F. JOHNSON said he should not again have troubled the House upon the subject but for the very singular course which had marked the progress of the bill, and but for the utter repugnance he felt for the measure—a loan bill of twenty-six millions in profound peace ; that he considered the subject, as the friends of it had said, of “vital importance” in its consequence, and as a precedent. He said that the bill, as now amended, was more objectionable than at first ; that it now allowed the payment of the public debt of 1814 and 1815, as well as 1812 and 1813, to be postponed and put further off. It was now a proposition to create a loan of twenty-six millions to discharge so much of the public debt which falls redeemable in 1825, '26, '27, '28, and to postpone the payment thereof until a more distant period—taxing the community, in the mean time, and for all that time, with an interest on the debt, and which interest, as mentioned on a former day, was upwards of five million seven hundred thousand dollars annually ; that the friends of the bill had urged several grounds for its passage : first, that it was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury ; secondly, that we shall not be able to discharge the debt when it falls redeemable ; and, foreseeing that event, now was the golden moment, now the accepted time, to make a good bargain out of the money brokers, and, by so doing, to save to the nation the payment of 6 and 7 per cent. interest on the public debt, and to substitute in lieu thereof 5 per cent. These arguments, he said, had been answered, and that satisfactorily, in his opinion, by his honorable friends from New York, (Mr. TRACY,) from Connecticut, (Mr. TOMLINSON,) and from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT.) It had been demonstrated, over and over again, that the stockholders will not accept the exchange you propose, unless it shall be more advantageous to them than the contract they now hold on you, and consequently more disadvantageous to the Government ; so that it is to make a bargain in any event, if we bargain at all, and he said they had, moreover, shown that there was no good reason to apprehend that the credit of the Government would fall, unless uncompromitted by some such measure as the bill. But, he said, yielding to the friends of the bill, the truth of both the facts they had assumed, namely, that we shall not be able to pay the debt of 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828, when it falls redeemable, and that money will be more in demand and the interest higher ; yet, he contended, the propriety of the measure was not established : he said, the argument which goes to show we shall not be able to pay off the public debt, presupposes and assumes for its basis, that there is to be no material increase in the revenue, nor any material change in the economy of the affairs of the nation; and he begged gentlemen to say, whether the same arguments, if admitted to be correct, did not go conclusively to show that we never should be able to pay the public debt. He said, if the increase of the revenue, and the reduction of public expenditure, will not enable the Government to pay off a good portion of the debt in two, three, four, five, and six years, he should like to know what was to happen after that period to enable them to pay the debt; and, said he, I pray gentlemen, who rely so much more on their predictions for our inability to pay the debt, than on exertions to pay it, to open to us the events of futurity, and give us a view, if it be but a faint one, of the prosperity which is after that time to advance our revenue and resources so as to enable us to pay this debt with an accumulation of fifty-five per cent. on it, that we may have faith, and, having faith, we may live in hopes, that, without any exertion but the mere process of creating new loans to pay off old ones, we shall some day relieve the country of this enormous debt. And if they would be kind enough, he said, to develop the process by which men or nations could get out of debt by borrowing, it would be a most acceptable invention in these times. The argument, he said, which was advanced to show that the interest on money would increase in a year or two, and hence the conclusion that we ought to borrow while interest is low and before it rises, was founded upon the assertion that the capital in the country, which was now unemployed, would in a short time be employed in a profitable commerce; that commerce was increasing, and would increase, and would employ the capital of the country. So be it, said he; and what does it prove?

If commerce increases and flourishes, does it not inevitably advance, in the proportion of its increase, the revenue of the nation? Most assuredly it does. And, if the revenue thus increases, it gives the means directly and immediately to pay off the debt. For, in the same extent, you admit the argument contended for, he said, that the capital of the country would be employed in profitable commerce, and therefore could not be obtained on loan but at a higher interest than now, also proved with it a like proportion in the increase of the revenue, and an increase of the revenue gave the means of paying the debt; and the argument thus urged, he said, in favor of the bill, was most clearly against it. So, he said, to him, it was perfectly clear, that, take the argument either or both ways in which it had been contended for, that it was against the policy and propriety of the measure. But, said he, we are told that two millions of dollars are to be saved to the nation by this bill, and several hundred thousand every year. Astonishing result, he said, to be produced by borrowing money. It was vain delusion to talk of saving millions while you plunged the nation deeper and deeper in debt; while you increased and extended the amount of interest, and gave it a sort of perpetuation on posterity that seems without end, it is vain delusion to talk of saving; it was a sort of political sophism in which he did not believe; the fact, he said, was not so; unless gentlemen meant to make the debt perpetual, to adopt the old maxim—a public debt a public blessing—then, to be sure, it would be some temporary relief to the finances to pay one per cent. less on the debt. How stood the facts, he asked, in this case? Say a part of the debt is proposed not to be redeemed until the end of eleven years, and you agree, in the mean time, to pay five per cent. per annum, quarterly, on the debt, is it not an agreement to pay fifty-five per cent. on the money loaned, before you return it, you being allowed eleven years credit for the principal, by paying, at the rate of five per cent. per annum, quarterly out of the Treasury? On a loan of twenty millions of dollars, for twenty years, at this rate, you pay in all forty millions, and the twenty millions of interest, quarter yearly; whereas the same loan of twenty millions, continued but five years at six per cent. will only amount to twenty-six millions; the difference, therefore, in favor of six per cent. for a few years, is more favorable to the nation than paying five per cent. for a great number of years; five per cent. for eleven years makes an aggregate of interest, on any given sum, fifty-five per cent.; an interest of six per cent., for nine years, makes an aggregate of interest, on the same sum, but fifty-four per cent.; hence, he said, it was most clear that the actual saving to the nation was in the same proportion as the debt was extinguished within nine years, beyond what it would be to continue and put off the payment of any part until the end of eleven years. So much, he said, he had thought proper to say in addition to what had been heretofore said on the dollar and cent part of the argument.

But, he said, there were other points of view in which this subject might be profitably received and considered. Loans or a national debt, under a certain administration, was once considered a national blessing, but it had been long since admitted, on all hands, that a national debt was a nation's curse; we then deprecated a national debt, and we still continue to view it as a national evil; but it would seem, he said, that times change, and we change with the times. That very system which, under a former Administration, was opposed, abused, and cried down, as tending directly to the oppression of the people, and the destruction of the Government, we now propose to adopt and speak of with as much indifference and unconcern as if it was of but momentary consequence; that very system of loans and public debt was one of the levers that overthrew that administration and established in its stead an administration of economy and retrenchment—an administration which consulted the interest of the people and studied the perpetuation of American liberty—an administration which arrested the career to consolidation and profusion, and restored correct principles and economy—an administration that, with less capital and wealth in the nation; with less population; with fewer resources than we now possess; yes, with the remains of means of the preceding administration, extinguished about sixty-five millions of the public debt. And how was it done? It was effected, he said, by the then Executive of the nation turning its attention to the deranged finances of the country, correcting the faults, errors, and profusions, that had crept into the various Departments of the Government, and by husbanding the resources of the nation, and which had been esteemed, in the preceding administration, so inadequate to the annual ordinary expenses of the Government, that direct and internal taxes had been levied with a liberal hand, on the people, to supply the alleged deficits in the revenue, derived from imports and tonnage, &c. All these obnoxious and oppressive laws were repealed, and, notwithstanding the clamorous predictions of ruin and devastation which was to overtake the nation, by reason of the new organization of things which were everywhere uttered by the enemies of that administration, the sage of Monticello, to the utter astonishment and confusion of his enemies, not only kept the Government in operation and in peace, but with the remains of means extinguished about sixty-five millions of public debt.

And what, said he, is the state of things now? A profound peace and an uninterrupted commerce, enjoyed to the fullest extent. Yet the public debt has increased, for the last two years, and the payment of it is now proposed to be pushed further forward, and no effort made to extinguish it. And, said he, can gentlemen point to one single Executive effort or recommendation of means for the extinguishment of the public debt, or the intimation of a project for retrenchment. But, on the contrary, he said, what an unpleasant situation was every member of the House placed in! Yes, sir, he said, what is the estimation in which every member is held, who dares to declare himself in favor of retrenchment and economy? It is a fact no longer to be disguised from the nation; he is considered as incurring Executive displeasure; he is esteemed in opposition to the Executive. By what authority, he said, such calculations and estimates were made, he was wholly uninformed. But one thing, said he, sir, I will tell you, that, if these implications and imputations, although now, like Will-o-the-wisp, they come in at one ear and go out at the other, and we cannot tell from whence they come or where they go, yet, if they are suffered to gain ground and to spread, in the absence of all Executive acts to the contrary, they will place the Executive of this nation in an awkward position—in opposition to the will and the interest of the people—and what would then be the consequence he would not say—he would leave that to others. The people look at the progress of the public debt and the loan system with great concern; they call for its extinguishment; they call for retrenchment; they call for economy in the Administration, and it is required not more for the purpose of extinguishing the debt, than for the preservation of the purity of republican principles. Yes, said he, they look for acts and efficient measures to rid the nation of this enormous debt, growing, and likely to grow, if a different course of things is not adopted. He said, the Executive of the nation, presiding over its concerns and transactions, by bestowing some attention to the disbursements of public money confided to his control, might, if disposed, be able, from time to time, to give to Congress much useful information, to aid their labors in economizing the public money. Not one word, however, upon this subject, have we heard suggested; and hence, he said, the difficulties which presented themselves to the House, upon that subject, were so great. He said, he appealed to the gentlemen of the House to say, whether it was scarcely possible for the members, however industrious and persevering, if they perform the duties of the House and those on committees, to become well acquainted, even in the course of several sessions, with the expenditures in the different departments and the labor and service and nature of service required, so as to be able to suggest and point to reform in every one, and to ascertain what, if any, has been disbursed without the authority of law—he said so numerous and complicated are its concerns, that it is almost wholly impracticable, and hence said he, we have to confine our efforts, to the more prominent establishments of the country, the Army and the Navy, and attempts at the Civil department. The Army, said he, we reduced last session, and that department had introduced and was approaching, a degree of economy not observed, it was believed, in any other. And is there, he said, no necessity for attention to this subject? He said that something like five millions a year, was appropriated by Congress in the nature of its expenditure, more or less contingent—some of it altogether contingent, the residue depending on the discretion of various persons in its administration and disbursement. He did not say that abuses had taken place, and if there was not, he said, it was right upon principle to investigate and to understand, but that, from the manner of reporting the accounts of the various expenditures to the House, but little or no information is afforded; they are chiefly reported in sundries—so much for sundries, &c., and he could not any better judge after such accounts came in than before as to the propriety of the expenditure, but he supposed it was owing to the manner in which the auditors kept their accounts; he supposed they just sent extracts from their ledgers. He said he observed some items, however, that he could find no authority for, but he would not now trouble the House with the mention of them upon this occasion, but he just observed that in an appropriation of $30,000 for an Indian treaty, he saw ten thousand dollars set down as so much given away, for which there was no other evidence than the word or certificate of the givers of the money; $10,000 paid in part for the cession obtained, the residue absorbed in expenses and wages. Look at the contingent expenses upon almost any subject, and see if there is not something of the same want of attention to the public interest; this he mentioned as a small circumstance that had just crossed his mind, it was small compared to other appropriations—he knew of no authority for giving away the public money, and none for admitting credits and disbursements without evidence; it might, he said, be right, but it was certainly a dangerous sort of principle to sanction—irresponsibility for the expenditure of public money; indeed he said it would seem there was somehow or other too much indifference about the expenditure of public money. The Ghent Commissioners are, he said, a singular evidence upon the subject; these commissioners have been for five or six years drawing immense sums of money out of the Treasury, and a great part of the time about their own business; some excuse or other is offered for not completing the business, but the money goes, if the business stands; and they are retained on wages. Captain Cook or Sir W. Raleigh, he said, would have sailed round the world two or three times while these commissioners have been engaged in running a line upon a very small part of its surface. He had taken occasion to refer to these subjects, as most likely not to have escaped the eye, yet nothing is said; and he would suggest, these items were in his opinion neither the most flagrant nor most numerous. Look at various reports and judge for yourselves.

Mr. J. said, as the Executive seemed to abandon all scrutiny in the disbursements of public money, and had not deigned to trouble himself with offering or suggesting to the House any mode or plan of retrenchment in the public concerns; he should, on some future day of the session, unless some other member would do it, propose to the House the appointment of a committee to examine into the disbursement of public moneys, and to form some plan for the future. That all he desired was that the laws should prevail, that the House might be informed, and the nation should know, where and for what their money was expended, whether according to law or at the discretion of others, which it was impracticable he said for them to know now, and consequently the Congress could not at this time so competently bring about that system of reform, which the people had a right to expect, and which the finances of the country called for.

But, he said, we were told the other day by the honorable gentleman from New York who sat before him, (Mr. Wood,) that we could not retrench to more than half a million of dollars without doing injury to the public service. Very well, said Mr. J., that little is worth saving. It will serve to pay the interest of the public debt, or very nearly, and leave so much the more to be applied to the payment of the principal. But he had hopes much more than that amount could be saved in that way.

Mr. J. said he would repeat what he had said on a former day, that the passage of the bill might answer one purpose which he wished to avoid, and that was, it might, for the present moment, seem to do away the necessity for retrenchment by pushing the burden of the debt a little further on posterity. He said he would not have gentlemen to think too lightly on this part of the argument—necessity. If, said he, we look back to the last session of Congress, when the subject of reducing the Army was before the House, to the exertions made by the honorable gentleman to convince the House and the nation that there was no necessity for reducing the Army or any thing else, by endeavoring to show that the deficit in the revenue was so small as not likely to affect the operations of the Government, when, at the same time, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury was before us requiring the loan of seven millions of dollars. Nor had he forgot that the President's Message to that Congress spoke of the state of the nation in the most flattering terms. And when, he said, these sort of arguments could not succeed, was it forgotten that those who were in favor of retrenchment were called radicals and disorganizers; that they were charged with cutting down and ruining the Army and all the useful and valuable establishments of the country? In fact, said he, such was the opposition to retrenchment then, that the friends of retrenchment were looked upon as designing the ruin of the country. But, said he, the Army was reduced—the country is not ruined—millions are saved; and what, said he, would have been the consequence had no retrenchment been made? Why, another loan at the present session for the annual expenditures of the Government. And we find, he said, that the Executive departments are quite willing to avail themselves of the benefit of that retrenchment which it was understood they were most decidedly opposed to. Such are the difficulties under which the Representatives of the people labor at this time in promoting the best interests of the nation.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, he said, had recently reported a bill for a Peace Establishment of the Navy. He had not read the bill; but he was glad to find a spirit for retrenchment prevailed as to that too; he was satisfied it would have a salutary influence—it would render the Navy more efficient and less expensive. Yes, sir, said he, let us march on in the good work; let us not postpone, but pay off the debt; it is our duty to look into all the concerns of the nation, and lop off every thing that is not essential. We owe it to the people, a confiding people, who have placed us here to superintend their concerns. He said he admitted that it was unpleasant to be under the necessity to do things sometimes; it was often a hard task master; but it was sometimes very useful, and more especially in bringing about a result which two bodies have to concur in, and to which the most preponderating one is opposed; it disarms the influence which it might otherwise have and wield upon the subject. Let us not, therefore, postpone the evil day, the day of burden, but let us prepare to pay what we can. Suppose, said he, we postpone this debt—make no exertions to pay it, and, in the course of ten years, we have another war, what will be the consequence? Another hundred millions will perhaps be added to the public debt; for in war our debt always increases. Peace is the time—yes, sir, peace is the time to pay it off, and if you lose the opportunity of doing so, it has fled forever. Let profusion in your concerns prevail; postpone the payment of the debt; let war come; another one hundred millions added; and what then? We have some hope of managing a debt of a hundred millions; the nation can bear that; but add another hundred, and we sink under it. We shall be compelled then to resort to direct and heavy taxes. He said it would be better policy to levy a tax now and pay off the debt, than to postpone and suffer it to grow and waste the substance of the nation; that direct taxes were the most injurious to our country; that they were the most unproductive of any other, according to the amount levied; that they introduced among the people a swarm of assessors and collectors that harassed and perplexed them; and, besides, said he, they exhaust by commissions, fees, and defalcations, a great amount of the money thus drawn from the people. We must, he said, somehow, rid the nation of this debt. A direct tax at this time, he said, was utterly out of the question; it could not be borne now; the only resort left is to retrench and reform as far as we can. After this is done, we shall be able to estimate what we shall fall short in meeting the debt when it falls redeemable; and the increase of the revenue, in the meantime, will be better ascertained, and give us a more certain standard by which to calculate its annual results; for it is rising now, it is hoped, from its lowest ebb. And if, said he, after all these precautions and preparations, we shall not be able to redeem the whole of the debt, it will be time enough then to resort to the measure of postponement, and we shall be better able to see what will be the best course to pursue; and he hoped we should not, from three to six years beforehand, pronounce upon the inability of the nation to pay the debt; it was too humiliating; and, besides, he trusted it would turn out differently. He insisted no good was likely to result from the measure, and he did most sincerely hope the bill would again be rejected.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed, that, although the bill before the House, even as it had been amended, did not please him in all its details, yet, imperfect as it was in his estimation, he deemed it in principle to be a measure so advantageous to the country that it should receive his decided support. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. JOHNSON) has complained that the friends of retrenchment, of whom he professed to be one of the most zealous, were denounced as radicals and enemies of the present Administration. Mr. B. was utterly at a loss to know what application such remarks had to the subject under discussion. If they had any, for one he could observe, that denunciations of this kind would have no terrors for him. He neither desired nor expected any favor from the Administration; and he trusted that, whilst he held the high and honorable station of a Representative of the people, he should neither wish nor ask for any other distinction. He was, therefore, alike indifferent whether he was called a radical or an ultra.

Mr. B. said, that the present amount of the national debt might be stated, for the sake of even numbers, at $93,000,000. $63,000,000 of this sum is the balance of the war loans yet remaining unpaid, and bearing an interest of six and of seven per cent. per annum. This balance will be redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, in the years 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828. The measure proposed by the present bill is an exchange of $26,000,000 of this stock, upon which the Government now pays an interest of six and seven per cent. for stock to that amount, bearing an interest of five per cent. and not redeemable until 1830, 1831, 1832, and 1833. This exchange, in all human probability, can now be effected. The only question, therefore, to be decided, is the policy of the measure.

It is said by its enemies that this bill should not pass, because it will deprive the Government of the power of redeeming $26,000,000 of the public debt, during the years in which it will become due. If the slightest prospect existed that we should be able to pay the $63,000,000, during those years, then, said Mr. B., I admit this would be a conclusive objection to the bill. Unquestionably we should not deprive ourselves of the opportunity of discharging our debts, whenever we shall have the ability. But does any gentleman, however sanguine he may be in his calculations, really believe that our revenue, during the years 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828, will be sufficient to defray the current expenses of the Government, to pay the interest of the whole of the national debt, and sink $63,000,000 of the principal? During each of the two last years our debt has been increased upwards of $2,000,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, has informed us, that until 1825, the year when the first of the war loans may be redeemed, he does not calculate that our ordinary receipts will enable him to do more than meet the ordinary expenses of Government, the interest of the national debt, and the payment to the public creditors of the small balance yet unpaid of the deferred six per cent. stock. That officer, we are informed by the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, now believes, from the late improvement in the revenue, that the $2,000,000 of six per cent. stock owned by the Bank of the United States, may also be discharged during the intermediate years. This, however, is the utmost extent, beyond which our most sanguine expectations have not carried us.

If you should delay making such a provision as that contemplated by this bill until 1825, what will then be your situation? During that and the three subsequent years, you will either have a debt of $63,000,000 to discharge, or you will be compelled to pay for it an interest of six per cent. If you pay the amount, you must provide the means, by resorting to loans; and your necessities will then compel you to borrow so much at once, that the value of money will be raised in the market and you will not be able to obtain it at so cheap a rate as it can now be procured. Is it not, therefore, infinitely more politic to make the contemplated exchange of $26,000,000 at the present time, when it can be done upon advantageous terms, than, under existing circumstances to trust to the future?

Should this exchange be effected to its full extent there will still remain $37,000,000, which we may pay in 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828; upwards of $9,000,000 each year. This sum so greatly exceeds that portion of the Sinking Fund applicable to the payment of the principal of the debt during those years, even should it be in operation to the full extent at present contemplated by law, that we shall then be obliged to borrow large sums of money. This bill is calculated to divide the pressure. Let us now make an exchange of a part upon good terms; and by doing so we shall secure to ourselves infinitely better terms for the balance in 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828, than we could otherwise expect.

H. OF R.

Exchange of Stocks.

Mr. B. said, he believed this to be the auspicious moment for making the exchange. Trade is reviving, and the demand for money becoming consequently greater. Should we realize the commercial advantages which we expect from our declaration, that the South American provinces are free and independent, new avenues will be opened for mercantile enterprise, and for the employment of that capital which now remains idle. The interest of money must rise as the demand for it increases. On the other hand, if Spain should, in violation of the principles of justice and of the laws of nations, declare war against us for recognising the independence of her colonies, or even threaten it, the necessary result must be a depression in the price of your stocks. The experience of every country, in a state of actual or probable war, proves the truth of this position. This, then, appears to be the favorable time which, if we suffer to pass away, may never again return.

The immediate effect of this exchange will be an annual saving of $260,000. My friend from Kentucky, said Mr. B., who is so laudably desirous of introducing economy in the expenditure of public money, should have included this item in his calculations.

The present bill, we have been informed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, is a financial measure of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, although the opinion of that officer, even in matters of finance, should not be authority; yet, from his character and official station, it is entitled to much weight. When there is doubt—when the judgment is nearly balanced, it should at least turn the scale. If Congress reject this measure, thus recommended, and if we shall be compelled to accept much worse terms in 1825 than the bill proposes, our constituents would have a just right to complain of our conduct.

It has been urged that the provisions of this bill are immoral in their nature, and will tend to introduce a system of wagering on future contingencies. It appears to me, however, that there is not the slightest foundation for this objection. Would the most rigid casuist consider, that the man who had borrowed money some years ago at the rate of six per cent. per annum, which will become due three years hence, is liable to an imputation of dishonesty if now, when money is worth less than five per cent., he offers to his creditor to extend the time of payment to eight years, provided he will accept that rate of interest from the date of the arrangement. This is precisely the proposal of Government as contained in the present bill.

Mr. B. concluded, by expressing his decided opinion that, in whatever view this bill could be presented it would be beneficial to the country, and, therefore, he hoped it might pass.

Mr. FULLER expressed his sentiments against the bill, and, among other objections, he urged that it provided for giving to one class of the public creditors an advantage over another, by permitting the holders of stocks of different loans and value to come in and avail themselves of a common privilege. He remarked that, if the state of the stock market should be the same two years hence as at present, this would be a losing bargain, and he thought the chances of its favorable fluctuation was not such as to authorize the calculations of the friends of the bill.

Mr. WOODSON, of Kentucky, observed that he rose to address the House at this stage of the bill, not with a view of trespassing long on its patience in the discussion of a subject which he had hoped a few days since was finally disposed of, and the reconsideration of which was not to be anticipated. However, in the vicissitude of events, it has so happened that it is again presented; and a sense of imperious duty compelled him to solicit their indulgence whilst he briefly expressed his own, and, he believed, the sentiments of those by whose confidence he was honored with a seat in this House.

This bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, on behalf of the Government, to propose to a specific class of its creditors an exchange of $26,000,000 of stock, bearing an interest of 5 per cent. for a like amount of 6 and 7 per cent. stock; and the only inducement held out to present selected stockholders, is the extension of the term of redemption some four or five years.

A single moment's reflection on the character of the measure produces the conviction that it is nothing more or less than a loan in disguise, and that, too, by anticipation.

The people, whose will he is bound to obey, judging from lessons of experience, condemn the habit of resorting to loans in times of profound peace, to sustain the operations of Government, or any measure calculated to rivet upon them or their posterity an immense debt, which they are not as yet prepared to admit is a national blessing. In the hour of war and difficulty, it is true, their patriotism and devotion create an inexhaustible fund, upon which their representatives may draw, with confidence, unlimited bills of credit. But, when the tempest has subsided, and serenity succeeds, they in return require that prudence and economy should be observed, and aid in relieving them from accumulated pressure. They will not be satisfied with empty professions; they act when necessary, and we, as their faithful representatives, ought to follow their example.

A Government is justly assimilated by them to an individual, and the same results relied on from the same causes. What would public sentiment pronounce, then, of an individual who managed his private concerns in a manner requiring a habitual resort to bank accommodations or loans to defray his ordinary expenses, or discharge his debts? To say the least, it would negative the idea of his prudence, and calculate with certainty on his ultimate embarrassment and humiliation.

Exchange of Stocks.

This system of measures, he contended, created and confirmed a moneyed aristocracy in the country, distinct and separate in their feelings and interest from the great mass of the community—influencing, as he feared, at this moment, and hereafter destined to give tone and character to all our national measures; to cause luxury, extravagance, and idleness, to supplant the virtuous republican manners, the economy, the active enterprise, and hardy labor of our ancestors—sap the public virtue, and ultimately demolish the Government of the people. Should they stop short of those dreadful results, they will at least paralyze the public enterprise and retard its prosperity, by diverting the capital of the country from permanent establishments, requiring labor, care, and ingenuity, and yielding but a moderate though sure profit, into funded debt. Wealth is power—money is said to be the sinew of war. Place the purse or the credit of the nation in the hands of a privileged few, or of foreigners, and sooner or later the sword will accompany it. These may be considered by some as groundless speculations—idle fears. They are such as were entertained by the founders of our Republic, and the experience of other countries has too frequently witnessed their sad reality. Can the nation tolerate the humiliating idea of being the debtors, and consequently subject to the supercilious interference and control of a foreign nation, jealous of our rising greatness? If not, let me entreat this House to pause before they adopt this measure; for I venture to predict, if the exchange is effected, by far the greater portion of the stock will be exported to, and disposed of in, a foreign country—remitted, in other and more specific language, to England.

If this event be not only possible, but highly probable, from the unfavorable rate of exchange against us, and we should hereafter come in collision with that Power, and it becomes necessary to vindicate our insulted honor, or maintain our rights, can we resort to war? Indeed, can we assume, in any respect, the proud and elevated attitude of an independent, high-minded nation? No. That same honor would suspend the arm of vengeance until the debt was paid.

But, some gentlemen have said that the Government would acquire additional strength and security; that your enemy would be interested in preserving peace, to prevent a confiscation of their debts. This is by no means a novel idea; experience has long since proved its fallacy.

Their influence will be exerted to depress the public spirit, and obtain from us dishonorable concessions. They know full well that the sacredness of public debt has been settled by universal consent, and that no nation dare to violate it.

It is unnecessary to dwell on consequences so obvious and awful.

What is the pressing emergency, the dire necessity, requiring such despatch—this sudden risk of public credit?

Why this reversal of the pleasing prospects of our increasing commerce and prosperous condition of our revenue—the fond hope of the speedy and actual payment of our national debt, presented and received with so much eclat at the commencement of our session? Were they designed to be delusive? It would be uncharitable to believe so. If not, why is it that our Government is now represented as a vessel in a dead calm, and an experienced helmsman warning the crew of a distant speck in the horizon, the harbinger of an approaching storm? I cannot perceive. But, if the present side of the picture be the real one, let us profit by experience; haul in our sails; make the vessel tight and snug, and she will still ride the waves in safety. Do not the pride and dignity of the Government revolt at the idea of being placed at the mercy of brokers, bankmen, usurers, stockjobbers, and money-dealers of every character, some of whom, I suppose it would be admitted, were governed exclusively by their views of profit and loss, or ambition, and with whom patriotism will be but as a feather in the balance?

When was the real money-lender's heart known to soften at distress, or his demands lowered by the extent of your necessities? How often does a candid acknowledgment of your inability to pay enable you to obtain more favorable terms on the solicited renewal of your bond? Let those who have experienced the blessings of bank accommodations, or the indulgences of the most polite creditors, respond.

Gentlemen are requested to reflect, and fathom, if they can, the depth and extent of the wound they will inflict on the national character and credit, if the proffered boon should be rejected. To him it seemed there existed an astonishing apathy on this branch of the subject. It is viewed with apparent unconcern, as a mere experiment. If crowned with success—all the stock exchanged—we will gain by the operation two millions! And if it should fail, say gentlemen, we shall be in statu quo. Can this be possible? Is the preservation of our honor nothing? Are we thus at liberty to sport with our reputation for the mere chance of gaining that sum, paltry in a national point of view? If that amount alone is wanting to sustain us, the danger is not imposing, and we may safely rely on the people for its supply. Commerce is admitted by all to be reviving, and the demand for money rapidly increasing. Will five per cent., under such circumstances, satiate mercantile cupidity? Or can it be imagined that they will abandon a favorite and lucrative pursuit to invest their capital in the funds upon the terms proposed? Judging from human nature, he would suppose not. Yet he was so little habituated to nicety of calculation, he was bound to yield the minutiae to the gentleman from New York, whose profound knowledge on those topics had been so forcibly evinced. His main reliance, however, was on general principles, and he must be pardoned for refusing to pin his faith to any gentleman's sleeve. Now is said to be the accepted time, and if we fail to embrace it, the opportunity to make so good a bargain may never again present itself.

Are we then reduced to the necessity of huckstering, bartering away our funds? Where, we may inquire, is the never-sleeping vigilance, the superior intelligence, of that class of the community, and their most devoted Representative, the defender of their interest in this Assembly—one who not only speaks, but has written, with so much ability in their cause?

Are they ignorant, do you imagine, of the real state of our finances—our ability to meet, or not, with promptness, our engagements? Is it fairly to be presumed that they are idle spectators, or lend a deaf ear to the appalling picture of our future wants—to the desponding declamation of our Congressional orators? No. He feared the arguments advanced—the coloring used to induce you to propose—will occasion them to reject the offer. They will not be blind to their interest, and will either accept or reject as it may dictate. They know that sixty-three millions are redeemable in the years 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828.

Gentlemen have contended that the price of stock is regulated by the protracted period of redemption, and imagine that the extension of it five or six years will effect the object. This argument vanishes if there be soundness in that so repeatedly urged and reiterated, that the Government will be unable to redeem its debt by the appointed time. If permanency of the stock therefore be the desideratum, six and seven per cents. will not be relinquished for fives, should the melancholy predictions of gentlemen be verified.

Justice is one of the brightest ornaments in our national escutcheon—our true policy—and it appears to have been lost sight of in the proposed arrangement by the selection of particular stockholders. For what reason is it that you make the discrimination? Can we say that the present owners of the stock proposed to be exchanged are more meritorious, or have any particular claims to our liberality—more patriotic in their advances to the Government than others? The whole or far the greater part was created to support a just, necessary, and a glorious war, and they are equally entitled to the gratitude and justice of the country. Why then not throw open the door of competition, and permit all who choose to enter and participate in the advantages, and thereby prevent a dangerous and unwarrantable monopoly of our funds?

If this possession be beneficial, scatter those benefits like the gentle dew of heaven, which may be gradually absorbed. Do not confine and limit and concentrate a mighty mass in a single channel, which, from its weight and depth, may prove destructive in its course. Is it not likely that your selection may fall upon the least meritorious of our creditors—those who, as a business, speculate upon the ebb and flow of circumstances affecting our prosperity.

This he considered as a most critical and unfavorable time to place ourselves in such hands, to be proclaiming as it were from the house tops, our weakness; to test the extent of our national credit; to transport our funded debt. We have assumed the noble attitude of a band of brothers, a united nation, in an act, second only in grandeur and importance to the declaration of our own independence, and it becomes us to evince to the world a just, though dignified and modest confidence in the rectitude of our motives, and our real ability, with the will of Heaven, to sustain it. It is impolitic and unwise to be sounding false alarms, or exaggerating our difficulties, or boasting too much of our energy.

He denied that it was permissible for a Government at any time to enter the market, and speculate upon its credit. But in this instance it would be particularly objectionable; in his estimation discreditable. The stocks were created by the patriotism of the nation; if we are compelled to make the exchange, honesty is the best policy; our true interest and honor would dictate that we propose to do so, without requiring any other advantage than time.

The Secretary of the Treasury displays a laudable confidence in the national resources; he presents, to be sure, the present scheme to our consideration, but it is in the alternative, and he appears to entertain no doubt of our ability, if necessary, hereafter to accomplish the same object more advantageously by the issue of new stock.

If it be true that commerce is reviving, of which there seems to be no doubt, we shall be enabled, I trust, to meet our engagement, and sustain our national honor without resorting to either. Upon every view of the subject which he could take, it appeared to him to be a gilded pill, which he confessed his nerves were not sufficiently braced to recommend, even as a tonic, believing as he did that it is contrary to our true policy, and to the will of that portion of the people to whom he is responsible, and that the nation is by no means so debilitated as to require it. He therefore hoped the measure would not be adopted.

Mr. McDUFFIE said, that it was not a matter of surprise that a very great diversity of opinion should prevail in relation to the proposition before the House; nor, was it a matter of surprise that, on a financial question of some novelty, involving the consideration of millions of the public debt, the House should not only feel a deep interest, but considerable doubts and difficulties. But, he said, he was much surprised when he saw the two gentlemen from Kentucky (Mr. F. JOHNSON and Mr. WOODSON) adding to the intrinsic difficulties of the question by the introduction of topics foreign to its merits. One of those gentlemen (Mr. WOODSON) had boldly disclaimed all regard to financial calculations, and, in doing so, had distinctly disclaimed all regard to the only considerations that ought to have any weight with the House. And he confessed that, after this broad disclaimer on the part of that gentleman, he was not surprised at the wide and excursive range which he had taken in the debate. But, sir, said he, this is essentially a financial question, and I cannot conceive how we can determine whether or not it is expedient to adopt it, if we do not descend to the business of calculation. We must inquire, What is the amount of the public debt? When will it be redeemable at the pleasure of the Government? And what then will be the probable capacity of the Government to effect the redemption? Now it is admitted on all hands, and, if it were not admitted, it is apparent from the official documents before us, that, during the years 1825, 6, 7, and 8, sixty-three millions of the public debt, bearing an interest of six and seven per cent., will become redeemable. It is equally apparent that the surplus which shall remain of the ordinary revenue, after defraying the current expenses of the Government, and discharging the interest of the national debt, will not be sufficient to redeem within fifty millions of the sum that will be thus redeemable. Sir, when these two propositions are granted, which no gentleman has denied or can deny, it requires no great powers of logic to deduce the consequences. They are clear and inevitable. We must either raise a revenue of fifty millions of dollars by direct taxation, between this time and the year 1828, or we must procrastinate the period fixed for the redemption of the public debt.

The former alternative is quite out of the question. No gentleman would seriously recommend so enormous a tax for such an object, at a time when we are but just recovering from the most overwhelming pecuniary embarrassment that ever befel a prosperous nation—an embarrassment, too, which we must trace to that very war in which this debt was contracted. Indeed one, or perhaps both of the gentlemen from Kentucky, took occasion to deprecate a resort to direct taxes, in the very act of opposing, upon the broadest principles, the only measure by which such taxes can be avoided. This seemed to involve an inconsistency which he thought it would be difficult to explain. But, said he, as it is granted that a direct tax is not contemplated, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that we must procrastinate the period at which the public debt shall be redeemable; and it only remains to be determined how this can be effected on terms most advantageous to the Government. It may be reasonably estimated, as already intimated, that there will be fifty millions of the public debt, bearing an interest of six and seven per cent. which will be redeemable at or before the year 1828, and which the Government cannot then redeem. In this state of things the public creditors ask it as a favor that we should not pay them the principal of their debt, and tell us that, if we will throw forward the period of redemption, they will take five per cent. instead of six and seven. In other words, they will exchange their six and seven per cent. stock, redeemable four or five years hence, for five per cent. stock, redeemable ten or twelve years hence. And shall we not accede to this proposition? Is it not better that we should pay five per cent. than six and seven per cent.?

But an honorable gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. TOMLINSON,) had, on a former day, used a very plausible and imposing argument on this point—an argument which had made a strong impression upon the House, and which, for the moment, Mr. McD. said, made a similar impression upon him. But he was prepared to show that the gentleman's argument, when pushed to its full extent, would lead to a result different from that which he had supposed. He understood the gentleman to contend that we ought to wait until the six and seven per cent. stocks become redeemable, and then open a new loan to raise the money to redeem them. And, said the gentleman, as the six and seven per cents. will, of course, be at par, it will follow that, if the five per cents. remain as at present, nine or ten per cent. above par, we shall gain, by postponing the operation, a sum equal to the aggregate amount that the five per cents. will produce above their par value. But, he said, the fallacy of this argument consisted in the supposition that the value of the five per cent. stock will not be diminished by increasing the quantity in market. The price of stocks, like that of every other article, depends upon the relation subsisting between the supply and demand. Indeed, the gentleman himself very justly ascribed the present high price of the five per cents. to the smallness of the amount in market. And when he told us we should depress their price by the proposed exchange, which will substantially throw twenty-six millions into the market, it is strange that he did not extend his view a little further. If he had done so, he would, doubtless, have seen that a much greater depression would be produced by suddenly throwing into the market fifty millions five or six years hence. What, said Mr. McD., would be the situation of the Government, and what the interest of the public creditors? The Government would come into the market to obtain a loan for so large an amount, with a declaration of insolvency, as the only inducement it could offer the public creditors to subscribe to the new loan. What would be the conduct of the creditors? They would use every effort and resort to every combination to prevent the Government from obtaining favorable loans. For, as they would be the holders of six and seven per cent. stock, which the Government could redeem only by loans, they would have a deep interest in preventing a loan at a lower rate of interest, whereby they would, in effect, lose their stock, or have the interest proportionably reduced. Mr. McD. appealed to those who were familiar with the vicissitudes of the money market, and the operations of borrowing and lending, to say how great would be the effect which the holders of fifty millions of stock might produce on the price of stock. Suppose, said he, the Government should propose to effect a loan to that amount by the issue of five per cent. stock. The very fact that the holders of the six and seven per cents. should refuse to subscribe to the new stock, would so far diminish the demand and the competition, that its price would be greatly depressed. And he would venture to predict that, if this bill should not pass, the five per cent. stocks, for which we can now obtain the six and seven per cents., (thereby saving in interest between one and two millions of dollars,) will, at the end of four or five years, be at par, if not lower.

It is then, said he, the obvious dictate of prudence to anticipate and obviate embarrassments in our finances by timely arrangements. By throwing the five per cent. stock gradually into the market by successive operations, that depression in its value would be avoided, which an opposite course would most certainly produce. The amount which we now propose to exchange is not much more than half the sum that will be redeemable in 1825, '6, '7, and '8; and there will, of course, be a sufficient sum left to give full operation to all the surplus revenue which we can reasonably anticipate.

A gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. WOODSON,) had edified the House, Mr. McD. said, with many profound political truths, liable, however, to the objection that they did not happen to relate to the question before the House. That gentleman had denounced, with great emphasis, all moneyed aristocracies; but, what had that to do with the question? Are the public creditors a moneyed aristocracy? Or, if they are, does this bill increase the evil? Does it propose to incorporate them? Or can the gentleman really believe they will be more aristocratical or more dangerous because we shall pay them only five per cent., instead of six and seven per cent.? Both of the gentlemen from Kentucky had indulged themselves in vague and general declamation against a public debt. But, said he, how unprofitable is it to declaim against what we cannot avoid! The debt already exists. It was contracted for the purpose of prosecuting the late war with Great Britain. Do the gentlemen seriously think it ought not to have been contracted? Do they disapprove of the measure which gave rise to it? They will assuredly say no. Then can any man believe the war could have been carried on without loans?

Sir, said he, as long as we depend exclusively upon foreign commerce for revenues, a war must, in the very nature of things, annihilate our financial resources, and we must be dependent upon loans. The distribution of the capital and labor of the country must be entirely changed, so that our revenue shall be derived from internal sources, before we can, during war, raise any thing like the amount of revenue necessary to meet the public exigencies. A large debt must be contracted, and when peace comes it only remains for a prudent government to pay it off as rapidly as it can, without subjecting the people to heavy burdens when they are least able to sustain them.

But an honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. F. JOHNSON) seems to imagine that, if we adopt this measure, we shall commit ourselves against making the necessary retrenchments in the public expenditure. It is an easy matter, said Mr. McD., to declaim, in general terms, about economy and retrenchment; but let him bring forward his specific propositions, and, if he would point out a rotten limb in the system, he, Mr. McD., would co-operate, heart and hand, in its amputation. For, while he should firmly and fearlessly resist all projects which should endanger the efficiency of those establishments which were essential to the independence and safety of the country, he was as deeply impressed as the gentleman from Kentucky with the importance of avoiding a wasteful expenditure of the public money. It would be no argument against a retrenchment dictated by sound policy, that the embarrassments of the Treasury did not compel us to resort to it.

And he had sufficient confidence in the good sense of Congress, that they would make all the necessary reforms, without being driven to it by an imperative necessity.

Upon the whole, he thought this a measure of forecast and wisdom, and hoped it would be adopted.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, remarked that he had no feeling on this subject; he viewed the proposed exchange of stocks, merely as a prudent financial measure, and had therefore always been in favor of the bill. And as the gentlemen from Kentucky, who spoke first, (Mr. JOHNSON,) had, by a sort of general challenge, called upon its friends to point out those future changes in the circumstances of the country, on which they justified the measure, he would briefly state the considerations which influenced him. Mr. T. said he was friendly to the bill, under the persuasion that the interest of money would rise in this country; consequently, that stocks would fall; for he agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. FULLER,) that we should gain or lose by the exchange, according to the price which our five per cent. stock may bear in the market, when the six and seven per cents. became redeemable. Thus, if, in 1826, our five per cent. stock should bring six per cent. above par, then, as we save by the exchange two per cent. per annum, for three years, in the payment of interest, it comes to nearly the same thing; and if our five per cents. should be higher, then we should lose. But he thought there was much greater probability of their falling.

Mr. T. said that there were two very different causes for the fall in the interest of money—one was the gradual accumulation of large capitals in the hands of individuals, during a long course of prosperity, such as existed in England and Holland, when interest had gradually declined from ten per cent. to eight, to six, to four, and, he believed that, in Amsterdam, large sums may be now borrowed as low as three per cent. He said, the same cause operated in this country, and in every period of twenty or thirty years, by the accumulation of private wealth, interest may be expected to fall. But, he said, there was another cause, which was the sudden change in the circumstances of a country, by which that capital which had been actively employed, had become idle and redundant; and he contended that the last was the cause of the low rate of interest in this country; that it was the effect of comparative adversity, rather than prosperity; that we had now lost much of that extensive and gainful commerce we had lately enjoyed, which had made more capital in the country than could immediately find profitable investment. But, whenever interest is low from this cause, it cannot be permanent. If our commerce should revive, of which there were some present symptoms and encouraging prospects, then much of the money, now vested in the funds, will be demanded for mercantile pursuits, by which, of course, the natural interest of money will rise, and stock will fall. But if, on the other hand, the present stagnation of commerce should continue, then the present redundancy of capital is constant—ly diminishing. In the natural course of things, it will seek other investments; it will find employment in manufactures, or in the purchase of Western lands. It will be subdivided among children, or will melt away and be consumed. The present low rate of interest, less than five per cent., is not its natural state in this country, which has so many modes of absorbing capital, as fast as it can be created, it cannot last; and whether our commerce improves or falls off, or continues as it is, the natural interest of money must shortly rise from what it now is.

MARCH, 1822.

Exchange of Stocks.

H. OF R.

But the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON,) said, that, if our trade should experience that extension that the friends of this bill anticipated, our revenue would proportionally improve; in which case, we should have money lying idle in the Treasury, before these new five per cents. should be redeemable. But, said Mr. T. the gentleman forgets that though the debt is not redeemable by law, it may be purchased by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and that, on the supposed contingency of an increase of commerce, interest would rise, and stock fall, so that if we have any superfluous money in the Treasury, we may buy in the stock before it is redeemable, and buy it under par, by which course this measure will prove doubly beneficial.

Mr. T. adverted to an argument that had been first used by a gentleman from New York, (Mr. TRACY,) and afterwards urged with much force and success by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) that this exchange was like a wager between the stockholders and the Government, as to the price of the stocks three or four years hence. Mr. T. said, this view had made much impression on him at first, but he then thought the argument was rather specious than solid. In such a wager, he admitted that many of the money holders would have the advantage, and the present high price of five per cent stock, payable at a distant day, was not the mere result of calculations of futurity—it was produced, like every thing else, by the proportion between the supply and the demand. There are more lenders than borrowers—the money holders get six per cent. if they can; if not, they will take five, or less, rather than let their money lie idle—and, in the uncertainty whether they can find employment for their money three or four years hence, when the Government shall pay them off, they will, in general, make the exchange, though some of them should make the same calculations of the future that we do. Besides, Mr. T. said, as the prudence of this measure depends on a contingency, and interest was now confessedly unusually low, he thought we ought, like prudent individuals, to divide the risk—and, as we could not pay off the whole public debt for some years, to make an immediate reduction of the interest, when we had it fairly in our power to do so. Mr. T. adverted to Mr. FULLER's objection, said that he liked the bill better with the amendment of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) than in its present shape; but as it is now modified, the Secretary of the Treasury might require a portion of the stock redeemable in 1827, and 1828, as well as that redeemable in 1825 and 1826, or give a preference to the former, so as to remove the objection of putting the holders of both stocks on the same footing.

Mr. T. said he had intended to reply to the arguments of the gentleman from Kentucky, who spoke last, (Mr. WOODSON,) but on reflection, he should decline it, as he presumed that the answers which had so readily presented themselves to his mind, had not escaped the mind of others. He said, that that honorable gentleman must have viewed this financial measure under the strong bias of feeling, or he never could have made some of the objections he had urged. He could not have supposed that the Bank of the United States could become the holders of the proposed five per cent. stock, as their charter forbids them to purchase stock—nor would he have made it an objection that we might be unfortunately involved in a war with Great Britain, and then twenty-six millions of our stock might be held in that country. Mr. T. said, in such an event, their holding the evidences of our debt could give them no advantage over us—and remarked, that the objection reminded him of a story he had somewhere read, that a party of insurgents, in Ireland, getting into their hands a large quantity of the notes of an unpopular banker, destroyed them, by way of doing him an injury. Mr. T. said he was as much a friend to economy and retrenchment as the gentleman from Kentucky, and it was because he was so, that he was friendly to this bill, and should vote for it.

Mr. FULLER explained his remarks, which he thought had been misapprehended by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TUCKER.)

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, commented at length, in an able and lucid manner, upon the observations that had been made by the gentlemen who had severally expressed their sentiments against the bill. Finally the question was taken on its passage, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 55, as follows:

MONDAY, April 1.

Mr. KEYES presented a petition of David B. Lee, of the city of Philadelphia, setting forth that he is the original inventor of the "flying machine," mentioned in the petition of James Bennett, presented to this House on the 25th instant, and praying that no right or privilege may be granted to said Bennett on account of said invention, but that Congress would grant to him and his heirs and assigns, for such length of time as Congress may think proper, the exclusive right and privilege of navigating the atmosphere, either with "flying machines" or with "navigable balloons," throughout the United States.—Referred to the committee appointed on the petition of James Bennett.

Mr. CAMBRELENG presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, complaining of the unnecessary severity of the operation of the act of Congress of the 20th of April, 1818, entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed 2d day of March, 1799.'"

Mr. SERGEANT presented a petition of Anthony Gale, Lieutenant Colonel Commandant of the Marine Corps, complaining of the manner of conducting, and of the result of the trial, by which he was removed from his command of said corps, and praying that a new trial may be ordered, and that he may be heard in his defence.—Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WARFIELD presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the counties of Frederick and Washington, in the State of Maryland, praying for the aid of Congress in making a turnpike road from the City of Washington to Fredericktown, in Maryland; which petition was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to provide for the appointment of an additional judge for the Michigan Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the Message of the President of the United States transmitting a report of the Secretary of War in relation to a private claim to a piece of land in the river Delaware, known by the name of the Pea Patch; and that the said Message and report do lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, in obedience to the instructions of the House reported a bill making appropriation to defray the expenses of missions to the independent nations on the American continent; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. F. JOHNSON, from the select committee to which was committed the bill to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory, reported the same with amendment, and the bill and amendments were ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the claim of Abner L. Duncan, for professional services in the suits brought against General Flournoy for embargoing Spanish vessels in 1812 and 1813, and to report thereon.

Mr. CONDIOT moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That, for the purpose of bringing the present session of Congress to a more speedy close, the stated hour of meeting of this House shall hereafter be 10 o'clock in the morning.

Ordered to lie on the table.

The engrossed joint resolution, relative to the disposition of the national paintings, executed by Colonel Trumbull, was read a third time and passed.

The House, on motion of Mr. SERGEANT took into consideration the bill to alter the times of holding the Courts in the Western District of Virginia, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to abolish the United States' trading establishment with the Indian tribes;" and "An act to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage in Florida, and for other purposes." They have also passed a joint resolution directing a temporary deposit of the national paintings in certain committee rooms of the Senate; in which bills and resolution they ask the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the incidental expenses incurred in the Land Offices in St. Louis, Franklin, Huntsville, and Cahaba, in the year 1820, and the three first quarters of 1821; which were ordered to lie on the table.

WASHINGTON, February 26, 1822.

SIR: I have been instructed by my Court to call the attention of the Federal Government to the claim of the heirs of Beaumarchais. His Majesty's Government indulges a hope that their legitimate and well-founded rights will cease at least to be disputed, and that prejudices will yield at length to the influence of indisputable facts, especially when those prejudices are totally ungrounded, and have been abandoned by all those who have maturely examined the case.

The Beaumarchais claim was first produced in 1778.

The French Government has never ceased to support it with that interest which every Government owes to the just claims of its citizens. It has been earnestly recommended to Congress by Presidents Madison and Monroe.

Mr. Madison, in his Message of the 31st of January, 1817, expresses himself in the following terms:

"Considering that the sum of which the million of livres in question made a part was a gratuitous grant from the French Government to the United States, and the declaration of that Government that that part of the grant was put in the hands of M. de Beaumarchais as its agent, not as the agent of the United States, and was duly accounted for by him to the French Government; considering also the concurring opinions of two Attorneys General of the United States, that the said debit was not legally sustainable on behalf of the United States, I recommend the case to the favorable attention of the Legislature, whose authority alone can finally decide on it."

Mr. Monroe says, in his Message of January, 1818, "The claim of the representatives of the late Caron de Beaumarchais having been recommended to the favorable consideration of the Legislature by my predecessor in his Message to Congress of the 31st of January last, and concurring in the sentiments therein expressed, I now transmit copies of a new representation relative to it.

Mr. Gallatin, in his letter of the 2d of December, 1816, to the Duc de Richelieu, owns that a simple but explicit negative declaration on the part of His Majesty Government that the said million was not applied to the purchase of supplies furnished by M. de Beaumarchais to the United States would have removed the doubts entertained by the officers at the head of the Treasury Department when the account was settled there.

The Duc de Richelieu, whose veracity and loyalty are so well known, made the following answer to Mr. Gallatin on the 20th of December:

"I am therefore warranted, sir, after a fresh examination of the facts, in persisting in the declaration above stated, and in considering as a matter of certainty that the million paid on the 10th of June was not applied to the purchase of the shipments made to the United States at that period by M. de Beaumarchais." And, finally, the select committee charged with the examination of the business, and with reporting to Congress on the subject, acknowledge the rights of the heirs of Beaumarchais in the most solemn manner. "The committee" (says the reporter)

"have devoted much time, and made a laborious examination of the merits of this case; they have been able to discover no reason why the uniform declarations of the French Government should not be credited. There is no fact to contradict them."

"They fully agree with our great Revolutionary financier, Robert Morris, 'that, if any thing is due M. de Beaumarchais, the reputation of the country will be compromised until it is paid; that the payments of debts may be expensive, but that it is infinitely more expensive to withhold the payment. The former is an expense of money, when money may be commanded to defray it; but the latter involves the destruction of that source from which money can be derived when all other sources fail. That source, abundant, nay, almost inexhaustible, is public credit. The country in which it may with greatest ease be established and preserved is America; and America is the country which most stands in need of it.' In conclusion, the committee will remark that, in every point in which the case can be viewed by them, they are fully of opinion that the heirs of Beaumarchais are creditors of the United States."

To such an expose His Majesty's Government have nothing to add when they appeal to the equity of this Republic.

I have the honor to be, &c.

G. H. DE NEUVILLE.

The Baron de Neuville to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, February 27, 1822.

SIR: I forgot to add to my letter of yesterday relative to the heirs of Beaumarchais—

1. The memoir or recital of the affair to 1817.

2. The President's Message of the 16th of January, 1818.

These pieces, which I have the honor to transmit to you, form, with the report of the committee of the House of Representatives of the 24th of February, 1818, the whole of the necessary documents. If they be not judged sufficient, if a careful examination of them do not produce deep conviction, it must be admitted, sir, that there are some prejudices which can never be overcome.

I dare say that truth never appeared more evident than in this unfortunate and interminable affair; why then does it meet with so much opposition?

Moreover, the heirs of Beaumarchais know that they will not in vain appeal to the justice of their judges: prejudice will never be able to overcome justice in their hearts; they, therefore, confine themselves to request of them a strict, a very strict examination of their claim: they only say to them, "We are ruined, because our father rendered services to the Republic, and our right is forgotten. Be pleased to read very attentively, and your justice will proclaim our right."

Accept, sir, the renewed assurance of my high consideration.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE,
Envoy Extraordinary, &c.The Baron Hyde de Neuville to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, March 30, 1822.

SIR: A report was put into circulation about two years since that the heirs of Beaumarchais were no longer proprietors of their claim, and that it had been sold to a third party.

Even if this were true, it would not in any degree invalidate their title; but I can attest, in the most positive manner, that the report is perfectly ridiculous. The claim still remains the property of M. de Beaumarchais's daughter. I will add, that it is the hope; indeed, the only remaining hope of that interesting lady and of her family. Why should she cease to rely upon a title so perfectly legitimate? This would argue a want of confidence in the equity of a whole nation.

The daughter of M. de Beaumarchais must therefore hope that justice will at last be done to her, and that, after suffering many privations, she will at last be able to hand down to her children the inheritance of her father.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

The Message and documents were ordered to lie on the table.

SOUTH AMERICAN GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved a reconsideration of the vote taken on Saturday, by which permission was refused to the member from Virginia, (Mr. GARNETT,) to spread upon the Journals his reasons for voting against the resolutions of this House to recognise the independence of the South American Governments. After a few explanatory observations by Mr. GARNETT, the motion to reconsider was supported by Messrs. MERCER, WRIGHT, MOORE, of Alabama, and WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, when the question was taken thereon and carried.

Mr. TAYLOR called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered.

Mr. T. thought it would be a precedent of a dangerous nature for the House to authorize a practice of this kind. If a member has a right to record his reasons for voting in the negative, it would be equally the right of those who voted in the affirmative, to spread their reasons on the record. The only case to be found, of reasons for a vote being spread upon the Journal, was that of Mr. Poindexter, then a Delegate from the Territory of Mississippi, having no right to vote, and whose motion respecting his own opinions was to be found on record. But that case was altogether different from the present, though the Delegate was not in that permitted formally to record his opinion. In the present case the member has voted; yet even that case admitted of much controversy and question. The vote of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GARNETT,) was doubtless an independent and honest one, but he thought it inexpedient and improper to encumber the Journals with the speeches of members in support of their respective opinions.

Mr. MERCER thought the permission that had been granted to the gentlemen to vote the next day after this question had been decided, was affording a worse precedent than that which was now proposed.

Mr. FULLER remarked that this ought never to be a matter of courtesy, but should be either admitted or refused, as a matter of right at all times, and believing, as he did, that such a practice would be improper and inconvenient, he was opposed to its adoption.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, was in favor of the motion, and believed that no danger was to be apprehended from the precedent, for questions of such great magnitude very seldom occur.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, regarded the case of Mr. Poindexter to be a precedent of authority. So also was that of General Reed, who, on this very question had been permitted virtually to record his vote, even when absent from the House. And should it be said by a majority—if you will go with us, we will go to any length in assisting you to accomplish your wishes, but, if you have independence enough to vote in opposition to the sentiments of the House and the nation, we will withhold that privilege? Such a picture, he thought, ought not to be exhibited.

Mr. WARFIELD thought there could be no danger of the case being drawn into a precedent, for few questions occurred of so great importance as this, and it would always be in the power of the House to limit the privilege, if, in its operation, it should be found inconvenient. It was not now claimed on the ground of right, but of courtesy, and that courtesy had been accorded to several members of the House, in permitting them to vote after the time allowed by the rule.

Mr. TOMLINSON had made up his mind to vote in favor of the motion, but he would enter his protest against it as a precedent. He felt himself pressed to vote for it on the ground that similar indulgences had been granted to others on this question, but he regarded it as a principle, which, if allowed to acquire the authority of precedent, would be attended with very inconvenient consequences.

Mr. TAYLOR made a few remarks in reply, and was followed by Mr. COLDEN against the motion, and by Mr. GILMER in favor of it, when the question was taken thereon, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 71, as follows:

Mr. GARNETT then submitted his declaration, which he had reduced to an abbreviated substitute for that proposed by him on Saturday, to be entered on the Journal, which was as follows:

I, ROBERT S. GARNETT, a member from Virginia, make the following declaration: That I voted against the recognition of the independence of the late American provinces of Spain, because, considering it a question of policy, not of principle, I believed that no immediate advantage could grow out of it to either country, whilst many considerations, affecting the interest of both, rendered it at this time inexpedient. I am not opposed to the independence of the late provinces; on the contrary, in common with the rest of my countrymen, I heartily rejoice in its accomplishment, and in the prospects of freedom and happiness which it opens to them.

HORSES LOST IN THE SEMINOLE WAR.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Claims unfavorable to the memorial of the Legislature of Tennessee, claiming payment for horses lost in the Seminole campaign.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. J. JONES to strike out the word "not" in the resolution reported by the committee, so as to give it a direction favorable to the claim.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, explained and enforced the propriety of the report of the Committee of Claims, and opposed the motion in a speech of about three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, of Virginia, asked the indulgence of the Committee, while he submitted to its consideration a very brief view of the reasons which had determined him to vote for this claim. He remarked, that the standing committee of the House, to whom this subject was referred, having resolved "that the claim of the volunteers engaged in the Seminole campaign, presented in the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, ought not to be granted," and having in their report furnished us with the principles and reasoning upon which that resolution is founded, it now becomes our duty to say, whether that committee is right or wrong in the view it has taken of this subject. While, sir, I entertain a proper respect for the Committee of Claims, and have great confidence in its intelligence, I must be permitted to say, that the reasoning employed by them in the case before us, is not at all satisfactory to my mind, I will now attempt, in as concise a manner as possible, to show its fallacy. The second section of an act of Congress, passed on the 2d of January, 1795, gives to the soldier forty cents per day for the use and risk of his horse, arms, accoutrements, &c. Before we pronounce upon the merits of this claim, it seems to me to be important to ascertain, with as much precision as practicable, what was intended by the term risk, as used in the section to which I have just adverted. In the prosecution of a war, the soldier is liable to lose his horse by a variety of accidents; he may die from excessive fatigue, from unusually severe service, rendered necessary perhaps by the peculiar exigencies of the country, or he may escape from the possession of the owner and fall into the hands of the enemy, &c. For accidents of this character, which may happen, forty cents per day is provided. But, say the Committee of Claims, this law is susceptible of a more enlarged construction, and they tell us that the per diem compensation of forty cents was intended to embrace all losses of horses occasioned by the want of sufficient forage, and that such was the understanding of the soldier. With due deference to the opinion of that committee, this I do not and cannot believe. Such certainly could not have been the understanding of the soldier, because he knew the Government was bound to provide his horse with forage, he knew the pecuniary ability of the Government to make this provision, and he also knew that if it could not be had in one part of the country, it might be obtained in another, though perhaps at considerable expense. The express assurance of the Government that sufficient forage should be regularly furnished, seems to me necessarily to exclude the idea of a loss proceeding from the want of it. In this promise of the Government, the soldier reposed implicit confidence, and therefore in agreeing to accept forty cents per day, for the use and risk of his horse, did not at all look to a loss of the character we are now considering. The correct interpretation to be given to this law appears to me to be this. For all losses occasioned by the act of the Government, or rather a failure on its part to do that which it had engaged to do, it was intended the Government should be responsible, and the soldier agreed to encounter such casualties, and sustain such losses (horses killed in action excepted) as might happen, without any omission of duty or failure on the part of the Government—give to the law this construction, and you will give it full force and effect. I cannot, Mr. Chairman, agree with the committee in the opinion that the difficulty experienced by the Government in providing sufficient forage, legally excuses the non-performance of its stipulation. The promise to feed the soldier's horse was general, and subject to no condition or qualification whatsoever. Suppose this to be a case between two individuals, would or could it be pretended that the difficulty of executing the promise or contract would form any legal apology for the party who had failed to comply. Surely not. In illustration of this position, I beg leave to put the following case. A for a valuable consideration promises B to build him a house within a given period. Shortly after the contract, A experiences a sudden and unexpected change in his pecuniary circumstances; he is unable to provide workmen or to furnish the materials; the house is not built—B is injured by this violation of the contract, and brings his action to be compensated in damages equivalent to the injury sustained. Would it be competent for A to plead in bar of this action that he was unable to provide workmen or to furnish materials, and that therefore the house was not built? Surely not. The inadmissibility of such a defence must be conceded by every one who is at all conversant with legal principles. If, then, such a plea be inadmissible upon the violation of an individual contract, is it not, or ought it not to be, equally so in a case in which the Government is concerned? If it cannot protect an individual member of the community, why shall it shield the Government? And here, sir, permit me to remark that, in my legislative capacity, the same rules and principles which I apply to individuals I will make applicable to the Government under like circumstances. Justice is inflexible, and is equally stern in her demands upon the Government and upon the private citizen, however humble his condition in society may be.

I have, sir, read with some attention the memorial of the Legislature of Tennessee upon this subject, and it does seem to me that this claim is placed upon its true and proper basis by that memorial. The Legislature enforce it with very great propriety and much ability, upon the ground of a contract between the volunteer and the Government. They tell us that "service and fidelity 'was the engagement on the part of the volunteer; remuneration and maintenance of himself and his horse for the period of his engagement, the contract subsisting on the part of the Government." Has the volunteer performed his part of the contract? Yes, sir, most faithfully and honorably. His country's call was promptly obeyed. He was told his services were needed, and unhesitatingly surrendered all the endearments of social and domestic life, exchanged the comforts of a home and fireside for the dangers and difficulties of an Indian campaign, and intrepidly marched to the frontiers of your country to protect your defenceless wives and children against the tomahawk and scalping knife of a savage enemy. I will not, Mr. Chairman, attempt a description of his toils, his privations, and sufferings—suffice it to say, in the language of the memorial, "he met the enemy and subdued them." Thus, sir, has the volunteer performed his part of the contract, and performed it, too, with distinguished credit to himself, and honor to that country to which he now appeals for justice—yes, sir, for sheer justice. I hope the appeal will not be made in vain. How is it with the Government? Has it performed its part of the contract? No, sir. Look to the evidence of Quartermaster Gibson and Doctor Bronaugh. What do they tell you? They say, they verily believe the great loss of horses, during the Seminole campaign, was occasioned by the want of sufficient forage. Whose duty was it to provide this forage? The duty of the Government. Was it provided? No. Has the loss sustained in consequence of this failure been repaired? No. If then this claim can be properly regarded (as I think it may,) in the light of a contract between the Government and the volunteer—if the volunteer has performed his part of the contract; and if a failure on the part of the Government, to do that which it stipulated to do, is sufficiently established, I would ask upon what principle can it be successfully resisted? Others, indeed, may see that principle, but I confess I am totally at a loss to imagine the ground upon which it can be even plausibly contended that this claim ought to be rejected. The memorial alleges that, after the close of the campaign, under the order of General Jackson, a number of horses were recovered from the swamps of Florida, sold, and the proceeds of the sale, amounting to the sum of $2,142 45, applied to the credit of Government.

The Committee of Claims, after admitting the fact as stated, which, however, is abundantly proven without this admission, make this remark: "Heretofore this claim has been urged, on the 'ground that the United States failed to supply 'forage; but now it seems that the owners negligently and imprudently abandoned their horses.'" Is this so, sir? Is it true that the volunteers either negligently or imprudently abandoned their horses? If so, they are not entitled to relief. Is there, however, a tittle of evidence in support of this opinion of the committee? Is there a single fact which renders it even probable that the horses were negligently or imprudently abandoned by their owners? No, sir. The true cause of their abandonment is to be distinctly traced, not to any supposed negligence on the part of their owners, but to an actual failure on the part of the Government to supply them with sufficient forage. The Government, having thus, by this omission of duty, compelled the volunteers of Tennessee to abandon their horses, and having subsequently obtained possession of them, sold them, and passed the proceeds of the sale to the Treasury of the United States, cannot now refuse to pay this demand without subjecting itself to the charge of taking advantage of its failure to do that which it had pledged itself to do. But, say the Committee of Claims, the most urgent reason for the rejection of this claim is to be found in the fact, that the paymaster, contrary to law, furnished the troops with clothing, or money in lieu of clothing, and this by way of offset. Unfortunately, however, for this very urgent reason, the paragraph which introduces it, discloses the information that this item has been stricken from the account of the paymaster, upon a settlement with the proper officer of the Government. The Government, therefore, will not lose one dollar, no, not one cent, on this account. The paymaster is liable to the Government for a faithful and correct discharge of his duties; and he, by a resort to legal process, may compel the volunteers to refund all moneys received without proper authority.

Upon advertng, Mr. Chairman, to the Claims' Law of 1816, I find the following provision made by its first section: "That any volunteer or drafted

'militiaman, whether of cavalry, mounted rifle-men, or infantry, who, in the late war between the United States and Great Britain, has sustained damage by the loss of any horse which has been killed in battle, or which has died in consequence of a wound therein received, or in consequence of failure on the part of the United States to furnish such horse with sufficient forage, while in the military service of the United States, shall be allowed and paid the value thereof.'

The committee will observe, that this law is confined, in its operation, to the late war with Great Britain; but, sir, the same steady and impartial justice which dictated this provision in favor of the soldier of that war, requires a like provision for him who fought your battles in 1818. Why make a distinction? Why make an odious, invidious distinction? Why give to the one and withhold from the other? They have both served you faithfully and honorably. They have both defended your rights in the hour of danger. They are both citizens of one common country, and they both live under a Constitution which guarantees to all equal rights. Will not the rejection of this claim afford just cause of complaint to the volunteers of Tennessee? Will it not furnish them with some reason to say that this Government is not in practice what it professes to be in theory? I trust, sir, this cause of complaint will not be given by the decision of the committee upon the proposition now submitted to its consideration. Much more might be said in support of this claim, but so much time has been already consumed in its discussion, that I forbear to make further remark, or to trespass longer upon the patience of the Committee.

When Mr. S. had concluded—

The motion to strike out was further supported by Messrs. F. JONES, CANNON, H. NELSON, RHEA, and WARFIELD; and opposed by Messrs. METCALFE, MCCOY, and WILLIAMS of North Carolina, in reply; when the question was taken, and the motion to strike out was carried—ayes 90, when the Committee rose and reported the resolution as amended.

In the House, Mr. F. JONES moved that the report be recommitted to a select committee, with instructions to report a bill pursuant to the vote of the House.

Mr. LITTLE thought it should be recommitted to the Committee of Claims, instead of a select committee.

The proposition to refer it to a select committee was further supported by Messrs. EDWARDS of Connecticut and WILLIAMS of North Carolina, and carried. And Messrs. JONES of Tennessee, CANNON, W. SMITH, HOOKS, and WARFIELD, were appointed the said committee.

TUESDAY, April 2.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to define admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act granting to the corporation of the city of Mobile, in the State of Alabama, certain lots of ground in the said city," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Sally Vance, reported a bill for her relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act further to regulate the entry of merchandise imported into the United States from an adjacent territory;" which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. NEWTON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of John M. Moody and Samuel Moody; which was twice read, and committed.

Ordered, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be discharged from the further consideration of the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating the reports of the Commissioners appointed to inspect the Cumberland Road, and the accounts of Colonel David Shepherd; and that they lie on the table.

Mr. GORHAM, from the Committee on the Suppression of the Slave Trade, made an unfavorable report on the petition of William de la Carera; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GORHAM, from the same committee, reported a bill in addition to "An act to continue in force an act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy; and, also, to make further provision for punishing the crime of piracy," which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, the Committee on the Public Buildings were instructed to inquire into the expediency of transferring the duties heretofore performed by the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, to the principal Architect.

The joint resolution from the Senate, providing for the disposition of Mr. Trumbull's Paintings for Congress, was read three times, and passed. According to this resolve, these Paintings (now three in number) are to be deposited in committee rooms of the Senate, until otherwise disposed of.

The bill from the Senate to abolish the United States' Trading Establishment with the Indian tribes, was twice read, and Mr. RANKIN moved to refer it to the Committee of the Whole, to whom has been referred the bill, reported in this House, "to regulate intercourse with the Indian tribes." On suggestion of Mr. TAYLOR, however, that the bill might require particular examination of its details by a committee, the bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill from the Senate to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage in Florida, was twice read, and committed.

The engrossed bill to alter the time of holding the courts in the Western District of Virginia, and for other purposes, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The orders of the day being called for, Mr. SAWYER moved to postpone the orders of the day which precede the bill further to establish the compensation of officers of the customs, to alter certain collection districts, and for other purposes. But the House refused to give to this bill the preference requested.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to restore to the brig Diana the privileges of a sea letter vessel; a bill to establish the district of Blakeley; and a bill to continue in force an act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of Maryland and Georgia; reported to the House the two former without, and the latter with, amendments, which were concurred in, and the bills were respectively ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. ROCHESTER asked permission to record his vote on the question upon the resolutions reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations, relative to the recognition of the independence of the South American Governments, and stated that he should not have requested this privilege had he not been detained from the House by illness at the time the vote was taken. By unanimous consent the permission was granted, and the name of Mr. ROCHESTER being called, he voted in the affirmative.

Mr. STEVENSON called for the consideration of the Message of the President of the United States relative to the Beaumarchais claim, with a view to referring it to a committee; and a running debate of considerable length took place upon the proper reference thereof, in which Messrs. STEVENSON, SMITH, of Maryland, MCCOY, RHEA, FARRELLY, and NELSON, of Virginia, took part—when it was finally referred to a select committee, in preference to a standing committee, as had been proposed.

Messrs. STEVENSON, CAMBRELENG, FRANCIS JOHNSON, DWIGHT, and BALDWIN, were appointed the said committee.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. WALWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed, on the 23d of December last, to inquire and report, whether the Army had been reduced according to the provisions of the act, entitled "An act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," passed the 2d day of March, 1821, made a report thereon; which was ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

The particular cases to which the attention of the committee has been directed, in which it is alleged there has been a violation of the act of the last session, are the following: The transfer of officers to a different corps from that to which they belonged previous to the reduction; the appointment of the Paymaster General, Towson, and of Lieutenant Colonel Fenwick, of the light artillery, as colonels of artillery; and the dismissal of Colonels Bissel and Smith, of the infantry, as supernumeraries; the provisional appointment of General Atkinson as Adjutant General, and the subsequent appointment of Colonel Gadsden to the same office, in August last; the appointment of General Atkinson to be colonel, and Majors Bradford and Vose to be captains of infantry; and the dismissal of officers who were made supernumerary by such appointments.

In the reduction of the Army, under the law of the last session, the President appears to have been governed by the construction which had been given to the act of the 16th of March, 1802, under which the provisional army was disbanded, and to the act of the 3d of March, 1815, by which the Army was reduced at the close of the late war. The ninth section of the act of 1802, the fifth section of the act of 1815, and the twelfth section of the act of 1821, prescribe the manner of reducing the respective armies. Their provisions are substantially the same, and these several sections are nearly in the same words. By that construction given to the act of 1815, many valuable officers were disbanded, and many others were reduced from their former rank; yet your committee have not found that the correctness of that construction was ever doubted previous to the late organization of the Army. The Army Register of 1815 was before Congress during the session which commenced in December of the same year, and a law was passed for organizing the staff therein provisionally retained, and which had not been provided for in the former law. The manner in which the law of 1815 had been executed must have been known to most of the members of both Houses of Congress. It is, therefore, fairly to be presumed, that the framers of the act of March last, when they copied into the same the fifth section of the law of 1815, expected that it would receive the same construction as it had formerly obtained. Independently of arguments drawn from the practice under former laws, your committee are of opinion that the construction given by the President to the act of 1821, is the only reasonable one of which it is susceptible. The twelfth section directs the President of the United States to cause to be arranged the officers, non-commissioned officers, artificers, musicians, and privates, of the several corps in the service of the United States, in such manner as to complete out of the same the force authorized by the act. The fair construction of this section is, to authorize the President to organize the Military Peace Establishment, designated in the act, from all the various materials of which the Army was composed, and for this purpose to transfer from one corps to another. The corps of light artillery, and the rifle corps, are not, like the ordnance department, merged in a different corps, but are both abolished. If the President was to fill the various offices in the several corps authorized by the act, only from those who previously belonged to the same corps, all of those who belonged to the light artillery or rifle regiment would have been left out, and the country deprived of the services of many of its most valuable officers. The various general and staff officers of the former Army, including the paymaster general, must also be considered a part of the several corps mentioned in the twelfth section, out of which the new Army was to be formed, and might, like the officers of the light artillery or rifle regiment, be transferred to, or appointed in, a different corps; and, in like manner, the staff officers authorized by the act might be filled by transfers from any other corps of the old Army.

If the general and staff officers of the late Army are not a corps within the meaning of the twelfth section, it necessarily results that all the general and staff officers of the new establishment should have been taken from such as did belong to some corps of the former Army. Such could never have been the intention of Congress.

The offices of colonel of artillery, to which Colonels Towson and Fenwick were appointed, and of Adjutant General, to which General Atkinson was provisionally appointed, were new offices, created by the act of March last. Previous to that time the artillery was not organized into regiments, and had no grade of office therein higher than a lieutenant colonelcy. In the staff of the Army there was an adjutant and inspector general residing at the Seat of Government, and an adjutant general to each division. The adjutant general of the Army authorized by the act of 1821, was intended to perform part of the duties which had been executed by the three others, but more particularly those which had been previously executed by the Adjutant and Inspector General. It has been objected that the Paymaster General was not a member of the general staff of the Army; that he was merely a civil officer, and as such was not embraced within the provisions of the law of the last session.

The office of Paymaster was created under the act of the 8th of May, 1792, under which he received sixty dollars per month, and the rations and forage of a major. By the act of 1802, fixing the Military Peace Establishment, the Paymaster of the Army was to be taken from the line of commissioned officers, and subjected to the rules and articles of war. In 1814 a salary was substituted for the monthly pay, &c. By the act of the 24th of April, 1816, for organizing the general staff, the Paymaster General is recognised as part of the general staff of the Army, and subjected to martial law; and, by the law of the last session, a Paymaster General is also provided for, as one of the officers of the Military Peace Establishment. Your committee can, therefore, see no reasonable grounds for the opinion, that the Paymaster General did not belong to the Army of the United States.

The office of colonel of artillery and adjutant general being original vacancies, it could not have been the intention of Congress to deprive the President of his Constitutional right to fill those offices in such manner as he should think fit, subject to ratification or rejection by the Senate. Colonel Gadsden was appointed to the office of Adjutant General long after the time prescribed for the reduction of the Army, and when the office was vacant, in consequence of the non-acceptance of the same by General Atkinson. The committee, therefore, cannot believe there was any violation of law, either in that appointment or in filling the office of Inspector General, made vacant thereby. The dismissal of the supernumerary officers was a matter of necessity, and expressly directed by the act. Whether the President has discreetly exercised the power vested in him by the Constitution, in making the selections for these or other offices in the Army, is a subject belonging exclusively to the Senate. It is but justice to the individuals selected to say, your committee have heard no objection to the character or competency of either of the gentlemen whose right to the appointment has been questioned. They were all highly esteemed and meritorious officers. Colonels Fenwick and Towson had been breveted for most distinguished services during the late war. While the committee pay this just respect to officers retained in service, they wish not to detract from the merits of the many valuable officers who have been left out of the Army, or reduced in rank.

The only inquiry to which the attention of the committee has been directed, is, whether there has been a violation of law? Your committee are of the opinion, that the President had the Constitutional right to leave out of service any officer of the Army, and appoint another in his place. This construction of the Constitution was distinctly adopted by the House of Representatives at the first session in 1789, by a very decisive vote, being in the proportion of five to three, and after a long and able discussion, in which Mr. Madison took a distinguished part. The late President Washington carried this construction into practical effect in the last year of his Administration, by removing a distinguished individual from the office of Minister to France, and the appointment of a successor during the recess of the Senate. Although this removal produced considerable excitement in the public mind, your committee have not been able to learn that its legality was ever doubted, or that the Constitutional right of the President to remove from office has been questioned since the discussion and decision above mentioned. This forms a conclusive answer to the objections to the appointments called razees, and the dismissal of officers of the grade to which others were reduced. By the construction of the act given to it by the President, and which your committee believe to be correct, the intention of Congress is carried into effect, and the Constitutional rights of the Executive and of the individuals concerned are left unimpaired. Your committee are therefore of opinion, that the Army has been reduced according to the provisions of the act, entitled "An act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," passed the second of March, 1821.

Mr. COCKE said, that he took leave to inform the House, that the report now offered was the report of a majority of only one of the committee; that this majority was obtained by a change of the members of the committee. When the resolution directing the inquiry, whether the act of the 2d of March, 1821, to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, had been respected and carried into effect, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, a majority was then decidedly of opinion that the act had been disregarded.

DISTRICT COURT AT LOUISVILLE.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill to authorize the holding of a district court at Louisville, in the State of Kentucky; his object being to bring it directly before the House, that it might be acted upon without delay.

Mr. HARDIN objected to the course proposed. Adverting to the bill which had been received from the Senate, the object of which was altogether to abolish the admiralty jurisdiction of the district court for the Kentucky district, he said, that, were that bill to pass, there would be no occasion to pass this bill, because it was on account of the exercise of maritime jurisdiction only that a court was proposed to be held at Louisville. He wished the bill from the Senate to be first acted upon, and was therefore opposed to the present motion.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE said, he hoped the Louisville bill would not be delayed until the bill from the Senate was acted upon. He knew that there were objections in this House to the bill from the Senate, and he did not know whether it would be acted upon at the present session. If acted upon, he did not know whether it would pass. It was of much importance that a district court should be held at Louisville, as nearly all the admiralty cases arose in that vicinity; and he hoped that this bill, to which there could be no objection, would not be made to await the fate of the bill from the Senate, in regard to which there was known to be a diversity of opinion.

Mr. J. T. JOHNSON took occasion to express the opinion, which he entertained, that the exercise of admiralty jurisdiction over the interior waters of the country, was an usurpation of power, under color of which individuals were unjustly deprived of their right to trial by jury. He found himself bound on this occasion to ask the House to let the fate of the two measures be the same. He believed that the jurisdiction of the district courts ought, upon fair construction of the law on the subject, to be restricted to trade connected with the great ocean. He could not consent to any construction of that law which goes to give to the district court authority to interfere in the municipal concerns of the State of Kentucky.

Mr. HARDIN insisted upon the propriety of first acting on the bill from the Senate, because, if it passed, there would remain no business whatever for a district court at Louisville. If that bill should not pass, he would cheerfully vote with his friend from Louisville, in favor of his bill. Mr. H. took occasion to express his opinion on the merit of the Senate's bill. He was against extending the jurisdiction of the Federal Judiciary one jot or one tittle further in the municipal concerns of the State than it was necessary to go, but he was against destroying the specific lien of hands, and persons supplying vessels, on those streams which are navigated by vessels as large as those which plough the ocean, and the owners of which are sometimes at a thousand or fifteen hundred miles from where the vessel obtains supplies, or employs hands. Mr. H. made some further remarks to show that to abolish the specific lien in such case, would be to destroy at once the steamboat navigation of the Western waters, &c.

The question being taken on the motion now to take up the Louisville bill, it was decided in the negative.

BOUNTY LANDS, &c.

Mr. WALKER moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a bounty of land to the non-commissioned officers and privates who enlisted and served twelve months during the late war against Great Britain, and who by existing laws are not entitled to receive a bounty in land.

In offering his resolution, Mr. WALKER observed that he was not free from apprehensions that it might be unavailing, and had to regret that he could not make more favorable calculations on the result, and he almost anticipated some objections to its adoption; not on the ground of principle, for it was evidently a subject worthy of inquiry, and demanded attention; but his fears arose from past experience, this being the third Congress in which he had made the same effort to effect a measure so equitable in its operations. And since his commencement as a member of this House, he had always viewed it as a radical defect in our military regulations, and ever entertained a wish for a more liberal policy; yet the attempts he had made, though unsuccessful, had by no means altered his opinion or abated his zeal in the pursuit of that which he felt to be his duty, in soliciting a claim of moral right and equal justice to every soldier; and the present Congress being composed of some new materials, many new members, perhaps with new opinions, had induced him on this proposition to hope for better success. The object of this resolution was to present to this House and to the nation the great inequality that has, and does now exist, in rewarding the services of the different classes of military men; soldiers who enlisted during the late war, in full confidence of obtaining a bounty of land from Government, which was promised, and now denied to a part of them. By the existing laws, or rather by the construction of those laws by the officers of Government, great injustice arose as it regards the rights of a certain class of military men. And we who are here, said Mr. W., in our legislative capacity, for the purpose of administering equal and indiscriminate justice to all our citizens, are morally bound to keep open doors; not give to some and withhold from others who have an equitable claim on Government for military services, and who are truly sufferers by the war. A number of our citizens, advanced in life, who had families, enlisted for five years or during the war, and continued in service some one, two, three years, when, impelled from the impulse of filial affection and care of their families, they procured substitutes, for which they gave more than their bounty wages, and returned home. Now, the question is, or ought to be, Who is responsible for the performance of the substitute, the Government or the original soldier? Mr. W. had always understood that, according to strict military rules, when a man was received in place of another, by the commanding officer, the original soldier, having no control over his future conduct, was exempt from any further accountability for his service. It was so in the Revolutionary war, and, he believed, the true discipline in all nations, although it had been otherwise considered in the late war. Another class who were enlisted were minors, who continued in service some of them near the expiration of their time, and were discharged at the request of their parents or guardians, as being under age. Sir, by the present system both these classes, the old and the young, are excluded from a bounty of land with their fellow-soldiers, although they rendered the same service, performed the same duties, encountered the same dangers, faced the enemy in the frozen regions of the North, marched to the sultry and sickly climate of the South, fought our battles, gained our victories, suffered all the privations of a military life, and, after having sustained innumerable hardships, done ninety and nine good turns in the service of their country, should, through misfortune, fail by the misconduct of their substitutes to fulfil the last day's duty, must be refused of their rights, go unrewarded, and turned off as castaways! This hard measure operates severely on the feelings as well as the interest of that class of our fellow-citizens. They may well exclaim, in the language of the poet,

"Oh cease! forbear to give the fatal stroke,
And wound the heart that is already broke."

Sir, I am gratified in being able to assert that I believe the district I represent has furnished more soldiers, during the late war, than any other section of the Union, in proportion to its population; among whom are some of that unfortunate description I have here noticed, who returned from the Army, their health impaired, their constitutions broken, their families made poor by their absence, and now without redress, unless Government should reward them with a bounty of land in proportion to their services. The recollections of past events often arrest our sensibility, and teach us to feel for others what we have felt ourselves in the old war. Let us, then, turn aside from the smooth and flowery paths of peace, in which we are permitted to tread, and view the toilsome march of our fellow-citizens through the dreary deserts and the storms of war, and, of all on earth, let the soldier be the last man who would have cause to complain of the injustice of his country. The object of this resolution is not to unbosom the Treasury and remunerate them out of the funds of the nation—but to give them a bounty in land, plant them in soil, allow them a lot of inheritance among their brethren, a home—a place for the old to lay his head, and the young to raise his family for posterity. In making these remarks, I trust I shall not fall under the suspicion of one who would lightly or wantonly be disposed to waste or misapply the public money. No, sir; the state of our finances requires the utmost economy; but I would not, nor could I, withhold either the one or the other from any of our citizens who have justly earned it by the sweat of their brow, or, what is much more precious, the spilling of their blood. Sir, we have already provided a pension for the old way-worn debilitated soldier of the Revolution, as a crutch to support him to the brink of the grave, and something to the disconsolate widow of the militia of the late war, and what remains but to do justice to these unfortunate soldiers—the only chasm in the military system? Grant them land, fill up the breach, and then, and not till then, will the rewards of your system be complete.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the said resolution, and decided in the negative.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1822.

Various sections of the bill, containing the ordinary appropriations according to existing laws, were agreed to.

The section to grant "compensation to the messengers in the Treasury Department, seven hundred dollars," being under consideration—

Mr. TRACY stated that he did not consider this allowance to be too great. He doubted whether it was even large enough; but he was well informed that it was customary in this, and he believed in the other departments, to grant the messengers certain privileges and allowances from the fund for contingent expenses. Mr. T. was desirous that these compensations should be explicit and defined. He, therefore, proposed to modify the section so as to allow eleven hundred dollars to the principal and assistant messengers, in lieu of all other allowances whatever. After a few remarks by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the question was taken thereon, and negatively; and the section was adopted as reported.

Mr. COCKE moved to add to the same section the words "which shall be in lieu of all allowances." The question was taken thereon, and carried—ayes 55, noes 49.

Mr. COCKE also moved to add similar amendments to the sections for the compensation to the messengers of the Comptroller's and Auditor's offices, which was agreed to.

Mr. COCKE further moved to strike out the appropriation for payment of two clerks to complete the duties of the Commissioner of the revenue, transferred to the office of the Fifth Auditor, and one clerk on the business of the agent of the Treasury, transferred to the same office. The motion was supported by the mover, and opposed by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. BALDWIN, when the question was taken and the motion negatived.

Mr. BUTLER moved to appropriate for one clerk only instead of two, to complete the duties of the Commissioner of the Revenue, and the question being taken thereon, was lost, ayes 8.

Mr. COCKE then moved to strike out the section for the compensation of the clerk on the business of the agent of the Treasury; which was negatived without a division.

Mr. COCKE further moved to strike out the section to provide for the "compensation to an additional clerk as allowed by acts of appropriations since the 1st of January, 1819; and also for an assistant to the chief clerk." After a brief discussion thereof, by Messrs. COCKE and SMITH of Maryland, the question was taken and the motion prevailed—ayes 54, noes 43.

Mr. COCKE moved to strike out the clause for providing compensation for three additional clerks in the office of the Commissioner of the Land Office; which was supported by the mover, and opposed by Mr. COOK, and carried—53 to 42.

The clause for allowance for contingencies, &c., in the Treasury Department, being under consideration—

Mr. COCKE thought the sum proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means ($40,200) was too high.

Mr. TRACY expressed his opinion to the same effect. He had attended particularly to the subject, in pursuance of his duties as a member of the retrenchment committee (so called,) and he thought many disbursements might with propriety be curtailed, and he expressed the opinion that, if the decision of the House in relation to the messengers was retained, an appropriation of $35,000 would be adequate to the purpose.

After a few remarks by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the question was taken on filling the blank with the sum of $40,200 and negatived; after which,

Mr. TRACY moved to fill the blank with the sum of $36,000; which was put and carried.

The subject of "compensation to the clerks in the office of the Ordnance," being under consideration—

Mr. COCKE moved to strike out the same, and, after a brief discussion of the subject, in which Messrs. COCKE, SMITH, of Maryland, TUCKER of Virginia, WALWORTH, and FARRELLY, participated, the question was taken, and lost, without a division.

Mr. COCKE moved to strike out the clause "for compensation to the clerks in the Engineer Office," and to insert in lieu thereof, the words "for extra compensation for officers detailed to perform the duties of the Engineer Office." A desultory debate ensued hereon, in which Messrs. COCKE, WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, TUCKER, of Virginia, SMITH, of Maryland, and NELSON, of Virginia, took part, when Mr. COCKE withdrew the motion.

Mr. COCKE moved to strike out the section for "compensation to the clerks in the office of the Surgeon General," and, the question being taken thereon, it was carried.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to amend the section "for the contingent expenses of the said department, including fuel, stationery, and other contingent expenses," by striking out the word said (department) and inserting, in lieu thereof, the word war, which was put and carried, and then, on motion of Mr. WARFIELD, the Committee rose reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, April 3.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Andrew Mitchell," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill concerning pre-emption rights in the Territory of Arkansas; which was read, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the registers and of the receivers of public money, of the several land offices; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN also reported a bill providing a compensation to receivers of public money for their services in transmitting public money to safe places of deposit; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported a bill for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to define admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," be discharged from the consideration thereof, and that it be committed to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill to authorize the holding a district court at Louisville, in Kentucky.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act authorizing the adoption of measures to try the title of the Marquis de Maison Rouge to certain lands;" and "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Joseph Hodgson, deceased;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. WOOD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the standing Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a new department, to be denominated the Department of Indian Affairs; to embrace a superintendent of the department resident at the Seat of Government, the establishment of Indian agencies, and the regulation of Indian trade.

Mr. WOOD supported the resolution by presenting a variety of considerations to show its expediency; but, the question being taken thereon, it was negatived.

On motion of Mr. CONDUCT, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire whether any, and what, further measures are necessary for the more speedy recovery of such sums of money as are due from public defaulters to the United States.

The bill from the Senate to establish the district of Blakeley, was read a third time, and passed.

The following engrossed bills, viz: An act to revive and continue in force an act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland and Georgia; and an act restoring to the ship Diana the privilege of a sea-letter vessel, were read a third time, and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the unfinished business of yesterday—the General Appropriation bill.

The question for consideration was upon filling the blank for the contingent expenses of the War Department.

Mr. SMITH moved to fill the blank with the sum of $6,000.

Mr. COCKE opposed the motion on the ground that the surplus over the amount ($5,000) originally proposed was contemplated for other purposes than for defraying proper expenses of the Secretary's office, and he thought this increased amount should not be allowed.

The subject was further discussed by Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, TAYLOR, McDUFFIE, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, TOD, TRACY, and TUCKER of Virginia, when the question was taken on Mr. SMITH's motion, and carried—ayes 64, noes 46.

Mr. COCKE moved to strike out the clause, "for compensation of three clerks and a draughtsman, (for the Commissioners of the Navy Board,) as allowed by acts of appropriations since the first of January, 1819." The motion was supported by Messrs. COCKE and MALLARY; and opposed by Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, LITTLE, and McDUFFIE; when the question was taken, and negatived without a division.

Mr. C. also moved to strike out the clause providing "for compensation to the Commissioner of the Public Buildings at Washington City."

The motion was supported by the mover, and by Messrs. HARDIN, WHIPPLE, STEVENSON, TRACY, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, and VAN WYCK; and opposed by Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, WRIGHT, NELSON of Virginia, RHEA, MERCER, WOOD, BALDWIN, COOK, and JONES of Tennessee; when the question was taken, and carried by a large majority.

And, on motion, the Committee rose and reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

PUBLIC DEFAULTERS.

Mr. KIRKLAND submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the punishment of such officers of the United States as are intrusted with public moneys by virtue of their office, who shall apply the same to any purpose or purposes incompatible with the duties of their office, whereby the United States shall sustain a loss.

In introducing the resolution—

Mr. KIRKLAND observed that, as the resolution contemplated introducing a provision into our laws of an unusual character, it might not be deemed improper for him to assign, briefly, a few of the reasons which have induced him to present it. I find, said Mr. K., from an examination of our statute book, that there is no provision for the punishment of public defaulters, and that they are not subject to any penalty for the misapplication and embezzlement of the public moneys intrusted to their care; and they are responsible only in a pecuniary point of view; that there is no remedy but a civil suit, pursued in the usual course between debtor and creditor, for the recovery of the money which has been misapplied by the officer; that there is no punishment, no penalty, but such as exists between debtor and creditor in the ordinary course of business in society. It is true, said Mr. K., that, in some cases, security is required of the officer, for the faithful performance of his duties, but in most cases, perhaps nine out of ten, where the principal is insolvent, the security will be found unable to respond to the public; and if it should sometimes fortunately happen that the security is solvent, what follows? A petition from the bail and his friends, setting forth, in strong language, the utter ruin of himself and family, if he is compelled to pay the money, and making a forcible, and frequently a successful, appeal to the sympathies of the House for relief. The consequence is, that, after great expenses incurred in the prosecution of both principal and security, we discharge the one, and cancel the bond of the other. It is not believed, that there is enough collected from the public defaulters to pay the aggregate of the expense incurred by the different prosecutions against the officers who have embezzled the public money.

It may be said, Mr. K. remarked, that you have the integrity of the officer; but this is found, in too many instances, a poor security indeed. The documents upon your table show most abundantly that little, very little trust, is to be placed in the integrity of many of your officers who are intrusted with the public money. Here you find defaulters for thousands and tens of thousands, amounting in the aggregate to millions. These documents, and the daily information we have in relation to the loss of our public money, furnish lamentable proof of the entire want of moral principles in many of the public officers, and a most shameful disregard of their public trusts. Your public defaulters are to be found, not only in the Army and Navy, but in the civil department—your collectors of the revenue, marshals, district attorneys, clerks of district and circuit courts, receivers of public moneys for the sale of lands, Indian agents, and those employed to pay the pensions given to Revolutionary soldiers. We have now upon our tables evidence of one pension agent who has misapplied (if the report of our officer is true) ten thousand dollars of moneys placed in his hands to pay the veteran soldiers of the Revolution—an act that should brand him with perpetual infamy. The present laws are wholly inadequate to secure the Treasury from loss by the misconduct of the public officers. There is no provision adequate to effect this object. And while we are upon one hand busily engaged in devising ways and means to fill our Treasury; and while some of our most able, distinguished, and industrious members, are engaged unremittingly upon the subject of retrenchment in the public expenditures; and different committees are inquiring minutely, and with great vigilance, into the expenditures in the various departments of the Government,—there is an imperious necessity for making some provision which shall more effectually guard the Treasury against loss by the embezzlement and misapplication of public moneys by those to whom they are intrusted. It would not upon this occasion, said Mr. K., become me to go minutely into the details of a law making the necessary provisions to guard our public Treasury, and to secure fidelity to the public officers. This would be the peculiar province of the highly respectable committee whose duty it will be by the resolution to make the inquiry, and to report a bill; but he could not forbear offering a few ideas upon the provisions which it may be found necessary to insert in the law. The officer intrusted with public moneys should consider the trust a sacred one; no temptation, however strong, should induce him to violate it. He ought to consider his obligation to the public paramount to every other. No other relation in society can have such strong claims upon him as the people for whose benefit the moneys are committed to his care; and he who will knowingly and deliberately violate a trust so sacred should be held infamous, and no longer be admitted into the society of the honest and virtuous part of the community. I would render him, said Mr. K., ineligible to any public office of honor, profit, or trust. I would immediately cause him to be dismissed from public employ. I would leave it discretionary with the court before whom he was tried, upon his conviction, to cause him to be fined, or imprisoned, or both, at the discretion of the court. Nay, sir, I would go somewhat further—I would leave it in the discretion of the court, in very enormous cases, to sentence the culprit to the penitentiary. I would place him beside the felon who counterfeits your coin, who alters your public records, and who forges your bank paper. This would not be too severe a punishment for him, who, in his wild speculations, has used your money to the amount of tens and hundreds of thousands—who has applied it to the aggrandizement of his family; and who has for years rioted upon the fruits of his iniquity, in living in splendor and show; and who, when he is called on to account, laughs at your public officer, and treats his calls for the public moneys with neglect and contempt.

As the law now stands, this very defaulter is eligible to public office; and it is not, if he (Mr. K.) was rightly informed, a very uncommon occurrence, that the defaulter and his friends are seen petitioning the Executive for public employ, and sometimes, he feared, with success. Public defaulters are now considered merely in the light of unfortunate debtors; as those who, in the course of their business, have from events beyond their control, been rendered insolvent, and who are justly entitled to the sympathies, both of the public and of individuals. It is a shame, said Mr. K., that a public defaulter should, in the view of the laws, and in that of society, be placed upon an equal footing with an honest and unfortunate debtor, in whose behalf the whole community sympathize. It is time, high time, that the laws should speak a different language. If a provision had been inserted in your statute book, said Mr. K., at the commencement of the Government, similar in its provisions to the one contemplated by the resolution now presented, it would, in all probability, have saved to the nation many millions of the public money. Mr. K. anticipated from the adoption of the resolution (if the committee should report in conformity to it) very salutary effects. The people of this country have a high sense of integrity. We boast, said Mr. K., of our public and private virtue; and it is time that we should, from our statute book, speak a strong and decisive language to all those who embezzle the public money. They should learn that they can no longer violate the sacred trust committed to their charge with impunity. Mr. K. concluded by observing that he anticipated an unanimous vote of the House in the adoption of the resolution, and he hoped the committee to whom it would be referred would find time to report a bill at the present session.

Mr. BASSETT was in favor of the resolution, but wished to extend it to those who had the public property in keeping, and he proposed a modification to that effect, by inserting in the body of the resolve the words "or with the safe keeping of public property;" which modification was assented to by the mover.

Mr. HARDIN was apprehensive, that the punishment which seemed to be contemplated by the gentleman from New York (Mr. KIRKLAND) would be found too severe; and, in such cases, a law, if too severe for public sentiment to sustain, would become a dead letter. Mr. H. did not think public sentiment was such as to brand the public defaulter with infamy. On the contrary, the proceeds of his defalcation support him and enable him to drink his wine and give his dinners; nor would it be possible to put a man in the penitentiary merely for being a defaulter. Mr. H. adverted particularly to the case of the district attorneys, and thought the only course in relation to them would be to make them give bond for the faithful performance of their duties, and also to require, if they fail to account, that that failure should vacate their offices.

Mr. WALWORTH moved to insert the words "or agent" after the word "officer," which was assented to by the mover.

Mr. SMITH moved further to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "shall," the words "with intention to embezzle the same." The motion was opposed by Messrs. COCKE and HARDIN, and supported by the mover, and lost.

Mr. CONDUCT moved to strike out the words "by which the United States shall sustain a loss." Mr. C. was disposed to repress all speculation by the holders of the public moneys. The public moneys should be kept separate and sacred for the public service, and he would not suffer the public agents to use them for any other purpose, however well able they might be to replace them when called for.

Mr. KIRKLAND was not inclined to carry his prohibition so far. If the officers and agents of the Government can and do respond, according to law, that, he thought, was all that need be required of them.

Mr. CONDUCT replied. Mr. F. JOHNSON also made a few remarks in favor of the proposed amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, also expressed himself in favor of the amendment. Looking over the document which had been referred to, (the list of unsettled balances,) he thought its contents were a disgrace to the Government—a libel on the country. Until he saw that document, he did not think that the country was capable of producing such a one.

APRIL, 1822.

Letter from the Secretary of War.

H. OF R.

Finally, Mr. KIRKLAND assented to the modification proposed by Mr. CONDUCT.

Mr. COOK proposed to add to the resolution the following sentence: "And, also, into the expediency of requiring all such officers to be dismissed from office upon failure faithfully to account for the money or property so confided to them." This proposition was agreed to by the House, and the resolution, as modified, was thereupon adopted.

THURSDAY, April 4.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Alexander Montgomery," made a report thereon, proposing amendments to the said bill, and the bill and report were committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred by resolution, on the 21st of January last, reported a bill to revive and continue in force certain acts for the adjustment of land claims in the Territory of Michigan, which were read twice and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EUSTIS laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, communicating a report of the chief engineer, containing the information sought by the resolution of the 19th of February last, in relation to cadets educated at the Military Academy at West Point, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COOKE moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, whose duty it shall be to sit in the recess of Congress, and inquire into the affairs of the several Departments of the Government; that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and that they be required to make report to Congress at an early period of the next session.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a drawback on coal consumed by steam vessels, and of authorizing said vessels to take coasting licenses.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, the House took into consideration a bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act to alter the terms of the district court in Alabama;" which was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

A bill from the Senate for the relief of the legal representatives of Joseph Hodgson, deceased, was twice read and referred to the Committee of Claims.

A bill from the Senate to authorize the adoption of measures to try the title of the Marquis de Maison Rouge to certain lands, was twice read and referred to the Committee on Claims.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the amendment of thi

House to their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for paying to the State of Missouri three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands within the same;" and they have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to designate the boundaries of a land district, and for the establishment of a land office in the State of Indiana;" "An act to establish an additional land office in the State of Illinois;" "An act to perfect certain locations and sales of public lands in Missouri;" and "An act for the relief of Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, and others;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of the House.

LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

The following letter was presented to the House by Mr. COOK, read, and, with the documents accompanying it, ordered to be printed.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, April 3, 1822.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 2d instant, enclosing a copy of the report of the select committee upon the subject of examining the land offices in Ohio, &c., and, in reply to your inquiries, I have to state that the committee is under a mistake in stating that Mr. Rodney and Mr. Baldwin, the former a member of the Senate, and the latter of the House of Representatives, were "employed and paid as counsel under the direction of the present Secretary of War."

The precise period at which the former was employed cannot be ascertained, but it was previous to July, 1820. He was paid for his services the 8th of November, 1820, before he became a member of Congress. Mr. Baldwin was employed by Major Woolley, of the Ordnance, in the Spring of 1817, before I came into the War Department, and previous to taking his seat in Congress, in the case of Daniel Dekar, a soldier in the United States' service, who had been indicted for murder, for which service Mr. Baldwin has not yet been paid. He was also employed before I came into the Department, and, it is believed about the same time, by General Tannehill and Major Woolley (who had been appointed commissioners, in 1815, to sell certain lots of land belonging to the Government at Pittsburg,) in an indictment of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania against John Young, the auctioneer, for selling the lots without paying the auction fees. For this service he was paid, in 1820, $100. It cannot be ascertained, from the records of this office, that any part of the service was rendered subsequent to the time of his taking his seat in Congress.

In relation to the employment of Mr. Morrow and Governor Worthington in 1812, I herewith enclose a copy of the letter of instruction to them, and a letter from the Third Auditor, which will give all the information in relation to it which can be obtained from this Department.

In "the case of a member of the House of Representatives in the present Congress who is employed under the authority of the War Department as a superintendent of a fortification of the United States, for which he receives an annual compensation," and which I understand from your letter refers to Mr. Hill, from Maine, I find, on examination, that he was employed by General Ripley, in 1816, to take charge of the fort and other public property at Phippsburg, in Maine, and that he has received a compensation averaging $116 50 per annum. The enclosed communication from the Second and Third Auditors of the Treasury Department contain all of the facts in relation to it within the knowledge of this Department. It is proper to observe that it does not appear that the account was ever submitted to the War Department for its approval, as the Auditors considered the authority of the commanding officer sufficient for its allowance, and that I had no knowledge that Mr. Hill was so employed.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
J. C. CALHOUN.

Hon. D. P. Cook,
House of Representatives.

ALLOWANCE OF PENSIONS.

On motion of Mr. LONG, the House then took into consideration the bill to revive and continue in force certain acts concerning allowances for pensions upon a relinquishment of bounty lands.

Mr. LONG was in hopes that the bill would not meet with much opposition. If it ever was right (which he believed it was) to pass the law, it was right that all should equally have the benefit of it as intended. To this end it would become necessary to revive the law, as it had now expired, before they all had applied. If, however, gentlemen felt any disposition to vote against the bill, he hoped they would reflect, and see the situation of those poor widows and children as it would be if the House refuses to pass the bill. Congress, said he, has heretofore passed a law which held out to them some relief. We may naturally suppose that they have applied as soon as they knew there was a law for their relief; but, to apply effectually, it not only required some time, but was attended with considerable expense in getting their papers in due form, which was done generally by professional men; a class of men who are in the habit of being well paid for their services. In some cases the expense was more than those applicants were able to bear—and, after they have expended every cent they were worth in setting forth their claim, they are informed that the law has expired, and that they are not now entitled to what was intended for them, merely because they have not applied within a certain day. It cannot be expected, said Mr. L., that a poor woman and children, settled down on some remote corner of the earth, constantly engaged at home in procuring bread, could know any thing about the operation or existence of the laws of Congress. He hoped, therefore, that the circumstance of their not applying before the law expired, would not be urged as an objection to the passage of the bill, and that we should not be found ready to snap at this little advantage that may be here taken of the poor and ignorant. He was as much opposed to an improper expenditure of public money as any member of this House, and would go as far as any gentleman in his opinion ought to go, to bring our expenditures within the amount of our revenue, which he conceived to be the indispensable duty of this House; but he could not consent to begin here, and withhold this pitiful sum from the widow and fatherless, who have lost him who ought to have been their protector, whilst engaged in the service of his country and protection of our lives and liberties.

The bill was thereupon ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the unfinished business of yesterday—the General Appropriation bill.

Mr. COCKE moved to strike out the clause for the contingent expenses of the Attorney General's office, including compensation to the messenger; and after remarks thereon by Messrs. COCKE, TAYLOR, and HARDIN, in favor, and by Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, NELSON of Virginia, WARFIELD, TUCKER of Virginia, and WRIGHT, against the motion, the question was taken and the proposition was adopted—ayes 70.

Mr. COCKE moved to fill the blank in the clause providing for defraying the expenses of the supreme, circuit, and district courts of the United States, and for defraying the expenses of prosecutions for offences against the United States, &c., with the sum of "twenty," instead of "thirty" thousand dollars, and after a discussion thereof by Messrs. COCKE, SMITH of Maryland, and JONES of Tennessee, the motion was negatived, and the blank was filled as recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. COCKE moved to fill the blank in the clause for the support and maintenance of lighthouses, beacons, buoys, &c., with the sum of ten thousand, instead of forty-one thousand one hundred and four dollars and sixty-eight cents, as recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means; and, after a discussion of the subject by Messrs. COCKE, SMITH of Maryland, MILNOR, and NEWTON, the question was first taken, pursuant to the rules of the House, upon the largest sum, which was carried, and thereby Mr. COCKE's motion was indirectly negatived.

The clause for surveying the public lands of the United States being under consideration—

Mr. STERLING, of New York, proposed to fill the blank with the sum of "one hundred," instead of "one hundred and eighty thousand" dollars. A discussion ensued thereon, in which the amendment was supported by Messrs. STERLING of New York, TOD, COCKE, COLDEN, and CAMPBELL of Ohio, and opposed by Messrs. JONES of Tennessee, HENDRICKS, and RANKIN, and some explanatory observations were made by Mr. SMITH of Maryland, and Mr. BATES, but, before any question was taken thereon—

Mr. COLDEN moved to insert, after the word "surveying," a clause confining the appropriations for that purpose to the expenses to be incurred during the current year; to which Mr. RANKIN proposed to prefix the words "actually performed," which was assented to by the mover, and the amendment, as modified, was adopted.

The question then recurred upon filling the blank with the largest sum ($180,000;) which was put, and lost by a large majority.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, then proposed the sum of $130,000; which was also put and negatived.

Mr. WALWORTH named $75,000.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Mr. McCoy proposed $50,000.

The question was taken upon filling the blank with the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, as proposed by Mr. STERLING, and was carried.

Mr. Cook moved to add to the clause the following words: "and for arrearages due for surveys made in the year 1821 ——— dollars."

The object of the amendment offered by Mr. Cook was to appropriate $80,000 to pay for surveys of the public land in the States of Illinois and Missouri, and the Territory of Arkansas, which were made under the direction of William Rector, the Surveyor General for those States and Territory, beyond the amount authorized to be surveyed, in consequence of a misinterpretation of the instructions of the Treasury Department. The grounds taken against the making the appropriation were, that the surveys were unauthorized by law, and that Congress was not bound to pay for it, and that it had been represented that the surveying was not well done, and ought not, even if authorized by law, to be paid for. Mr. C. urged, at large, that an honest mistake of the officer ought not to be used to the prejudice of the honest laborers who had surveyed the land under contracts made with an officer acting in the line of his duty, though by an honest error he exceeded the amount of appropriation. Mr. C. said there was the only legal evidence of the manner in which the work had been done, in its favor. The plats, he understood, had been returned and accepted; and mere flying reports of fraud should not overrule regular and official evidence.

The motion was further supported by Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON, and opposed by Messrs. COLDEN, CAMPBELL of Ohio, and Mr. TOP, when the question was taken, and the motion was negatived without a division.

The Committee then rose and reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, April 5.

Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Joseph Hodgson, deceased," and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petitions of Joseph Dutton, Samuel Walker, and of John Martin, Samuel Peterson and Hannah Peterson, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of William Nott, Stephen Henderson, and Nathaniel Cox, syndics of the creditors of George T. Phillips, late of the city of New Orleans, deceased," reported the same with amendments; and the bill and amendments were committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations to carry into effect a treaty made at Chicago, and a treaty made at Edwardsville; which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Cook, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of William Biggs; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Cook, from the same committee, also reported a bill confirming the title to a tract of land to Alzira Dibrieu and Sophia Hancock; which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. STERLING, of New York, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the compensation allowed to the surveyors of the public lands, and to make further provision to prevent fraud and mistakes in the surveying of the same.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled an act to alter the terms of the district court in Alabama," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to revive and continue in force certain acts concerning the allowance of pensions upon a relinquishment of bounty lands," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WRIGHT gave notice that he would, on Monday next, move the House for leave to bring in a bill "to erect a monument to the memory of the late Baron de Kalb, in the city of Annapolis."

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate announcing their disagreement to the amendment of this House to their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for paying to the State of Missouri three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands within the same." Whereupon, it was ordered that the said bill do lie on the table.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: 1. An act to designate the boundaries of a land district, and for the establishment of a land office in the State of Indiana; 2. An act to establish an additional land office in the State of Illinois; 3. An act to perfect certain locations and sales of public lands in Missouri; and, 4. An act for the relief of Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, and others, were severally read the first and second time, and referred; the first, second, and third, to the Committee on the Public Lands, and the fourth to the Committee of Claims.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of the sureties of Joseph Pettipool;" and "An act for the relief of Joseph C. Boyd;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copies of the reports made to the Treasury Department by the several incorporated Banks of the District of Columbia, showing the state of their affairs at the commencement of the present year; which letter and reports were ordered to lie on the table.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the unfinished business of yesterday—the General Appropriation bill.

Mr. COCKE moved to strike out the provision "for additional compensation to the clerks in the office of the Superintendent of Indian Trade, as allowed by the act of the 20th of April, 1818." The motion was supported by the mover, and Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and carried by a large majority.

Mr. COCKE moved to strike out the clause "for the payment of balances due to officers of the old internal revenue and direct tax;" but, after some explanation by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the motion was withdrawn.

The clause providing for the salaries of foreign Ministers being under consideration—

Mr. MALLARY suggested that he was not satisfied that it was necessary to send a Minister to Lisbon, and that a Chargé des Affaires would perhaps be sufficient. He therefore called for information on the subject from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in reply to the inquiries of Mr. MALLARY, reviewed at considerable length the political and commercial relations which, for a long period, have subsisted between this country and Portugal. We had long exported, he said, vast quantities of flour to that country; but at length the Government laid a duty of $2 per barrel on all the flour imported into that kingdom, from this country, and gave privileges and held out inducements to the nobility to erect mills, which was done, and they were in a great measure supplied with wheat from Poland. Our people exported no wheat. They manufactured it themselves; but the duty, which was intended as a prohibition, was severely felt, and our Government sent a Minister to that Court to obtain a repeal of the duty. Ministers, however, are not always the best negotiators in mercantile concerns; and the object was not effected. But it was afterwards accomplished by a Consul General, who was thoroughly acquainted with commercial subjects, and the duty was taken off. Subsequently, the Court was removed to Brazil, from which it has recently returned to Europe. But the duty of $2 per barrel has been renewed for the purpose of encouraging agriculture, and of giving it a new direction, instead of cultivating almost exclusively the vine. The Government of that country has thought us to be hostile—particularly from the greater duties we imposed upon the wines of Madeira and Fayal, than upon the wines of other countries. Large quantities of corn are sent from this country to Madeira; and they are understood to be about petitioning the Cortes to impose restrictions upon the importation of our corn; and the consequence may be, that we may be wholly deprived of the benefits of that trade. All attempts to reduce our enormous duties upon these wines have hitherto been ineffectual, because they are drank by the rich, without seeming to regard the importance of the trade. Mr. S. further observed that he thought it expedient not to withhold the appropriation, inasmuch as the President had recommended the measure; and, should we refuse, the consequences and the responsibility of that refusal will rest upon us.

Mr. MALLARY remarked, that the object of sending Ministers abroad was for the purposes, either of policy or commerce. In relation to the policy, he thought a Minister was not necessary. The Government of Portugal was not formidable, either at sea or on land. With respect to commerce it was evident, from the statement of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) that a commercial object, which a Minister could not effect, a Consul General was competent to accomplish. Mr. M. therefore thought a Chargé des Affaires was adequate to the object. There were twenty places in Europe where we send no Minister, of more commercial importance to this country than Lisbon. Mr. M. adverted to a statistic report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to show the superiority of the trade of other countries; and he particularly referred to Holland, Denmark, and Sweden. The latter nation was certainly at least equal in dignity, and superior in strength to Portugal, and was as well entitled to expect a Minister from us as the latter Government; and with respect to the Brazils, he believed they would emancipate themselves from the control of the parent country, whenever they thought proper to dissolve the connexion, and assume their independence. Mr. MALLARY concluded by moving to transpose the word Lisbon, so as to provide for a Chargé des Affaires in that country, instead of a Minister.

Mr. SMITH replied, by referring to the Message of the President of the United States at the opening of the session. He observed that Portugal had expressed a sincere desire to renew a friendly intercourse, and, he understood, had actually appointed a Minister to this country. The gentleman from Vermont (Mr. MALLARY) had said that the trade with Portugal was unimportant. He (Mr. S.) admitted it, and it was to restore it to importance that the mission was proposed. A Chargé des Affaires might be adequate if, as in the case of Sweden, a treaty was already subsisting; but we want a Minister to make a treaty, and a Chargé des Affaires may afterwards be sufficient.

The motion of Mr. MALLARY was further supported by Messrs. GILMER, HARDIN, and ROSS, and opposed by Messrs. WRIGHT, POINSETT, BALDWIN, WOOD, RHEA, ARCHER, FARRELLY, WOODSON, MERCER, and SMITH; when the question was taken, and the motion was negatived—ayes 34.

The question for expenses of carrying into effect the fifth, sixth, and seventh articles of the Treaty of Ghent, being under consideration—

Mr. COCKE observed, that he should be opposed to making any further appropriation for that object, until he was informed that those Commissioners had settled their accounts. They had heretofore been called on, but only one class of them, to his knowledge, had obeyed the call; and, among the charges it included, was to be found expenses incurred for fish-hooks, and fishing-nets, and bacon hams, and other like items, that did not seem to be a proper expenditure for the nation. The business had been already protracted eight years, almost as long as it took to destroy Troy; and if we go on, said he, appropriating from session to session, it will become a life estate to those concerned. He was averse to placing any more money in their hands, until they had accounted for what they had already received; and he moved to fill the blank with the sum of twelve thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. F. JOHNSON adverted to the law of the last session that limits their allowance to a specific salary, in lieu of all other expenses.

Mr. BALDWIN believed there had been too lavish an expenditure of the public money; nor would he now vote for the appropriation, did he not fear the public service might suffer from the delay a refusal of it might occasion. It was a business connected with a foreign Power, and he wished the concern might be closed.

Mr. COCKE said we were told that the line could not be run in the Winter, because the climate is too cold; and in the Summer the Commissioners, he understood, were frolicking at Ballston Springs. He thought it was high time that Congress should interpose, and prevent this waste of the public treasure.

Mr. WILLIAMSON remarked, that the people of Maine were as much dissatisfied with the progress of the Commissioners as the people of any other part of the United States could be. He observed that, in reply to a call which had been made on the Executive at this session, on the subject of the 5th article, we had been assured that it would be concluded in the course of the ensuing Spring. He thought, therefore, the most expedient course would be to make the appropriation called for, so as to have the business concluded without further delay.

The question was then taken on filling the blank with the sum of $25,000, and negatived; and the blank was filled with the sum of $12,500.

The clause to provide "for the salaries of the Commissioners, Secretary, Clerk, and Messenger, together with the contingent expenses of the two Commissioners under the treaty with Spain," being under consideration—

Mr. COCKE animadverted upon the unnecessary and extravagant expenditure which had been incurred under the direction, as he understood, of the Secretary of the Spanish Commission, but he made no motion.

Mr. MILNOR remarked that information had been lately received that the Cortes of Spain had recognised the independence of South America; and if so, it was not probable they would be anxious to encounter the expense of running the line between this country and Mexico. Under this view, he moved to reduce the appropriation to $15,000 instead of the sum of $30,000, as recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means.

The question was taken on the sum of $30,000, and negatived.

Mr. WALWORTH proposed to modify the clause, so as to confine the appropriation exclusively to the commission to settle claims under the treaty, instead of the two commissions.

Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said, as far as this appropriation is intended to cover the expense of running the boundary line established by the treaty with Spain, between the United States and Mexico, it was unnecessary. This House, he said, had determined to recognise the independence of Mexico; it would involve an absurdity now to recognise the right of Spain to fix with us the limits of a country, over which all authority has ceased; to define the limits after she has ceased to exercise any other sovereignty there. This is a right utterly incompatible with the public rights of the independent Government that now reigns over it. If a commissioner was appointed by Spain, as it is stated, he was named before the new state of things existed, and his powers would be recalled by Spain herself, as soon as it was known that she had no longer any interest in the question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) had stated that the treaty was binding on Mexico, as Spain exercised sovereignty over it at the date of the treaty. That may be true, (said Mr. J.,) and Mexico will carry it into effect in good faith. there is no danger of her refusal to accept a treaty, which relinquishes our right to her territory, and gives her six hundred miles of seaboard. She has very little objection to Spain giving us Florida, and leaving her the Province of Texas. We claimed their country to the Rio Grande—by the treaty we have surrendered it. They do not claim our territory—we have relinquished our right to Texas. We have made the sacrifice, not they; all the country west of the Sabine is now a part of Mexico. Besides, said he, can we send agents to run and mark her limits, against her consent, without insulting her sovereignty, and violating her territory? What! send armed troops, (as was intimated,) into a foreign country, in defiance of the law of nations. This must now be a subject of arrangement with the Government of Mexico. It is better to leave it open; we have now nothing to lose; we have already lost all in that quarter.

A discussion of some length ensued, in which Messrs. COCKE, MILNOR, WALWORTH, BUCHANAN, SMITH, of Maryland, WARFIELD, COOK, RHEA, and EDWARDS, of Connecticut, took part; when the question was taken, and the modification adopted—ayes 78.

The question was then put on filling the blank with the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, and carried; when, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, April 6.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred, on the 31st January last, the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, reported a bill authorizing the location of school lands in that State; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKE submitted for consideration the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to furnish this House with a statement of the amount of money paid as salaries, outfits, and contingent expenses, to foreign Ministers, since the year 1800, and the amount paid on each; also, the Courts at which they were employed, and the time they were, respectively, engaged in the discharge of their duties as Ministers from the United States.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table one day.

On motion of Mr. HARDIN, the House went into consideration of a bill for the relief of John Thomas; and, after some remarks on the same, by Messrs. HARDIN, SMITH of Maryland, COOKE, EDWARDS of North Carolina, MCCOY, WRIGHT, and MONTGOMERY, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading this day; which was subsequently done and the bill passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of State, in obedience to the resolution of the 14th ultimo, instructing him to report what evidences of claim, recorded in his department, in pursuance of the act of the 31st March, 1814, providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi Territory, remain in that office, after having been rejected by the Commissioners appointed under that act; whether he has refused to deliver up such evidences to the claimants, together with the reasons of such refusal, specifying the names of such claimants; which report was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: 1. An act for the relief and sureties of Joseph Pettipool; and 2. An act for the relief of Joseph C. Boyd; were severally read the first and second time, and referred, the first to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the second to the Committee on Military Affairs.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the unfinished business of yesterday—the General Appropriation bill.

The clause to provide for repairing the Cumberland road being under consideration—

Mr. CONDICT moved to strike out the clause. He said the United States had already expended enormous sums in the construction of this road, and he could not consent to impose upon his constituents any further expense in repairing it.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE had not expected the opposition which the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. CONDICT) had made to the bill, and the manner was as unexpected as the matter. He has said that he is unwilling to tax his constituents for this object. Does not that gentleman recollect that the people of the West have been from time to time heavily taxed, to build fortifications on the seaboard, and support navies, in which they have no special interest? What would that gentleman say, if we should avow that we would pay no more for those objects, and urge for reason that we are far enough out of the way of an enemy, and therefore are not disposed to contribute to the common defence? This was a magnificent plan of connecting the Eastern with the Western States. It was creditable to the munificence and policy of the Government; and he would not ask whether it was expedient to suffer this valuable road to go to decay and ruin, rather than appropriate this trifling sum to an object so important. It was the common property of the nation, and it could not be conformable to the interests of the country to break the chain that binds the Eastern and Western States together.

Mr. FARRELLY regretted that the gentleman last up should have introduced local considerations into this discussion. He did not understand in what way this appropriation found its way into the bill. He objected to the manner in which it had been brought forward, and thought it should be done by way of bill, as was done in the case of payment for horses destroyed in the Seminole campaign. Nor did he see how the repair of this road could come within the Constitutional provision for the support of the Government. Mr. F. was willing to go as far on this subject as the compact required. The act of Congress, on this subject, provided for the construction, but not for the repair, of the road. If this appropriation was made, it would be followed by similar calls from year to year to keep it in repair. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. BRECKENRIDGE) had alluded to the expenditures for fortifications for the protection of the seaboard, which he contends are made for the exclusive benefit of those who live upon it. But he should remember that, in these fortifications, New Orleans had not been overlooked, which was done almost entirely for the benefit of the people of the West. As much attention has been paid to the fortification of that place as to those of New York, and he thought no fair argument could be adduced from that source. It had been said, indeed, that the sum asked for was a trifle. He admitted it; and if this was to be the end of it, it would perhaps be worth the time to be occupied in the contest. But he regarded this as only an entering wedge for future appropriations for the same purpose. The State of Pennsylvania has a road nearly parallel with this, from Harrisburg to Pittsburg, which is materially affected by this. Mr. F. was opposed to this appropriation also, on the ground that the expenditure of the moneys heretofore granted for this road had been wasteful and corrupt; and there was no guaranty that the sum which is now asked for would not be applied in a similar manner. Mr. F. did not wish to have this road go to destruction; but he thought if those who live on its borders would not support and repair it, it should revert to the States through which it passes. And he could not think that, for the sum of $9,000, it was expedient to draw into discussion a Constitutional question of doubtful construction. After so large a sum had been expended, so far beyond the amount that was originally contemplated, he thought it was time to put an end to these appropriations.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, explained the manner in which this provision had been introduced into the appropriation bill, which was in consequence of a resolution of the House directing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of applying the unexpended balance of former appropriations for this purpose. That committee had obeyed the direction of the House, and they thought themselves justified in that course when they knew that $1,000,000 had been expended by the United States in constructing the Cumberland road, and that it was now in a state of dilapidation. All the items of that amount had been made, from time to time, in the appropriation bills. The committee thought that sum would be well applied in repairing and protecting what it had cost so large a sum to construct. The superintendent had been consulted, and it appeared, from his statements, that the road, owing to the torrents, &c., in that mountainous country, will soon be impassable, unless the necessary repairs are made. The question, therefore, is, whether you will throw away what you have already done, rather than be at a little expense to sustain it? It had been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FARRELLY,) that those who live upon it ought to repair it. But they have little interest in it. It is those who pass a great distance on the road that have the greatest interest in maintaining it. The construction of this road had done great honor to the nation, and he hoped it would not now be abandoned.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, thought the same reasons that had induced the Government to build the road, would now influence them to preserve it. He had recently travelled it, and he found that the first part made wanted but little repair. That portion of it which was more recently constructed naturally required attention. The hills slide down, and the road is filled up, so that repairs are necessary. Mr. C. contended that the road was valuable to the United States, inasmuch as it rendered the public lands more accessible; and the people of the West had a right to expect this small appropriation for such an object. If a large appropriation was asked for, it would be perhaps expedient to pause. But the small sum of $9,000 is all that is now required, and probably not even so large a sum as that will be necessary in future years, after the road shall have been thoroughly completed.

Mr. MALLARY was also opposed to the motion to strike out this clause of the section. The facts, he observed, were familiar to the House. The Government had expended $1,800,000 on this road, and the policy of that expenditure had been repeatedly confirmed. It was now out of repair, and there were no means provided to maintain it. The first question, then, was, whether it was an object of sufficient consideration to authorize this appropriation? It was admitted to be the great chain to bind the East and West together, and for the accomplishment of that object much depended on the facility of communication. The House had been called on in this very bill to appropriate the sum of $6,000 to pay John Trumbull for a national painting. They had done it. And was it not an object at least as national and important to preserve the great avenue to the West? We annually appropriate thousands, said Mr. M., for the completion of this stupendous pile, the Capitol. And is not the Cumberland road as valuable a monument of national policy and munificence? When we appropriate so much to construct the road, he thought it worth while to contribute a pittance to save it. The people in that region, Mr. M. contended, had calculated, and prudently calculated, that the Government would not be at so much expense to construct the road, and then abandon it. He thought it was now ungenerous, if not unjust, to disappoint their expectations. The road from Philadelphia to Pittsburg was a great thoroughfare for the State of Pennsylvania; and it was not surprising, therefore, that the people of that State should not view the road with an eye of complacency. It was correct. It was natural for them to regard primarily their own interests. But the nation had decided in favor of the Cumberland road, and he thought it was expedient that Congress should not now depart from that decision.

Mr. FARRELLY replied, and contended that the road was not in itself of so great importance, nor of such utility to the West as had been represented. He also stated that he had no confidence in the superintendence of the road; but, if the sum now asked for should be granted, it would probably be squandered as the former appropriations had been, and that it was inadequate to the accomplishment of the object in view, of effectually repairing a road 120 miles long. He further contended that this road was not national in its character more than any other road that was used by the public.

Mr. STEWART rose to reply to the gentleman last up, and to disclose some facts that were within his personal knowledge and observation. This road, he observed, was completed the last Summer. Every Congress, for the last ten or twelve years, influenced by a liberal and enlightened policy, had appropriated money for its construction. It was now asked, merely to apply to the reparation of the road an unexpended balance which had previously been appropriated for its completion, and a trifling sum to erect a bridge. It was not expected, with this sum, to make durable repairs of stone, but to remove obstructions, and put it in passable repair, until Congress should make some permanent provision on the subject. In some places the hills had slipped and filled the road; in others, the road has given way and precipitated so as to become almost impassable. The consequence has been, that the public travel and the public mail have been seriously obstructed. It had been said by his colleague, (Mr. FARRELLY,) that the people living on the road should repair it. But it would be recollected that this road was made over a mountainous, and, to a considerable extent, an uninhabited country. A considerable part of it passes through Pennsylvania, which, as a State, is known to be hostile to it. The gentleman (Mr. F.) has stated that it is destructive to Pennsylvania; she has $600,000 of stock in her own road, running from Philadelphia to Pittsburg; yet, he says that, if the road could not support itself, it ought to be given back to the State of Pennsylvania; this, by the gentleman's showing, would be to give the lamb to the keeping of the wolf. Such a course could not be required nor justified. This was a national road. It was built for a national purpose, and in a spirit of national munificence. And the important question before us now is, whether the whole object for which the expense was incurred shall be lost, for want of a trifle to repair and preserve it. We have been told, however, said Mr. S., that the money heretofore appropriated has been improperly expended. For the sake of argument, be it so; and what then? Is that a reason for abandoning the road? Large sums, also, have been appropriated for the erection of the spacious building in which we sit. But shall we stop the work because it may be suggested that some of the agents employed had been unfaithful to their trust. Should we relinquish the completion of this stupendous fabric, and leave it roofless, merely because there may have been extravagance and want of economy in the application of the public moneys? But the gentleman (Mr. FARRELLY) says, that this road is not important.

On this subject, he (Mr. S.) would advert to some facts that would show the incorrectness of the remark. On this road, most of the goods with which the Western States are supplied from those on the Atlantic, are carried; and on this road, the produce of the West is transported to the East. In a few of the western counties of Pennsylvania, there had been manufactured, in a single year, 371,000 barrels of flour, and 29,000 barrels of whiskey, which cost, before this road was constructed, at $5 per barrel to transport to Baltimore or this city, now carried for $2 50; and while we appropriate millions for the benefit of the merchant who exports it, by supporting navies, lighthouses, foreign agents, and ministers, will you do nothing to aid the farmer to carry his produce to your shores? We can no longer compete with our more western neighbors in the market of New Orleans. We are compelled to turn to the East. In Pittsburg, there has been paid in a single year two millions of dollars for transportation; but the carriage that then cost from eight to ten dollars per cwt. from Baltimore to Wheeling, is now reduced to two dollars and fifty cents. At least two-thirds is taken off. And who paid this enormous tax—for a tax it might well be called? It was the consumer. The merchant did not pay it. He added it to the price of his goods, and the people of the West were compelled to pay it, as much as the duties by which the national Treasury is enriched. This road was also important, Mr. S. contended, to facilitate the intercourse between the Eastern and Western States. It was an important feature in the national policy to smooth and soften the rugged points of difference between the different sections of the country, and to create a mutual dependence of each upon the other. His colleague (Mr. FARRELLY) had observed that other sections of the country had not been provided for. To this a reply was at hand. This was a national object, but the Pennsylvania road was a State object. The New York canal partook of both, for, though it was entirely within the State, yet other States also participated in the benefits it was calculated to produce. This road could never have been built by a State. State funds were not adequate to such an object. There was, therefore, a strong and a fair claim upon the liberality of the people of the East—and this claim was fortified by the liberal appropriations which the House had made by this very bill in their favor. Almost an hundred thousand dollars had been already voted, and he expected an hundred thousand dollars more would be voted yesterday for the erection and maintenance of lighthouses and beacons, and buoys. All this was right and proper. He (Mr. S.) had voted for it, for it was necessary for the protection of those who coast along your shores. But this is bottomed on the same principle that we ask for this. The one is to travel in ships and boats, and the other in wagons. The surface over which they pass cannot vary the principle of affording them facility, safety, or aid. The element of earth is as much privileged for protection as the element of water. But this is not all. Not only lighthouses are erected, but causeways to reach them—and what are these but roads? And if so much can be done for the merchants, shall nothing be done for the farmers? And but yesterday we voted to send a Minister to Lisbon, at an expense of $28,000. Of what use were these expenses to the people of the West? But they will contribute to pay the expense, and pay it cheerfully, because it is deemed necessary for the welfare of a part of the political family with which they are connected. Large sums, upwards of $200,000 have also been appropriated to defray the expense of running a boundary line—not much longer than this road, and all will be contentedly borne by the Western people if they are permitted to participate in the national bounty. It has been said that money has been squandered upon this road. He (Mr. S.) would not again advert to this objection but to correct an impression that might have been received by this House. The western part of the road has been made under the direction of Messrs. Thompson and Williams, about thirty-six miles, and had cost upwards of $16,000 per mile; but with respect to the eastern part of it, which had been built under the superintendence of Mr. Shriver, it was but just to say that he had performed his trust with great economy, at an expense of less than $9,000, and a part for $6,400, and with a fidelity and zeal that entitled him to the warmest commendations. It was due to him, therefore, to rescue him from imputations that were calculated, though not intended, to mislead the House. Mr. S. said the Constitutional right to make this appropriation had been called in question. On this point he made a number of remarks. He said the Constitution had vested in Congress the right "to establish post roads." On this road your mail now runs daily, and have you no right to repair and protect it? Have you no right to remove obstructions which the Postmaster General officially tells us has rendered it impassable? The Constitution has also given to Congress the power to regulate commerce "between the States," as well as with foreign nations; and does not this road promote a very extensive and highly important commerce between the Atlantic States and the Western world? But this was not all: Mr. S. said the Constitution further gave the general power "to provide for the common defence and general welfare;" good roads were often more important as a means of defence than forts and fortifications. In a country like this, supporting a small Peace Establishment, good roads, by which the military means and physical forces were rapidly concentrated at the point of attack were immensely important. It had cost during the late war $1,000 each, to transport a number of guns to the frontier, and $90 per barrel had been paid for flour. And is not the "general welfare" promoted by this road, connecting and uniting the East and West by the ties of interest and intercourse, by which the immense mountains which have been pointed at as the line of division are removed? Mr. S. also adverted to the compact with Ohio, by which the Government agreed to make the road, in consideration of the exemption of the public land from taxation—it added to the value of the public lands by facilitating emigration and intercourse. The Western lands had put into the public Treasury more than thirty millions of dollars, and would yield as much more; and will you return no part to those who have paid it, but expend the whole for the benefit of the Atlantic coast and foreign commerce, which had cost this nation, in support of navies, lights, forts, &c., more than one hundred millions of dollars? Mr. S. then appealed to the liberality of the East to grant this pittance to their Western brethren; to the West he appealed to save their people from taxation, by reducing the cost of their goods, &c.; and his colleagues he hoped would yield their State prejudices to the high considerations of national policy, which should alone influence upon this floor. This road, he repeated, had been completed, at an expense of near two millions; it is now in a state of rapid dilapidation; and will you suffer the money and the road to be lost to the nation? He hoped a policy so inconsistent with the liberal and enlightened views of those who had commenced and finished this great work would not be adopted.

Mr. BALDWIN remarked that, when it was stated that two counties had produced 371,000 barrels of flour and 28,000 barrels of whiskey in a year for market, he thought it was too much to say that they were so poor that they could not repair the slip of a hill that had fallen into the road. When a particular object was to be carried, it was not uncommon to excite a clamor, in order that the real question might be lost sight of. The cry of mad dog was raised, the better to elude inquiry. The gentlemen in favor of the appropriation had talked much of this as a national road and a national object, and of the illiberal, local views of those who oppose it. But gentleman should recollect that there is a wide difference between the victims and the favorites of the Government. This road had gone far to desolate ninety miles of the mountainous part of Pennsylvania. Was it then to be expected that it could be viewed by that State with indifference? Even the worm that is trod on has the right to groan. When the last appropriation was made for the Cumberland road, a pledge was given that no more should be asked for. But now it is openly avowed by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. CAMPBELL,) that this is to be followed by future appropriations, and to be sustained by the nation as a perpetual charity. And why should this be done? If it is so valuable, why can it not support itself? Where the Cumberland road passes over the mountains, the country is not more barren than the corresponding county where the Pennsylvania road crosses them. But we are told that this is a connecting chain that binds together the East and the West. It is a singular chain, indeed, that is broken in the middle. What is the situation of the road between Hagerstown and Boonsborough? Little better than a mud hole or a swamp. This is a part of the chain. And where are the chains to connect the other parts of the country? By what national road are the North and the South connected? What national road runs to the East? Is this the only national object which the Government is authorized to foster? The House are now to decide an important question—Whether a part of the country that lives upon and grows rich by this road, shall be exempted from the expense of keeping it in repair? His colleague, (Mr. STEWART,) had stated the great reduction in the price of transportation. But this took place before the Cumberland road was made, and was owing to other causes. Mr. B. had other objections to this appropriation. Appropriation bills, the House had been told by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, were not proper bills for legislation. They were only to provide for the fulfilment of existing laws. But now the Committee of Ways and Means have converted themselves into a Committee on Roads and Canals. An appropriation bill should not give a preference of one over another; and if the Committee on Manufactures had introduced a bill to establish a road leading into Pittsburg, it was easy to divine that something would be heard of it from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. But when a road is to be made or repaired from Cumberland to Wheeling, the national funds cannot be withheld. The effect of this road was, Mr. B. observed, to destroy the stock in the other roads in Pennsylvania; and how would gentlemen feel if the whole weight of the National Treasury was brought to bear on their own section of the country? Mr. B. was sensible it was difficult to resist this measure—and for an obvious reason—it affects injuriously only one State in the Union; but that State, if too feeble to arrest the measure, would at least be allowed to protest against the application of the public money for a private and local object, so deeply injurious to its own interest.

The motion to strike out was further supported by Mr. WOODCOCK, of New York, and opposed by Mr. WRIGHT, and Mr. WARFIELD, when the question was taken thereon, and carried—ayes 70.

APRIL, 1822.

Mr. CONDUCT then moved to strike out the clause providing for the erection of a wooden bridge over the Monongahela river, where the Cumberland road crosses the same at Brownsville. The motion was supported by Mr. MILNOR, and opposed by Mr. STEWART and Mr. F. JONES, when the question was taken thereon and carried—ayes 80, noes 32.

The bill having then been gone through with, Mr. BALDWIN proposed to amend the section, by adding thereto a clause, the purport of which was to have the year commence and end in the month of April annually instead of January, (so far as regards salaries, but not contingencies,) for the purpose of avoiding inconveniences that were now often and severely felt. The question was taken on the motion and negatived—55 to 53.

Mr. TRACY proposed an amendment of the bill in relation to the compensation to the messengers. When he first agitated that subject, his object was not to reduce, but to define their compensation.

The CHAIRMAN decided that the blank having been filled by the committee, it was not competent to propose a different sum, unless that vote should be previously reconsidered, and that it was not competent to move a reconsideration of that vote, because more than one day had elapsed since the vote was taken. The decision was acquiesced in.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina then moved an amendment, the purport of which was to exclude and prohibit all allowance from the contingent expenses of the War Department being made to the Surgeon General for quarters and fuel.

This motion was supported by the mover and Mr. COCKE, and opposed by Messrs. FULLER, DWIGHT, McDUFFIE, WALWORTH, and SMITH, of Maryland, but before any decision was had definitely thereon the Committee rose and reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

MONDAY, April 8.

Mr. BURTON submitted to the House a printed copy of an act of the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, entitled "An act to incorporate a company, entitled 'The Roanoke Inlet Company,' and for other purposes."—Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STEVENSON presented a petition of sundry millers, and owners of mills, in the county of Loudon, and State of Virginia, praying that certain regulations, therein specified, may be adopted, respecting the inspection of flour in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEVENSON also presented a memorial of sundry freeholders and other inhabitants of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, praying that the code of jurisprudence, framed by William Cranch, Esq., Chief Judge of the Circuit Court of the United States, in and for said District, may be considered and adopted.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. NELSON, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings, made a report in relation to advances made by, and to a balance due from, the late Commissioner of the Public Buildings; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to authorize the issuing of letters patent to Richard Holden; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the same committee, also reported a bill to authorize the issuing of letters patent to Joshua Garsed; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DENISON, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office, reported a bill further regulating the compensation of postmasters, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making further appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1822, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill supplementary to, and to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed the 2d of March, 1799, and to repeal an act supplementary thereto," were discharged from the consideration thereof; and the bill was committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TAYLOR submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, jointly with such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to inquire and report what business now depending before the respective Houses, ought to be acted upon during the present session.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the resolution, by making the committee consist of one member from each State, which was negatived; and, after a few remarks by Messrs. ROSS and CANNON, the resolution, on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, was ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York, submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Postmaster General, be required to report to this House, on the first day of the next session, the number of superintendents, assistants, deputies, comptrollers, auditors, clerks, and messengers, retained in their respective departments; and whether any of them, and if any, how many of them, are unnecessary, inefficient, superannuated, or engaged in other pursuits or professions, in no wise relating to the public service; and, also, whether they cannot adopt a more efficient, as well as a more economical organization of their respective departments.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table one day.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting, by law, any allowance for quarters and fuel to the Surgeon General, or other staff officers of the army, who are paid salaries, or a stated sum of money per annum, for their services.

The resolution submitted on Saturday, by Mr. COCKE, calling for information relative to the expenses incurred by missions to foreign Courts, was taken into consideration, and adopted.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider the bill to revive and continue in force certain acts for the adjustment of land claims in the Territory of Michigan: Whereupon it was ordered, that the said bill be committed to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill for the relief of Reuben Hickman and Fielding Hickman.

Mr. HUBBARD asked to be permitted to record his vote, at this time, on the question taken on Thursday, the 28th ultimo, on the question to concur in the first resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and subjoined to the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, recommending a recognition of the independence of the late Spanish American provinces; alleging that indisposition prevented his attendance on that day and until the present; and the House having, by unanimous consent, granted the permission asked for, his name was called by the Clerk, when he answered in the affirmative.

TERRITORY OF FLORIDA.

A Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, received on Saturday last, was read, and is as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate herewith to the House a report from the Secretary of War, containing the information requested by their resolution of the 5th ultimo.

It may be proper further to add, that the secretaries of both the Territories have occasionally required and received the aid of the military force of the United States, stationed within them, respectively, to carry into effect the acts of their authority.

The government of East and West Florida was, under the Spanish dominion, almost exclusively military; the Governors of both were military officers, and united in their persons the chief authority, both civil and military.

The principle upon which the act of Congress, of the last session, providing for the temporary government of the newly ceded provinces, was carried into execution, has been communicated to Congress in my Message at the opening of the session. It was to leave the authorities of the country, as they were found existing at the time of the cession, to be exercised until the meeting of Congress, when it was known that the introduction of a system, more congenial to our own institutions, would be one of the earliest and most important subjects of their deliberations. From this, among other obvious considerations, military officers were appointed to take possession of both provinces. But, as the military command of General Jackson was to cease on the 1st of June, General Gaines, the officer next in command, then here, who was first designated to take possession of East Florida, received from me a verbal direction to give such effect to any requisition from the Governor for military aid, to enforce his authority, as the circumstances might require.

It was not foreseen that the command in both the provinces would, before further legislation by Congress on that subject, devolve upon the secretaries of the Territories, but, had it been foreseen, the same direction would have been given as applicable to them.

No authority has been given to either of the secretaries to issue commands to that portion of the Army which is in Florida; and whenever the aid of the military has been required by them, it has been by written requisitions to the officers commanding the troops, who have yielded compliance thereto, doubtless under the directions received from General Gaines, as understood by him to be authorized.

Shortly before the meeting of Congress a letter was received at the War Department from Colonel Brooke, the officer commanding at Pensacola, requesting instructions how far he was to consider these requisitions as authoritative; but the assurance that a new organization of the government was immediately to be authorized by Congress, was a motive for superseding any specific decision upon the inquiry.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 23, 1822.

SIR: The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, requesting the President of the United States to inform the House "whether that portion of the United States Army, now in Florida, is commanded by the officers of the said Army, or by the Secretary of the Territory; and if by the latter, by what authority is he invested with such command," has the honor to transmit a report of the Adjutant General, which furnishes all the information in this Department in relation to the subject. I have the honor to be, &c.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,

Washington, March 22, 1822.

SIR: In reply to your communication of the 21st instant, transmitting a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 5th, I have to report, that, from the returns in the Adjutant General's Office, it appears that the troops now in Florida—those at Pensacola and St. Mark's—were under the command of Colonel J. R. Fenwick, and those at St. Augustine and Amelia Island, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Eustis.

It does not appear, from any returns or reports in this office, that the secretaries of Florida have exercised any command over the troops within that Territory. I have the honor to be, &c.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, who were instructed "to inquire into the expediency of transferring the duties heretofore performed by the Commissioner of the Public Buildings to the principal Architect," made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill fixing the compensation of the said Commissioner; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

H. OF R.

Pay of the Army and Navy Officers.

APRIL, 1822.

The Committee on the Public Buildings, to whom was referred a resolution of the 2d of April instant, directing an inquiry to be made "into the expediency of transferring the duties heretofore performed by the Commissioner of the Public Buildings to the principal architect," report :

That, by an act of Congress, passed on the 16th day of July, 1790, the President of the United States was authorized to appoint, and keep in appointment so long as might be necessary, three commissioners, whose duty, among other things, it was made by the said act, (according to such plans as the President should approve,) to provide suitable buildings for the accommodation of Congress, and of the President, and for the public offices of the Government of the United States. The office of the commissioners, created by the abovementioned act, was abolished by an act of Congress passed on the first day of May, A. D. 1802; and the affairs of the city of Washington, which had been under the care and superintendence of the commissioners, were placed under the direction of a superintendent, appointed by and acting under the control of the President of the United States. The superintendent was invested with all the powers, and charged with the performance of all the duties of the commissioners, by or in virtue of any act of Congress, or any act of the General Assembly of Maryland, or any deed or deeds of trust from the original proprietors of the lots in the said city, or in any other manner whatever. The salary of the superintendent was fixed by the act of 3d March, 1803, at twelve hundred dollars per annum, besides contingent expenses.

By the act of April 29th, 1806, the office of superintendent was abolished, and the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, was required to appoint one commissioner, who shall hold no other office under the authority of the United States; who is allowed a salary of two thousand dollars, and who shall perform all the duties with which the three commissioners were charged, and the duties of the superintendent. It is the duty of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings to select and appoint the architect and all other agents engaged in the public buildings, to fix their compensation, to determine the number and description of workmen to be employed, and their pay, to provide and purchase materials, to inspect the plans and execution of the work, and to have the general regulation and superintendence of the whole. It is his duty to make all the disbursements of money, either on account of labor or materials, to procure regular vouchers for the same, and to account at the Treasury for all sums appropriated to objects within his department. It is also his duty, as superintendent of the city of Washington, to see that the plan and regulations are observed, to attend to the sale of public lots, to collect and account for the proceeds thereof, to make, under certain circumstances, streets through, and footways in front of, the public grounds, and to have the care and management of those grounds. It is also understood that the United States are parties to the several suits now depending to try the right to the property in the city of Washington, of a considerable amount, the care and management of which suits appertain to the Commissioner of the Public Buildings. It may not be thought irrelevant here to refer to a report made by the Commissioner of Public Buildings, to the House of Representatives, during the present session, in relation to the public lands in the city of Washington, by which it appears, "that of the building lots there remain unsold about the number of 5,150, the reservations, containing together 541 acres, 1 rood and 29 perches, or 23,584,745 square feet, equal to 4,479½ standard lots; "that the average price of the public lots heretofore sold is $180 per lot, and at this valuation the whole of the grounds belonging to the United States in the city of Washington amount to one million seven hundred and thirty-three thousand three hundred and ten dollars." There is no such officer created by law as an architect of the public buildings, but it is the duty of the Commissioner of Public Buildings to employ an architect, when necessary, as it is his duty likewise to employ all other necessary agents; and when the public buildings shall be completed, the services of an architect may be dispensed with. From the view which the committee have taken of the duties of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, taking into consideration the quantity and value of the public property subject to his care and management, they cannot resist the impression that the office is a necessary one, that its duties are important, and that it is inexpedient to transfer them, as proposed by the resolution. The committee, however, being anxious to retrench the expenditure of the public money, where it may be done without sacrifice of the public interest, and believing that the duties of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings are less arduous than they formerly were, in consequence of the progress made towards the completion of the buildings, recommend a reduction of the salary of the Commissioner to the sum of fifteen hundred dollars per annum, and for that purpose have directed that a bill be reported.

PAY OF ARMY AND NAVY OFFICERS.

Mr. CONDUCT submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire and to report to this House what amount of compensation is paid by the United States to an army officer of each grade, from the rank of major general down to the lowest commissioned officer, including the staff appointments; distinguishing the monthly or annual pay from the moneys paid for rations, forage, quarters, fuel, transportation, or perquisites of any other description, and the several sums allowed for each item.

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire and report what amount of compensation is paid to Naval officers, including the Marine Corps, from the highest to the lowest grade, inclusive; distinguishing the monthly or annual pay from all other payments or perquisites of any description, and the several sums allowed for each item.

Mr. COCKE was in favor of the object of the resolutions, but he believed them to be unnecessary, because the information they contained was already in the possession of the House.

Mr. EUSTIS also opposed the resolutions, as being unnecessary; and he stated that the Military Committee had called on one of the Departments, and found that it had been occupied twenty days in making out a reply to a call for information by a member of this House, which, with the printing, would cost the nation from five to seven thousand dollars. He believed this information was within the reach of every member, without again calling on the Department for it.

After a few further remarks by the mover, the resolutions, on motion of Mr. CONDUCT, were ordered to be laid on the table.

MONUMENT TO BARON DE KALB.

Mr. WRIGHT, pursuant to notice, asked leave to introduce a bill to erect a monument to the memory of the late Baron De Kalb. Mr. W. produced the proceedings of Congress of 1780, as follows:

Resolved, That a monument be erected to the memory of the late Major General Baron De Kalb, in the city of Annapolis, in the State of Maryland, with the following inscription:

Sacred to the Memory of the Baron De Kalb,
Knight of the Royal Order of Military Merit,
Brigadier of the Armies of France, and

Major General in the Service of the United States of America.

Having served, with honor and reputation, for three years,

He gave a last and glorious proof of his attachment to the liberties of mankind and the cause of America,
In the action near Camden, in the State of S. Carolina,
On the 16th April, 1780.

When, leading on the troops of the Maryland and Delaware Lines against superior numbers,

And animating them, by his example,
to deeds of valor,

He was pierced with many wounds, and on the 19th following expired, in the 48th year of his age.

The Congress of the United States of America,
In gratitude to his zeal, services, and merit, have decreed
This Monument.

Having read this resolution, Mr. W. said he believed it to be his duty, as a Representative of the State of Maryland, to fulfil the engagement of those patriots of the Revolution who achieved our independence, in a case like this, where they intended to honor a hero of a foreign clime, who shed his blood for the liberties of America; especially as, in doing this, they perpetuate the services of the Maryland and Delaware lines, who distinguished themselves on that occasion. The small sum requisite to do this business, he was sure, would not influence any member of the House against carrying into effect the grateful intentions of those patriots who declared us independent.

[The House refused to consider Mr. W.'s motion—ayes 26.]

TIME OF ADJOURNMENT.

The House then took into consideration the resolution from the Senate, fixing the time for the adjournment of Congress.

The resolve was so amended, on motion, as to leave the time of the adjournment in blank.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, moved to fill the blank with the 29th day of the present month; and he made a number of remarks to evince the expediency of the motion he had made.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, proposed the 13th of May; and he thought, from the great variety of important objects before the House, it was impossible to conclude the public business at an earlier period. He was opposed to an earlier meeting at the next session; for experience had shown that one week towards the close of the session was more valuable for the doing of business than four at the commencement.

Mr. WALWORTH proposed the first Monday in May, as the day of adjournment.

Mr. SAWYER moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion was negatived.

Mr. CONDUCT moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution for ten days; which, after a few remarks by Mr. WRIGHT, was modified, at the suggestion of Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, so as to move to postpone it to Monday next. When, the question being taken thereon, the motion was negatived—ayes 59, noes 86.

Mr. WOOD was in favor of the time named by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland. He thought the gentlemen who were disposed to retrench the public expenditures ought to be willing to stay here and examine the subject; and he believed that by a due and proper examination of the Army and Navy estimates a million of dollars might be saved.

Mr. BASSETT named the fourth Monday of April.

After further observations by Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. STEWART, and Mr. WRIGHT—

Mr. SAWYER named the 15th of May as the day of adjournment; which, being the remotest period, the question was first taken thereupon, and negatived.

The motion of Mr. SMITH was next in order; and the question being taken thereon, (viz: the 15th of May,) the same was negatived—ayes 70, noes 75.

Mr. WALWORTH'S proposition (the first Monday in May) being next before the House—

Mr. COLDEN moved to change the day of adjournment from Monday to Saturday; and, after a few remarks from Mr. CHAMBERS—

Mr. LITTLE moved to fill the blank with the words "on Wednesday, the 8th of May next."

Mr. WALKER proposed Saturday, the 11th of May next; which was negatived.

The question then occurred on Mr. LITTLE'S motion, (the 8th of May,) which was put, and carried—ayes 83, noes 76. And by unanimous consent the resolution was then read a third time, passed, and returned to the Senate.

AMERICAN PROPERTY SEQUESTERED IN ENGLAND.

Mr. RUSSELL made the following report, which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom has been referred the petition of Jacob Schieffelin and Henry H. Schieffelin, having duly considered the same, report: That a report was made to the House, by the Committee of Claims, at the first session of the sixteenth Congress, unfavorable to the prayer of the petitioners. To that report, and to the report of the Secretary of State, of the 6th of January, 1820, on which it was founded, and to the documents cited by the latter, your committee ask leave to refer.

H. OF R.

American Property sequestered in England.

APRIL, 1822.

The petitioners now, in substance, state that, finding by the report of the Secretary of State, above referred to, that they are "precluded from all retrospective claims on the British Government by the late treaty of peace, and that their claim has never been preferred, and thus being deprived of all hope of remuneration from that Government," they appeal to the justice of the Government of the United States, and ask for that relief which Congress, in its wisdom, may deem proper to grant.

Your committee are of opinion that the report of the Secretary of State does not apply to the case of the petitioners when it states that "it was distinctly understood [by the respective parties on signing the Treaty of Ghent] that no retrospect was to be taken on either side for losses occasioned by the hostilities incident to war." It is not necessary to infer, from the obvious import of the terms here used, that the report applies only to losses during the war, and occasioned by the hostilities incident to it. The documents now before the public furnish precise and conclusive evidence of the facts on which that report was founded.

In the projet of a treaty submitted on the 10th of November, 1814, by the American to the British Plenipotentiaries at Ghent, the thirteenth article proposed "that indemnity shall be made, by each of the contracting parties, to the subjects and citizens of the other party, for all losses and damages sustained subsequent to the commencement of the present war, by reason of seizure or condemnation of vessels or cargoes belonging to the subjects or citizens of the one party, which, in the ordinary course of commerce, happened to be in the ports of the other party; and by reason of the destruction of unfortified towns, and the pillage or destruction of private property, and the enticement and carrying away of negroes, contrary to the known and established rules and usages of war between civilized nations." To this part of the article the British Plenipotentiaries would not assent, as may be seen in their note to the American Ministers of the 26th of November of the same year. The American Ministers, in reply to that note, on the 30th of the same month, felt themselves obliged to acquiesce in this decision of the other party, and to say that they "will decline insisting upon so much of the thirteenth article as relates to indemnity for losses and damages subsequent to the commencement of the present war."

After this dissent on the part of the British, and this acquiescence on the part of the American Plenipotentiaries, the report of the Secretary of State might well say that there was a mutual understanding, which would have rendered it obviously useless to urge, after the conclusion of the treaty, claims thus unequivocally excluded before. Still your committee do not consider that report as applicable to the claim of the petitioners; first, because that claim existed prior to the war; and secondly, if it had not so existed, it does not come within the terms or spirit of any of the cases thus excluded.

The property claimed by the petitioners was, according to their own showing, captured and condemned by the British in 1808; the sentence of condemnation reversed by the high court of admiralty in 1810; and the liquidation being delayed until the declaration of war by the United States in 1812, the property was then sequestered, and declared to be lawful prize to the King in 1813, "although taken prior to hostilities."

The claim, therefore, of the petitioners originated in 1808, long before the commencement of the war, and, remaining unliquidated and unpaid, had never ceased to exist, and thence cannot be considered as a claim for losses and damages sustained subsequent to the war. The war merely changed the professed intentions of the British Government, and substituted prompt confiscation for what strongly resembled it in effect, indefinitely delayed restitution, and thus consummated a loss which had long before been sustained.

If the loss of the petitioners, however, can be considered as sustained subsequent to the commencement of the war, still it cannot be brought within either of the two classes of cases described in the thirteenth article above cited, on which the report of the Secretary of State was obviously founded, and, of course, cannot be involved in the fate of those cases.

As the only reason assigned by the petitioners for bringing their claim again before Congress being the inference which they erroneously drew from that report, that this claim had been "precluded by the late treaty of peace, and never preferred," your committee believe that, in showing, as they have done, that this report does not apply to the case, they take from the petitioners the only reason which they have assigned for again presenting their claim to this House.

Your committee, however, entirely disposed to give ample proof of the spirit with which this investigation is pursued, do not confine themselves to this view of the subject. Should the petitioners be able hereafter to show, which it is believed they cannot, that their claim for indemnity is for a loss subsequent to the commencement of hostilities, and that it was fairly within the description of the cases which the American Ministers understood to be abandoned, still, as this abandonment was manifestly the result of imperious necessity, it could authorize no demand on this Government for compensation.

As your committee have considered the claim now under examination not to be for a loss subsequent to the commencement of hostilities, and, consequently, that it must be for a loss sustained prior to that epoch, they will now endeavor to show that the petitioners have no right to ask of this Government any compensation for a loss so sustained.

In the first clause of the projet of a treaty of the 10th of November, 1814, already cited, the American Ministers require "that indemnity shall be made by His Britannic Majesty to the citizens of the United States for all losses and damages sustained by them during the late war between Great Britain and France, and prior to the commencement of the present war, by reason of irregular or illegal captures, seizures, or condemnations of vessels and other property, under color of authority, and contrary to the known and established rules of the law of nations."

This clause clearly embraces the case of the petitioners. It was, however, like the remainder of that article, pronounced to be "inadmissible" by the British commissioners; yet the American Plenipotentiaries did not abandon the claims which it embraced, but, in waiving them at that time, they explicitly state, in their note of the 30th November, already cited, that they do so with an understanding that "the rights of both Powers, on the subject of seamen, and the claims of the citizens and subjects of the two contracting parties to indemnities for losses and damages sustained prior to the commencement of the war, shall not be affected or impaired by the omission in the treaty of any specific provision with respect to these two subjects."

APRIL, 1822.

This declaration on the part of the American commissioners was considered by them to be formal; for, in referring to it in their despatch to the Secretary of State of the 25th of December, 1814, the very next day after the treaty was signed, they say, "In declining to insist on the articles respecting impressment and indemnities, we made a formal declaration that the rights of both parties on the subject of seamen, and the claims to indemnity for losses and damages sustained prior to the commencement of the war, should not be affected or impaired by the omission in the treaty of a specific provision on these two subjects."

To prove to the conviction of every unprejudiced mind that the American Ministers at Ghent did not cease to insist on the claims of our citizens on the British Government for indemnity for losses sustained either before the war or during its continuance, until the last hope of success was extinguished, your committee need only to cite a paragraph of the note of the British Ministers of the 26th of November, 1814, on this subject. That paragraph, equally applicable to losses sustained before or after the commencement of hostilities, says, "With respect to the thirteenth article, the indemnification proposed by it, as applied to the actual circumstances of the war, are so unprecedented and objectionable, that any further perseverance of the American plenipotentiaries in requiring them is not anticipated by the undersigned; if, however, contrary to expectation, indemnifications of this kind should be required, all hope of bringing the negotiations to a favorable issue must prove abortive. The undersigned are instructed explicitly to declare that, as their Government makes no claim on account of losses sustained by British subjects arising out of a war declared by the United States, so neither can their Government agree to make compensation for losses sustained in such a war by the American people."

Had the American Ministers, after the receipt of this note, persisted in adhering to an article requiring indemnity for losses sustained either before or after the commencement of hostilities, it is manifest that they must have done so at the imminent hazard, nay, with the certainty, of protracting indefinitely the existing war.

No nation is obliged to make war, or to prolong it when it exists, for the advantage or accommodation of the few. The whole duty of a Government towards its citizens, in this respect, is to seek redress for their wrongs by such means only as shall be perfectly consistent with the welfare and interests of all: of these means the Government is the sole competent judge, and is not responsible for their failure in producing the desired effect to those for whose special benefit they may have been used. For the benefit of the present petitioners these means have been employed by the American Government to the last, and relinquished only when it became obviously necessary so to do, in order to avert the continuance of a destructive and devastating war with the foreign aggressor. Still, in submitting to this necessity, the American Commissioners did not consent to abandon the claim of the petitioners, and, far from signing a treaty with an understanding that this claim was so abandoned, they made a formal declaration that the silence of that treaty in respect to it should not affect or impair it.

Whatever might be the legal effect of such an ex parte declaration in preserving our rights, or the corresponding obligations of the party to whom it was addressed, still it was all that, under existing circumstances, could be done for the petitioners; and it ought, therefore, at least to satisfy them that the American Government has not, by neglecting its duties, become responsible to them for indemnity.

This ex parte declaration, reserving, perhaps, on the part of this Government, the right only of renewing hostilities for the attainment of the objects to which it related, whenever such a resort should be found to be expedient, ought to be considered as renouncing, or at least as indefinitely postponing, the right to attain those objects in the ordinary forms of negotiation or diplomatic intercourse. Your committee are, therefore, of opinion that it would afterwards have been useless, and still would be useless, and thence improper, for the American Government to resort to such means; and that the petitioners have, therefore, no just cause to complain if their claim has not been, or shall not be, so "preferred."

The property of the petitioners has never been taken by this Government for the use of the American public; but it has, to the injury of both, been taken and confiscated by a public enemy. For the petitioners, therefore, after all that has been done for them, to insinuate a claim on this Government for indemnity for such a loss, would seem to be adding injustice to ingratitude.

This claim of the petitioners, indeed, appears to be the more ungracious, as the British order for the final confiscation of their property was dated the 13th of December, 1813, and the Treaty of Ghent was not signed until the 24th of December, 1814; and, during the intervening period of more than a year, they never acquainted either the American Government or its Ministers with the existence of the fact, nor in any way qualified either to demand, specially, an indemnity which the peculiar circumstances of their case might have seemed to warrant. The petitioners, it is believed, cannot intend to ask their Government to indemnify them for any evil which may thus have resulted from their own negligence.

Your committee, aware of the extraordinary hardship of the case referred to them, have been thus particular in reporting on it that the petitioners themselves may be satisfied that, although the aggravated circumstances which attended their loss can form no rightful claim on this Government for indemnity, or even for interference, yet those circumstances have not been disregarded. It is believed, indeed, that the British Government, in availing itself of its own wrong in taking and detaining the property until it was liable, by the rights of war, to be confiscated, has committed a singular act of injustice.

The Government of the United States, however, is in no way responsible for that act; and, having done all, and omitted nothing, which it was its duty to do, in order to obtain justice for the petitioners, your committee are of opinion that, however it may accord with propriety for the petitioners themselves to ask, as a matter of grace, of a foreign Government, the revision of and unusual and severe exercise of an extreme right, yet it does not become this Government to advise or to aid in such a request.

Your committee, having thus fully considered the subject referred to them, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

H. OF R.

General Appropriation Bill.

APRIL, 1822.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the unfinished business of Saturday last, (the General Appropriation bill.)

The question occurred upon the amendment proposed on Saturday by Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, relative to the allowance for fuel and quarters to the Surgeon General. Mr. W. stated, that the subject, since that period, having taken a different direction, he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON moved to insert an amendment, the purport of which was to make a specific appropriation for the compensation of the Registers of the Land Offices, and the Receivers of the Public Moneys, in lieu of retaining their salaries, &c., as is now practised. The motion was supported by the mover, and by Messrs. RANKIN and STERLING, of New York; and opposed by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, Mr. SLOAN, and Mr. WOOD, when the motion was withdrawn by the mover.

Mr. COCKE submitted the following as a proviso to the bill:

"Provided, however, That no money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any person for his compensation, who is in arrears to the United States, until such person shall have accounted for, and paid into the Treasury, all sums for which he may be liable."

The question being taken on this proviso, it was carried without a division.

After a third section had been proposed and adopted,

Mr. COOK submitted the following amendment (in relation to the survey of lands made by General Rector, without authority, in the State of Illinois:)

"And to pay for such surveys of the public land made during the year 1821, as shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury to have been well executed, $50,000."

The motion was opposed by Mr. COCKE, Mr. TOP, Mr. RANKIN, and Mr. VANCE, and supported by the mover, who contended that it was founded on the same basis, as the claim of John Thomas, which was advocated by the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. COCKE) but a few days ago, and he hoped a more rigorous principle would not be introduced in this case than in others. The resolution was also supported, in a speech of considerable length, by Mr. SCOTT, of Missouri, when the question was taken, and the motion negatived by a large majority.

The Committee, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, then rose and reported the bill as amended.

In the House, Mr. TRACY remarked that, when he had, in Committee, suggested the expediency of changing the compensation of the messengers, his object was rather that the amount allowed them should be fixed by law, than that it should be lessened. He was more anxious to correct the abuse than to save the money. The principle of allowing extra compensation from the contingent fund was a bad one, and ought to be corrected.

He was not prepared to say that the amount they had received was too large, and should be sorry, therefore, to have the House, without further knowledge, take from these poor men, by surprise, one-half of their means of support. He should regret to have it supposed that our plan for reform had resulted in such a pitiful saving. There were many more important objects of retrenchment in the bill than this. We had passed over, without observation, officers who received public money by thousands, to fasten on these defenceless messengers. He was ashamed to be fishing for sprats and minnows while the sharks and grampuses ran free. He moved, therefore, to strike out the sum reported, and to insert one thousand and fifty dollars, as the compensation for principal messenger and his assistant.

The question was further debated by Mr. COCKE, Mr. COLDEN, and Mr. FARRELLY, when the question was taken and decided in the affirmative—ayes 61, noes 42.

Mr. TRACY moved to insert the words "seven hundred" in lieu of four hundred and ten dollars, as the compensation for the messenger in the First Auditor's Office, which was agreed to, and it was decided by the House that the same rule of construction should apply to all the messengers, as the provisons for them respectively occur in the bill.

The question of allowance to the messenger in the office of the Register of the Treasury being under consideration—after a running debate, the blank was filled with the sum of eight hundred dollars.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to reinstate the compensation for a clerk in the Office of the Surgeon General; and, after a few remarks by Mr. STERLING, of New York, against concurring with the Committee of the Whole, in striking out the provision for that clerk, the question was taken, and the House refused to concur therein.

The question of concurrence with the Committee of the Whole in refusing to make an appropriation to repair the Cumberland road being under consideration,

Mr. F. JONES opposed the concurrence in a speech of considerable length; but, before he had concluded, on motion of Mr. H. NELSON, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 9.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill from the Senate for the relief of the legal representatives of Joseph Hodgson, deceased, and a bill for the relief of the sureties of Joseph Pettipool, severally, without amendment; which were respectively committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill from the Senate, designating the boundaries of a land district, and for the establishment of a land office in the State of Indiana, without amendment; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of Captain James Barron; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill from the Senate, to perfect certain locations and sales of public lands in Missouri, without amendment; which, on motion of Mr. R., was ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill from the Senate, to establish an additional land office in the State of Illinois, without amendment; which was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. PATTERSON, of New York, yesterday: whereupon, it was ordered that the resolution lie upon the table.

On motion of Mr. BALDWIN, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the payment of the salaries of public officers, from the first of January to the first of April next year, and of providing, by law, that appropriations hereafter shall be made for one year, from the first of April in each year.

Mr. SAWYER submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie upon the table:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, after the adjournment of the present session, the next meeting of Congress shall be on the first Monday of November next.

Mr. KENT submitted the following resolution; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table one day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House the amount of public lands in each State and Territory; the amount of public lands heretofore sold in each State and Territory; and to specify how much of the lands sold in each State and Territory have sold for the minimum price, and how much for a greater price, in separate columns, and the aggregate result.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles: "An act to amend the act granting the right of pre-emption to certain settlers in the State of Louisiana, and for other purposes;" and "An act to enable the holders of incomplete French and Spanish titles to lands within that part of the late province of Louisiana, which is now comprised within the limits of the State of Missouri, to institute proceedings to try the validity thereof, and to obtain complete titles for the same when found to be valid;" in which bills they request the concurrence of this House.

A Message received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, on yesterday, was taken up and read, as follows, viz:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, requesting the President of the United States to cause to be furnished to that House certain information relating to the amount of the public money paid to the Attorney General, over and above his salary fixed by law, since the first of January, 1817, specifying the time when paid, and the fund out of which such payments have been made, I transmit a paper marked A, containing the information desired. I transmit, also, a paper marked B, containing a statement of sums paid to Attorneys General of the United States, prior to the first of January, 1817, and in the paper marked C a like statement of sums advanced to district attorneys for services not required of them by law. These latter documents being necessary to a full view of the subject, it is thought proper to comprise them in this communication.

By the act of the 24th of September, 1789, instituting the office of Attorney General, it was made his duty to prosecute and conduct all suits in the Supreme Court, in which the United States should be concerned, and to give his advice and opinion upon questions of law, when required by the President of the United States, or when requested by the head of any of the Departments, touching any matters that might concern their departments. It will be seen, therefore, by the statement communicated, that no money whatever has been paid to the Attorney General, for his services in that character, nor for any duty belonging to his office, beyond his salary as fixed by law.

It will also be shown, by the documents communicated, that the construction given of the laws imposing duties on the Attorney General and district attorneys, have been invariably the same since the institution of the Government. On the same authority it was thought that the compensation allowed to the present Attorney General, for certain services, considering their importance, and the time employed in rendering them, did not exceed, regarding precedents, what might fairly be claimed.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, April 6, 1822.

The Message and documents were laid on the table.

PUBLIC MONEYS.

Mr. BASSETT submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That in all future transactions of the Government, either where services are to be rendered, or supplies furnished, no money shall be advanced by the Government, or payments made, but in exact proportion to work done, or services rendered, or supplies furnished, before such payment.

Resolved, That when any officer, or other agent of the Government, shall fail to settle his accounts within the period prescribed therefor, it shall be the duty of the Secretary, or the head of the Department in which it shall occur, to dismiss such officer immediately, and in those cases where the power to dismiss is not in the head of the Department, it is hereby made his duty to report such case to the President, whose duty it shall be to dismiss such officer or agent from the service of the Government.

Resolved, That the President may, for the payment of pensions, military pay, and supplies, order such advances to be made as the public service may imperiously require, and shall have like power to order such necessary advances as the public good may imperiously require in the remoter points of the United States, or without the United States, but no such advances shall be made on contracts hereafter to be made with the Government; all advances made under this authority shall be accounted for within the period prescribed and shall, on failure, be subject to the penalties prescribed in other cases.

Resolved, That all officers, agents, or contractors, of the Government shall, if within two hundred miles of the seat of Government, settle their accounts once in every quarter; if within four hundred miles, in four months; if within five hundred, five months; if within the United States, six months. And all such officers or agents of the Government, to whom it may be necessary to advance money without the United States, shall be held to make settlement in three months after their return to the United States.

Resolved, That the President and heads of Departments apply these principles, in an equitable manner, to all persons now indebted to the United States.

Mr. B. explained briefly his views in offering the resolutions, and concluded by moving that the same be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then agreed to resume the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1822; and the immediate question was, upon a concurrence with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the appropriation for the repair of the Cumberland road.

Mr. F. JONES concluded his speech of yesterday, and called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were thereupon ordered.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he should make no apology for rising to address the House upon the present occasion. The character of Pennsylvania, he said, had been attacked, and her views had been misrepresented, by honorable gentlemen upon this floor; and he should feel himself utterly unworthy of the trust reposed in him, as one of her representatives, if, after what had been said, he were not to stand forth in her defence.

As it often happened, said Mr. B., that men are most afflicted by imaginary diseases, so it occurs that they most dread imaginary dangers. This has been the case with the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. JONES.) He has been grappling with the State of Pennsylvania, as though she stood ready to hurl the mountain into the Cumberland road, described by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. BAYLY,) and he were the Atlas who could sustain it upon his shoulders, and thus make the attempt unavailing. This fancy of the gentleman has produced an excellent speech. Indeed, without much imagination and ardor of feeling, there can be but little eloquence. Let me, however, assure that gentleman and this House, that neither Pennsylvania nor her representatives dream of the destruction of the Cumberland road.

The gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. JONES,) and the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HARDIN,) have ingeniously attempted to connect the grant of this appropriation with the preservation or destruction of this road. They have asked us if we will now destroy that great national work—if we will close the avenues which keep the intercourse open between the East and the West. I answer we will not. We all admit that the road should be preserved. The question now to be determined by this House is not whether the road shall be destroyed, but by whom shall it be repaired, whether by the United States or by the people who use, and for whose benefit it was constructed.

The National Government have made the road at an expense of $1,000,000. Notwithstanding all that has been said by gentlemen about the existence of a compact for that purpose, it now appears that five-sixths of this enormous expenditure has been pure bounty. It has been stated, and not contradicted, that the two per cent. upon the whole amount of the sales of lands of Ohio, which was the sum pledged for the purpose of making a road, does not exceed $300,000. The United States then, in the construction of the Cumberland road, have been actuated by the most liberal policy towards the people of the West.

What has been the principal argument urged by gentlemen, friendly to this appropriation, to induce us to keep the road in repair? In my opinion it is one of the most wonderful which has ever been presented to this House. Say they, because you have made the road, you should, therefore, be at the expense of supporting it. Is not this a conclusion directly the reverse of one which would naturally flow from the premises? If we have been so generous as to make a road for you, ought you not, at least, to keep it in repair? If tolls could not be collected upon it sufficient for its preservation, there would be some force in the argument. This, however, is not pretended. Indeed we should be almost induced to believe, from the representations of its friends, if we did not know to the contrary, that it was the only road which connects the West with the East.

In what estimation would an individual be held who had received as a free gift a valuable farm, if, when, in the lapse of time, it needed repairs, he should demand from his benefactor the sum which they might cost, and assign his generosity in conferring the original bounty, as a reason why he was bound to satisfy this new claim? The present is a case precisely parallel with the one now before the House, so far as it goes. The gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HARDIN,) and the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. JONES,) have gone still further, and have attributed, not only to my colleagues who have heretofore addressed you on this subject, but to the State of Pennsylvania generally, a selfish and illiberal policy, because they have resisted this unreasonable demand. With what justice the charge has been made remains for this House to determine.

Gentlemen have instituted comparisons between the amount of public money expended for the benefit of the people in the East and in the West. As a present consolation for the disparity in this respect, which the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HARDIN,) supposes to exist in favor of the East, he has predicted that the day will ere long arrive when the weight of power shall be transferred to the West. It is because my feelings are all friendly to that portion of our Union that I dislike to hear such sentiments from sources so respectable. Gentlemen, without intending it, I am convinced, have been thus endeavoring to excite jealousies between people whose feelings and whose common interest are both precisely the same.

With what justice has it been contended by gentlemen, that the money expended in the construction of a navy, has been exclusively for the benefit of the eastern section of the Union? Although it is now generally admitted that a navy is the best defence for all parts of the Union, yet it is peculiarly the bulwark of the country west of the Alleghany mountains. The extent of coast upon the Atlantic would render it impracticable for any hostile naval force altogether to prevent us from sending a portion of our produce to market; but let the mouth of the Mississippi be blockaded by a force of that description, superior to our own, and I ask what will become of all the surplus agricultural productions of the vast and fertile valley watered by that river and its tributary streams? The truth is, we are all so connected together by our interest, as to place us in a state of mutual dependence upon each other, and to make that which is for the interest of any one member of the federal family beneficial, in most instances, to all the rest. We never can be divided without first being guilty of political suicide. The prosperity of all the States depends as much upon their Union as the human life depends upon that of the soul and the body.

The State of Pennsylvania, about the illiberality of whose views on this subject so much has been said, never has acted towards you in the manner those interested in the Cumberland road have done. Had you advanced us the money to construct a road which would have been advantageous to our citizens generally, you should never afterwards have been asked to advance money to keep it in repair. We should have considered such a request both ungrateful and unjust. The citizens of that State, with the aid which she has liberally bestowed, have already completed eighteen hundred and seven miles of turnpike road, of which about twelve hundred and fifty are of solid stone. Laws have been passed for the construction of seven hundred and fourteen miles more. The State has expended upon these objects $1,361,542, and individuals $4,158,347. One of these roads runs nearly parallel with the Cumberland road, and connects the city of Philadelphia with that of Pittsburg. The gentleman from Tennessee, two years ago, found this road to be a bad one. The temper of mind with which people travel has a wonderful effect upon their judgment of the road, and I fear this cause has operated, in no small degree, upon the mind of my honorable friend.

It is expected that this road, as well as all others of the same kind in Pennsylvania, shall not only support itself, but yield some small dividend upon the stock subscribed for its construction. I ask, then, with what justice towards that State can you repair the Cumberland road out of the Treasury, and make it perfectly free? Even after you shall have placed toll gates upon it, there will be no fair competition. No more toll will be collected upon it than will be necessary for its preservation, whilst our road, in addition to that amount, must pay an interest to the State, and to the stockholders. With what propriety, then, can Pennsylvania be censured for maintaining the principle that those who travel upon the Cumberland road, and are most interested in its preservation, should keep it in repair. She does not deserve, at your hands, that you should give a premium out of the public treasury, for the purpose of diverting travellers away from her road, and inducing them to use another which is in no respect superior. It will not be denied but that, in times of trial, she has both fought and paid with as much alacrity as any other State in the Union.

Notwithstanding all that has been said, I believe, as firmly as I do in my existence, that the friends of this road might with safety retrocede it to Pennsylvania. It would not be delivering up the lamb to the wolf, to use the expression of an honorable gentleman. Pennsylvania is now no more governed by a selfish policy, than when she ceded to the United States the soil over which the road passes. She then understood her true interest as well as now. There certainly has been nothing in her conduct since, which could induce a rational belief that she would destroy this great public work, if it were placed in her power. In that case she would do nothing more than impose a toll upon it, sufficient to create a fair competition between it and her own road; and then leave the public to decide which they would use. We do not, however, ask for a retrocession; all we desire is, that the road may hereafter support itself, and not be a perpetual drain upon the public treasury.

The existence of this road, I can assure gentlemen, is not a subject of such alarm to the State of Pennsylvania, nor to her metropolis, as they suppose. Whilst Philadelphia shall deserve the character which she has so justly acquired for commercial integrity, she will always find customers in the West, no matter over what road they may travel. Her experience has already proved the truth of this assertion. It is devoutly to be wished, both for the sake of her merchants and those of the West, that, hereafter, the latter may be able to comply with their contracts better than they have done heretofore. In making this observation, I have not the most remote intention of giving offence, because I know that the pecuniary embarrassments of people of the West arose from causes, the operation of which they did not at first foresee, and could not afterwards control.

We have all, then, arrived at this conclusion, that the road shall not be suffered to go to ruin. Whatever doubts may at present be entertained, either of the policy of its original construction or location, about which I have my own opinion, we must not now allow it to be destroyed. Before toll can with justice be demanded from travellers, it must be repaired. The mountain, which it is said has slid down into it, must be removed. From motives of generosity to the people of the West, and not of justice, I am, therefore, free to acknowledge, that I am willing a provision shall be introduced into the bill for the collection of tolls, appropriating to the road this unexpended balance of $9,194 25. After, however, we shall have given them that amount and our blessing, it should be explicitly understood that we shall never again hear any more demands for money from that quarter on the same account.

It may be asked why I am unwilling to make the appropriation in the present bill? For this, I will briefly state my reasons. The first is, that if the appropriation were once made, we have good reason for apprehending we should not again, during the present session, hear any thing about the collection of toll. It is at least certain that the friends of the road would not then be very anxious for the consideration of the bill providing for that object. We know that one of the gentlemen from Ohio, (Mr. CAMPBELL,) who spoke upon this subject, avowed his opinion that the General Government should always support this road out of the public treasury. I would, therefore, make a provision for the collection of toll, and the appropriation of this unexpended balance as inseparable as man and wife. I know they are unwilling companions, and I dread that, if the one should get the start of the other, it would be difficult ever to unite them.

Another reason which operates forcibly upon my mind is, that this donation has been introduced into the general appropriation bill for the support of Government. The impropriety of this course will appear manifest from considering the character of that measure. Its legitimate purpose is to provide for expenses which either have been, or will be, incurred under the authority of existing laws, or in pursuance of the well established policy of the country. The principle now to be decided by the House is entirely new. It is not as it was formerly, whether you will complete that which you have already commenced; but whether, after having completed, you will keep the road in repair. Appropriations for making the road were matters of course, after you had finally determined it should be constructed. The principle now before the House, however, being entirely new, should have been embraced in a distinct bill, and suffered to rest upon its own merits. When you legislate upon new subjects in a general appropriation bill, you give them an unfair advantage. You drag them along by the force of the bill to which they are attached; and, on its passage, you compel members either to vote in their favor, or stop the wheels of Government.

Upon the same principle that this provision has been introduced into the bill now before the House, you might introduce into it any other claim for money, whether of a public or a private nature. The consequences which would follow, from pursuing such a precedent, I need not detail to this House.

In this case, the precedent would be infinitely the more dangerous, should the grant be introduced into the general appropriation bill, for that very reason. It might then hereafter, with some degree of propriety, be considered as the settled policy of the country to support the road; and as a pledge of the public faith that it shall be repaired out of the public Treasury.

In every view, therefore, which this subject has presented to my mind, I have been led to the conclusion that we should concur with the Committee of the Whole in their report, and strike out this appropriation from the present bill.

Mr. BAYLY, of Maryland, said: Mr. Speaker, I have not heretofore occupied as much of your time upon this floor as some other gentlemen have done, but shall, upon this question, give you a little of my slang. I consider this road a great national object. Some gentlemen take the liberty of talking a great deal without knowing much of the subject, and some of the newspapers have styled this the wisest Congress we have ever had; and, if being dilatory in action, is a mark of wisdom, it is eminently entitled to that appellation—in truth, we are a talking people, and take a long time to consider upon the most trifling appropriation. What is this $9,000, compared with its object? Let us give it to them to make a good road, which will facilitate the intercourse between the East and the West, and diffuse knowledge. Some of our brothers in the West must stand in need of intelligence, otherwise they would not oppose the completion of this road. If we have not the means of communication, we shall in time become divided, and think we have separate and distinct interests. The Union cannot be preserved, except by commercial intercourse, and a free and easy commerce will always keep us united. Why was Alexander called 'Alexander the Great'? Not solely because he conquered the world, but because he connected together all parts of the world, in a grand commercial system—he built Alexandria, and associated his name with the great system of international knowledge and profit, of which he was the author. That is the true reason he has been universally called the Great. Nations whose interests are not united by commerce, become prejudiced, and despise and kill each other.

Pennsylvania, from her opposition, would seem more willing to put a mountain in the middle of the Cumberland road, than to repair it. A large portion of that State does not, nor never did, like this road; that is, the Pittsburg interest does not, because it does not pass through that town. Is this road exclusively advantageous to that part of Pennsylvania and Philadelphia? That is the question with them. I am myself perfectly disinterested, living upon the Atlantic, having never been on this road, and perhaps never shall, for I have no intention as yet of becoming an emigrant, and regret that, at present, such a mania prevails in the Atlantic States, of sinking fortunes in the western wilds; but I have no doubt that, in time, the tide will change, and these emigrants will see their error, and wish to return to the delightful land of their fathers, and then let them have a good road and bridges to facilitate their return. The distinctions of Northern, Eastern, and Western, or men of the woods, should be deprecated. We should be but one people, Americans—and this desirable object is to be attained and preserved only by keeping up an easy and comfortable communication, and reciprocating benefits and favors to one another, and then we shall find that we think, feel, and speak alike. Ecod! then we shall be very good friends. Mr. Chairman, I only speak in the language of our brethren from the West. This is a great national object, and connected with the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, which can be easily affected, will unite, by an easy passage, the Western country with the whole Atlantic coast. New York is cutting a magnificent canal, for which she is entitled to great credit, but some of her great men here think that it goes round the world, and that no other national improvement is worthy consideration. Her politics seem to be bounded by De Witt Clinton and Daniel D. Tompkins, and all public improvements to end with this canal. She has wise men too, wiser no doubt than she has sent here for these two or three years. However, that State is great in resources, but she has received a little help in making her canal by her salt, and Saratoga waters, and tax upon travellers in steamboats. But this has not much to do with the subject. This road ought to be repaired, and then kept up by a toll. There should likewise be a good bridge over the Monongahela; and, instead of forty thousand dollars to build a wooden one, there should be one hundred and forty thousand to make a good substantial stone bridge—a good road, bridges, and canals, connecting the East with the West, will enable all parts of the country to lend speedy aid and assistance to each other, when they shall stand in need in the hour of battle.

The objection against making this appropriation upon Constitutional ground, comes too late; the road and bridges are nearly finished, and the appropriations heretofore made have been sanctioned by Presidents Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, and by many Congresses. There is, however, now, rarely an appropriation that can be thought of, but some gentleman has Constitutional scruples, and one would suppose that, in Virginia, from the nice scruples manifested by some of her members, that it is there thought to be unconstitutional to have or to travel upon a good road. Mr. B. said, that he had merely risen to assist his Western brethren, that he had not any personal interest in the business, and that he believed that the gentleman from Richmond here, (who sat before him,) was in the same situation, and that he hoped that he would lay aside his Constitutional scruples, and lend his assistance.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Ohio, observed, that he regretted much to rise at that period of the debate, and swell the list of speakers on the subject before the House, but, lest he should be thought indifferent to the fate of the present question, he felt it a duty to offer a few remarks against a concurrence with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the appropriation for repairing the Cumberland road. He was the more induced so to do, from observing so great an opposition in many parts of the House to granting this pittance, which, although deemed of immense importance in promoting the views and interests of the people of the West, was so small as scarcely to be worth contending for. We do not claim this appropriation as a matter of absolute right, but appeal to the liberality of the representatives of this nation for a small share of the general benefits. He hoped that, independent of Constitutional objections, which he would not now argue, the present state and condition of the road, and the necessity of a prompt repair, which could be timeously effected in no other way, would be sufficient to induce the liberal and enlightened representatives of this nation to maintain this work, heretofore generally considered as of a national character. He did conceive that the arguments of his colleague, (Mr. ROSS,) the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HARRIS,) and the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) on this point, were unanswerable. He would not descant upon the millions expended on the seaboard in support of navigation, foreign commerce, the Navy, and fortifications, in which the people of the West have but little comparative interest, yet bear their proportion of the expense. The proportion of public moneys expended on the seaboard and Eastern section of the country, compared to that expended in the West, is at least as fifteen or twenty to one. The revenues drawn from the people to the East are recirculated among them, while the Western people are drained of nearly their last dollar for the public lands and foreign importation purchased. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) has opposed this appropriation, lest, if it be given, the bill to establish toll-gates may fail, and this road be again thrown upon the nation for support. That gentleman need not be alarmed on this ground. Mr. C. pledged himself to join in any reasonable measure for the support and maintenance of this road. It must be repaired; and, if he could do no better, he would agree to place toll-gates upon it. It was of as great importance to the people of the West, and they feel as deep an interest in its support as you can in your systems of commerce and navigation. Mr. C. finally observed he would not presume to impose on the good sense of the House by affecting a disinterestedness on this question. He never would affect that which was foreign from the truth. He was highly interested in this work, as are all the people of the West, and, therefore, would be excused for manifesting his earnest desire that this trifling sum would not be withheld from so important an object. For these, and many other reasons which he would not now attempt to urge, he hoped the House would not concur in striking out the appropriation.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, stated that he should have given a silent vote, had not the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. JONES) challenged those who were opposed to this appropriation to give the reasons for their opposition.

He had Constitutional scruples as to the power of Congress to make the appropriation; the advocates of the appropriation had obviously confounded the power of the State and General Governments, as well as the Constitutionality and policy of the measure.

Mr. W. observed, that the subject-matter of the present discussion was a branch of the general subject of internal improvements; that these were physical or moral; that the first head comprehended roads, bridges, and canals; and the second literary institutions, religious, and scientific establishments, corporations for mechanical, manufacturing, charitable, and other purposes, calculated to enlighten the public mind, improve the morals, invigorate the industry, and ameliorate the condition of society.

The real question, therefore, before the Committee was, have Congress the power to legislate upon the subject of internal improvements within the States?

He could not believe that there was a single member who had attended to the preceding enumeration, who would not disclaim any such power.

No such power was necessary to the purposes of the Union; the objects of the Union were the public defence and the regulation of trade; all the powers conferred on the General Government were merely subservient to these purposes; of this nature were the powers of raising armies, building a navy, making treaties, levying taxes, and enforcing the observance of the law of nations, treaties, and the laws of the United States, by judicial tribunals.

The several States retain every other branch of sovereignty, not expressly granted to the General Government, or necessarily incident to the exercise of some general grant of power; among these are the entire regulation of property and contracts, with a single inhibition that they shall not be impaired, the protection of the rights of person and property, the regulations of police, comprehending the administration of justice, and the direction and control of all internal improvements, physical and moral.

These powers are absolutely necessary to the improvement and prosperity of every community; they are indeed necessary to their self-preservation, essential to them as independent States, and it would have been political suicide to have surrendered them to the General Government.

All internal improvements, and more especially such as are physical, are local in their nature, and constantly require the fostering care and protection of local authorities, and a local supervision; the power over them must necessarily be exclusive, their prosperity, if not their existence, is incompatible with a divided jurisdiction.

The assumption of the power over internal improvements in the States, would lead directly to consolidation, and destroy every federal feature of the Constitution.

Again: The powers of the General Government are inadequate to the promotion of internal improvements. Roads in every State in the Union are made and kept in repair by towns and counties, and no Government can effect those purposes unless it has the control of property, is competent to take the land of individuals for that use—to levy a tax on the town or county to pay for it—to exact personal labor of the citizens to make and mend the roads, and to enforce penalties for the reparation of injuries done to them; nor, indeed, is any Government competent to the charge of internal improvements that, in addition to the above enumerated powers, does not possess that of incorporating turnpike, bridge, and canal companies.

Does the Government of the United States possess these powers? By the fifth amendment of the Constitution, land cannot be taken even for public uses without compensation—these uses are such only as are necessary to the execution of some authorized purpose, and by no induction can be construed to embrace lands for highways. Besides, the exaction of compensation for lands taken for such purpose from the people of the town or county would be a direct tax and a palpable violation of the second section of the first article of the Constitution, that requires that direct taxes should be uniform throughout the United States.

Should the General Government purchase the lands of individuals for this purpose, and make a highway on the said land, the purchase would confer no jurisdiction whatever over it. The only cases in which a purchase does this, by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, is confined to those which are made with the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the land lies, for the sole purpose of erecting forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings. Again: where the United States have no jurisdiction over the subject, they cannot enforce any regulations they may make respecting it, but must hold the land in the same manner as individuals, subject to the jurisdiction of the State. The courts of the United States cannot afford any protection to such property, but, for all injuries done to it, the General Government must rely wholly on the courts of the State where the land lies for redress. The powers of the General Government are, therefore, wholly inadequate to the control of internal improvements within the States.

Again: every power of the General Government is adequate to the end for which it is granted, but it is admitted, by all the advocates of the appropriation, that it is not competent for Congress to erect toll-gates on the Cumberland road, or to enforce any regulations respecting it, without the consent of the States through which it passes. I consider this a surrender of the whole argument, and a complete admission that the General Government has no power over the subject of internal improvements.

The same reasoning is applicable to every other species of internal improvement, and goes to show that Congress have no power, by incorporations, or otherwise, to interfere with the exclusive jurisdiction of the States over the subject, and that the only way in which Congress can aid internal improvements is, by subscription to State establishments.

It has been insinuated, that, although there is no express grant of this power to Congress, yet it results to the Government as incidental to other powers. Three only have been named: that relative to post offices and post roads, the one relative to internal commerce, and the one relative to the public force. By the 8th section of the first article of the Constitution, Congress have power to establish post offices and post roads. The object of this power is the speedy and regular communication of intelligence—it was exercised by the royal authority before the revolution in the colonies—it was vested in the Confederation, and was transferred to the General Government on its adoption—under no form of its administration was it ever considered, to authorize or require the opening of new roads. The obvious meaning of the power is to authorize Congress, from the roads already in use between different places, to select the one on which the mail shall be carried, and to designate the stations where the mail shall be opened. By the same section, Congress have power to regulate commerce among the several States—and in conviction of the benefits that would be afforded to commercial intercourse by the improvement of roads and canals throughout the United States, has prompted an effort in favor of the exercise of this power by the General Government; but no inducement of interest is sufficient to cancel the obligations of duty, or release us from a strict observance of the Constitutional limits of our authority.

The object of this clause is to secure the revenue, and to exempt the citizens from vexation and interruption in their commercial intercourse—the duties are paid at the port of entry, and if the goods are exported to other States unaccompanied by evidence of payment, are liable to seizure, and the person who has charge of them is liable to a penalty. The law, therefore, prescribes the evidence of payment, and the possession of the document secures the owner from interruption in the sale of the goods.

By the same section, Congress have power to raise armies, and every other power incident to the defence of the country, and it is conceded, that, if forts are necessary in any State beyond the limits of settlement, Congress may, from the necessity of the case, open roads to march the troops, and convey cannon and munitions of war to such station.

This is the extent of the power—it is the result of necessity, and ceases with that necessity, and is believed to be the only case authorized by the Constitution, in which Congress can make roads within the States.

Mr. W. concluded by saying that what he had said in justification of the vote he should give on the question before the Committee; it was not the amount of the appropriation, but the Constitutional principle that would be violated, that rendered it important—that he had barely suggested the outline of an argument without detail or illustration—that, to save the time of the House, he forbore to enter further into the subject. He repeated that these were his views of the Constitution, which he was bound to support, and that the advocates of the appropriation must either remove his objections or excuse his vote.

Messrs. PLUMER, of N. Hampshire, REID, RHEA, MILNOR, and SERGEANT, expressed their opinions in favor of the concurrence; and Messrs. ROSS, WRIGHT, HARDIN, NELSON, of Maryland, STEWART, and SMITH, of Maryland, against it; when the question was taken thereon, and decided in favor of the concurrence—yeas 105, nays 58, as follows:

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole, in striking out the clause to provide for building a bridge over the Monongahela river, where the Cumberland road crosses the same, was also concurred in, without a division.

The question of concurrence with the Committee of the Whole in allowing to William Lambert one thousand dollars, as a compensation to him for taking the longitude of the Capitol, being under consideration—

Mr. COCKE moved to increase it to fifteen hundred dollars.

Mr. F. JONES named two thousand dollars, and Mr. COCKE withdrew his motion to enable his colleague, (Mr. JONES,) to try the sense of the House upon that proposition.

The motion was supported by Messrs. COCKE, NELSON, of Virginia, and RHEA, and opposed by Messrs. WOOD and HARDIN, when the question was taken, and the motion prevailed.

Mr. SIBLEY moved to amend the bill by inserting a provision to appropriate for additional surveys in the Territory of Michigan, the sum of twelve thousand dollars.

Mr. COCKE contended, and the SPEAKER decided, that the proposition was not in order; and no further motion to amend having been offered, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 10.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Holden W. Prout, administrator on the estate of Joshua W. Prout, deceased," reported the same, with a recommendation on the part of the committee that the said bill be postponed indefinitely. The bill was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the adoption of measures to try the title of the Marquis de Maison Rouge, to certain lands," reported the same without amendment, which was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the same committee, reported a bill to establish an additional land office in the Territory of Michigan; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the same committee, also reported a bill vesting in the commissioners of the counties of Wood and Sandusky the right to certain lots in the town of Perrysburg and Croghansville, in the State of Ohio, for county purposes; which bill was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GILMER moved that the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the resolution submitted by him on the 7th of January last, making an appropriation for carrying into effect the articles of agreement and cession entered into between the United States and the State of Georgia, on the 24th April, 1802, and for other purposes, be discharged from the consideration thereof, and that the said resolution be committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

The House then took into consideration a resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. KENT, requiring information from the proper department in relation to the public lands; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. COCKE, the House agreed to consider the Message of the President of the United States in relation to the compensation of the Attorney General; which Mr. COCKE proposed to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary; and he stated his object to be, that the committee inquire into the expediency of defining more particularly the duties of that officer within the District of Columbia.

After a few remarks by the mover, Messrs. SERGEANT, ARCHER, and WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the question was put, and the motion prevailed.

Mr. WOOD submitted the following preamble and resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Whereas it is important that the difference of longitude between the Capitol of the United States and observatories in Europe should be ascertained with the greatest possible degree of precision: and whereas, pursuant to a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, of the 3d of March, 1821, William Lambert, appointed for that purpose by the President of the United States, has made sundry observations with that view, and has made his report thereof; and whereas, it would be injudicious, in a matter of such importance, to trust to the report of a single individual, however eminent in science, without having it examined by other professional men, of the first respectability: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be authorized to employ — competent persons, to examine the observations and calculations reported as aforesaid, by William Lambert; and further to concert with one or more of the observatories in Europe, to make correspondent observations on the eclipses of the satellites of Jupiter, or otherwise, for the purpose of verifying the results of the observations stated in the aforesaid report.

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, submitted the following preamble and resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Whereas an act, passed on the 2d day of April, 1808, entitled "An act concerning public contracts," has been so construed as to sanction the appointment of members of Congress to divers public employments, agencies, or trusts, by the authority of Executive officers of the United States; and whereas, on the purity of the Senate and House of Representatives, and their freedom from Executive influence, depend the liberties of the people, and the durability, soundness, and integrity, of the Federal Constitution:

Resolved, therefore, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to report a bill for the purpose of preventing any member of Congress, while he continues as such, from executing or holding any employment, agency, or trust, in behalf of, or anywise concerning, the Government, either political, legal, or professional, to which the said member may be appointed, by any Executive officer of the United States.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act supplementary to the act, entitled "An act for the relief of the purchasers of the public lands prior to the first day of July, eighteen hundred and twenty;" an act for the relief of Alexander Humphrey and Sylvester Humphrey; and an act for the relief of Thomas W. Bacot; in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

A bill from the Senate, to amend the act granting the right of pre-emption to certain settlers in the State of Louisiana, and for other purposes; and a bill to enable the holders of incomplete French and Spanish titles to lands within that part of the late province of Louisiana which is now comprised within the limits of the State of Missouri, to institute proceedings to try the validity thereof, and to obtain complete titles for the same when found to be valid, were severally read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1822, was read a third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1822, and on the bill making appropriations for the public buildings.

The Navy appropriation bill was first taken into consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to reduce the amount recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means in such manner as to dispense with an appropriation for compensation to the clerk of the commandant of the navy yard in the City of Washington.

The motion was supported by the mover and Mr. COCKE; and opposed by Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, MITCHELL of South Carolina, STEVENSON, LITTLE, and COLDEN.

The question was first taken on the larger sum, and carried; which was equivalent to a negative upon Mr. WILLIAMS's motion.

The various appropriations were made as recommended, and the bill having been gone through with—

Mr. COCKE submitted a proviso, the purport of which was, that no person who was in arrears to the Government, should receive payment under the appropriations of that bill, until those arrears were paid, or their accounts closed.

The proviso was adopted, and the bill making appropriations for the public buildings was then taken up, and Mr. BLACKLEDGE, chairman of the committee, in support and explanation of the bill, observed that, in reporting it, the committee were of opinion, the sooner the buildings are completed, the greater will be the advantage to the Government. They were more confirmed in their opinion on this subject, when they reflected upon the large sums which had already been expended upon the public buildings, and the appropriations which would yet be required to complete them. The appropriation asked for at this time, Mr. B. observed, was larger than the appropriation of the last year, and he was also aware of the greater caution which is at all times exercised by the House in appropriating the public money, which is by no one more approved than by himself, but he felt it a duty incumbent on him to advocate that sum, which, if appropriated, would have, in his opinion, a greater tendency to promote the public interest, than a less sum. Should the work, however, which is proposed to be done the present year be completed, he was authorized to say, that the annual appropriations would in future be less. The committee were anxious to recommend a less appropriation at this time, but were convinced that it could not be done consistently with the public interest, and the sum asked for, was estimated for a wooden dome. If gentlemen will refer to the report of the Committee on Expenditures, they cannot, said Mr. B., for a moment hesitate to agree with the Building Committee in their opinion; they will there find that there is annually paid to the architect, the superintendents, and head workmen, on the Capitol, $14,000. By procrastinating the work, this item of expenditure will continue to swell, and by the time the building was completed, would form no inconsiderable item in the whole expenditure. He therefore hoped there would be no objection, on the part of this Committee to fill the blank with the sum of $120,000, which was asked for by the Committee on Public Buildings.

The recommendations of the committee were thereupon respectively agreed to; when

Mr. COCKE proposed to add a proviso, similar to that which had been adopted in reference to the Navy appropriation bill, which was agreed to.

The Committee then rose, and reported the said bills as amended.

In the House. Mr. TRACY opposed a concurrence with the Committee of the Whole, in appropriating a sum of about $10,000 to make good a deficit to the marine corps in 1824, but the question being taken thereon, the motion to concur prevailed; and the residue of the bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The question of concurrence with the Committee of the Whole in their report upon the bill in relation to the public buildings, being under consideration—

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, proposed to add the sum of six thousand dollars to the amount reported for building of wood, the dome of the centre building of the Capitol, with the view, and for the purpose, that it be built of brick.

Mr. TAYLOR expressed an opinion, that the construction of a dome of wood of so great extent, would be preferable to one of brick, and the question being taken, the motion was lost, and the amendments of the Committee of the Whole were respectively concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SOUTH AMERICAN GOVERNMENTS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill making appropriations for missions to the independent Governments south of the United States.

Mr. FARRELLY proposed a verbal emendation, by striking out the word "missions," and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words "diplomatic intercourse," but the motion was negatived.

Mr. BUTLER moved to reduce the sum of one hundred thousand dollars as proposed in the bill, to the sum of seventy thousand dollars, but the motion was negatived by a large majority; and the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

In the House, the question on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, being about to be put,—

Mr. GARNETT rose, he said, to submit to the House a few observations on this bill before it was ordered to be engrossed. He was not in his seat at the moment when the second resolution proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to appropriate $100,000 for the purpose of carrying into effect the recognition of the independence of the late South American Provinces of Spain was unanimously adopted. If he had been, he did not know that he should have opposed it at that time, as he considered the question as involving the amount of appropriation, rather than the principle of recognition. But now, that both resolutions were embodied in the bill, which was the effective act, he felt himself constrained, consistently with the vote he had given on the first of those resolutions, and with the opinions he entertained of the policy of the measure, to vote against it. He did not doubt that it was competent to this Government, at any period of the revolutions in South America, to have carried on a diplomatic intercourse with the Governments there, founded on the existing relations of the two countries, to be extended as those relations multiplied, but always to be confined strictly within the limits of our commercial connexions, or to such negotiations generally, as were absolutely indispensable. Indeed, it would be a very hard case, if nations were obliged to forego all the advantages which they might derive from an intercourse with each other, because their Governments were unsettled, and they had not decided who were to be their rulers. Such a state of things might continue for a long time to their mutual injury. In point of fact, sir, our Government has already treated with the independent Governments of South America. We have an agent, at this moment, in Buenos Ayres, who has been treating on the subject of the privateering regulations of that country, and we shall probably treat with Mexico, whether we acknowledge her independence or not, on the subject of the boundaries between that empire and the United States. The right to treat with a Government de facto on matters of importance and necessity had not been denied, and our exercise of it, in relation to the new Governments of South America, had not given, nor could it give just cause of offence to Spain, or to any other country. But, sir, the object of this bill is very different—it is not pretended that so extensive an intercourse as it proposes, is required by our actual relations with the independent provinces—its avowed purpose is to announce to them, that we have declared the obligations which bound them to Spain to be dissolved, and that we are, therefore, willing to treat with them as free and independent nations. It proposes rather a social friendly intercourse, founded on sympathy and choice, than a useful connexion founded on reciprocal interests. In this point of view, Mr. G. said, he had many objections to the adoption of the measure at this time, some of which he had already given in another form, and therefore he should not now repeat. He did not mean to enter into a general view of this subject.

He said he could not, in any light in which he had been able to view it, regard this question as one of principle, or believe that our acknowledgment of the independence of the South Americans was, as had been often said, a great moral duty. He had always considered, and still considered it, as exclusively a question of policy. If, sir, said Mr. G., this is a question of principle, why have we not acknowledged them before? Was not

Buenos Ayres, to all intents and purposes, as independent when it was proposed to acknowledge her before, as she is now, and more so than Mexico and Colombia are, in the latter of which, at least, a show of opposition is still kept up by the royalists? If the act had been done before, it would have been imprudent, but it would also have been generous; (not that he approved of that kind of generosity,) now it is only imprudent; for generosity implies sacrifice—some evil submitted to, or some good foregone; and it had been said we incurred no risk by the act; but as, in his humble judgment, we did incur risk, he should say it was generous. He was sure of one thing, it proceeded from a generous impulse.

If, sir, said Mr. G., this is a question of principle, why have we not long ago acknowledged the independence of Hayti, which has been established for a much longer period than that of any one of the South American provinces, and against which there has been no opposition for years past on the part of the mother country? The reason is very obvious—we are very properly restrained from acknowledging it, because it would be encouraging rebellion in a description of our own population, which it is our interest to keep in a state of subordination and obedience. Notwithstanding the strong motives of interest arising from our commerce with these people, (which is actually more valuable than that with all the provinces of Spanish South America,) to extend and strengthen our relations with them, the prudential consideration alluded to has been sufficient to counteract the combined force of opposite interests, and “moral duty.”

Mr. G. said, these considerations clearly satisfied him, that every question of the acknowledgment by us, of the independence of other nations, must be controlled and decided by reasons of policy. Our Government had heretofore acted in relation to this question on considerations of policy. There was now no change in the nature of the question, though there might be in the circumstances affecting it. This was what remained to be determined, to decide on the propriety of the measure. We have only to ascertain whether the same motives of precaution and prudence existed, which had heretofore restrained us from acting, or whether they had ceased to operate. Believing then, as he did, that this was entirely a question of policy, seeing but very trivial advantages could result to either country from the adoption of the measure now; knowing that it did not contribute a mite to the independence of South America, which had been effected without our aid, and would continue in spite of our opposition; he was not willing to encounter danger, where it was certain that nothing could be gained by either party, and possible that something might be lost by both. Mr. G. said, this question should be considered calmly and dispassionately; but he was inclined to think gentlemen had always suffered themselves to be led away on this subject, by their feelings and sympathy; by some vague idea of similitude between the South Americans and ourselves; of resemblance in our history, and in our forms of government. They regard them, in short, not only as patriots, which they are, but as republicans, which they are not; but, for his part, though he was far from wishing to depreciate the noble exertions of those people for their independence, he had never yet seen any thing in their public proceedings to authorize the belief that they are capable of enjoying a government similar to ours, or any other form of free government. Independence was not desirable for them, because it gave them ipso facto a free government, but because it bestowed on them the means of obtaining it, and by emancipating them from a degraded vassalage, it permitted them to go on unimpeded, in the work of reform and improvement. As an instance of the notions of civil liberty, which prevail in these countries, he would only refer to the first article in the form of government proposed by Iturbide for Mexico, (and he believed the other States had adopted a similar provision in their constitutions,) in which it is declared, "That the religion of New Spain is, and shall be, the Roman Catholic and Apostolical, without tolerating any other;" and, in the 16th article, it is further declared, "That a protecting army shall be formed, under the title of the Three Guarantees, because it takes under its protection: first, the preservation of the Catholic religion, co-operating with all its efforts, that there may not be a mixture of any other sects, and attacking all the enemies that may injure it." He was not blaming all this; it might be very right for what he knew; it might be the best form of government of which they are capable; it might even evince a masterly policy in Iturbide, thus to engage a powerful priesthood in favor of the revolution, by promising to protect them; but the exclusive tolerance of one religion, to be enforced by such means, is calculated to show that the people are still in a very benighted state, and are really ignorant of the true principles of free government. However, then, we may sympathize with them, as every one must do in their efforts for independence and freedom, we should not suffer that sympathy to govern us in deciding on the propriety of our proposed acknowledgment.

But, gentlemen believe that no possible danger can result from this measure. He did not say the danger was imminent, but that there was danger, and that the benefit being little or none, the danger, however small, deserved to have its weight in our decision. He had before attempted to point out some of the evils which might possibly arise from our recognition; but there were various ways in which evil might arise out of the unforeseen connexions and combinations which would grow out of this event. He could not undertake to predict the precise manner in which it might operate, the time, and circumstances; but, independently of the danger of war, and many possible evils which he had attempted to indicate in his detailed declaration, there were others that were probable and portentous. What, sir, is more reasonable than to suppose that Spain, finding herself about to lose all her American territories, will seek to turn to some account those that remain to her, by selling them to some purchaser who will be able to retain them? And this apprehension derives considerable support in the most recent intelligence from Spain, by which it appears that the subject of a transfer of her territories has been actually agitated in the Cortes. Now, suppose Spain should cede Cuba to England, or even the Havana, which the latter would be very glad to take at the price of Gibraltar, or of any other equivalent she could offer. Gibraltar is not now very important to England; the island of Malta answers all her commercial purposes in the Mediterranean. The Havana, on the other hand, would be the most important acquisition she could make. As a military position, it would enable her to command the whole Gulf of Mexico; and, as a commercial one, it would become the emporium through which she would supply the greater part of South America with the products of the world. She would establish over that country a complete influence; would monopolize its commerce, and deprive us of nearly all the benefit which we might expect, in the course of time, to derive from an intercourse with it. With France, who would be our natural ally against England in such an event—for the occupation of the Havana by the latter would be viewed by her with just apprehension—we are, unfortunately, on terms which forbid us to expect her hearty co-operation. It may be said, that the Havana might be ceded to England whether we recognised the independence of South America or not. It is true, this might happen; but we render it, by our act, much more probable. Sir, will not the resentment of Spain, when she hears of the step we have taken, dispose her much more strongly to yield to the overtures of England? And will it not preclude us from becoming her competitors in the purchase? She has the same equivalents to offer that we have, and the good will of Spain into the bargain. Sir, Spain would not let us have it now for three prices. It is a universal opinion in the United States that it is utterly incompatible with our best interests that England should possess Cuba; and it is a very general and a growing idea, that if Spain does not retain it, or it should not be independent, we ought to have, and must have it ourselves. Our act will not only prevent us from possessing it in the only safe and peaceful way, but, in all probability, produce the very event we have the most reason to deprecate. There are many other modes which will readily suggest themselves to the minds of gentlemen, by which England may profit by the measure we are going to take, and which it is unnecessary to dwell on. If Spain, as some believed, was disposed to recognise the independence of the provinces, neither they nor we would have suffered by a short delay, and all disagreeable consequences would have been avoided.

But, Mr. G. remarked, he had another objection to the measure, distinct from its policy—it was to the form of recognition we had adopted. When the original author of this measure, an honorable gentleman from Kentucky, now no longer a member, first brought it forward, as well as on the subsequent occasions, it was proposed merely to provide an outfit and salary for a Minister, to be sent to the Government intended to be acknowledged—a proposition which, unaccompanied with the avowed purpose of the mission, would only have involved the right to treat with the Government de facto. But, sir, said Mr. G., what is the present proposition? Why, it is to announce a formal declaration which the Congress of the United States have made, totidem verbis, that the provinces of Spain have dissolved the bands which connected them with her, and that they no longer owe her allegiance. This is certainly true; but he doubted exceedingly whether any government had a right to declare that a nation or people no longer owe allegiance to another government, to which it had been due, and which still claims it. He knew no instance in which one government had made such a declaration in relation to another with which it was at peace. It necessarily involved the right to declare that nations did owe allegiance to other governments; and a future Congress would have just as good a right (if it were possible that, in subserviency to the views of Spain, or of the legitimates of Europe, they should be so disposed,) to declare that the late provinces of Spain had not dissolved the bands which connected them with her, and did owe allegiance. Those legitimates, on the same principle, might now declare that the United States still owe allegiance to England. If we can declare a people independent, without giving cause of offence, so likewise we can guaranty that independence without giving cause of offence. Could we now do this in relation to South America? It is but one step from this doctrine to that asserted by the monarchical governments of the old continent—that they have a right to interfere in the internal concerns and arrangements of other governments. We go farther, for they practise on this doctrine only in regard to neighbors, for which there is a show of pretext.

If the doctrine be just, and the rest of Europe may say, France shall not be republican, we may say, Mexico shall not be imperial. Mr. G. said he protested altogether against this principle. It was unjust, and it was not the interest of the republics of the world to assert it, because they were weaker than the monarchies. Like certain principles of national law—such, for example, as the right of search, the right of impressment, or the right of blockade, without an actual investment—it might be advantageous for those nations to assert it who could maintain it; but it was a principle which did not yet suit republics. The right of making or unmaking sovereigns by declaration, would be rather a dangerous thing for us. Let it remain where it alone exists—in the people of each country. He had considered the question of right as well as of policy, in reference to our interest; and here he begged leave to say, that it was absurd to attempt to draw a distinction between national interest and national honor and generosity. There were, to be sure, temporary and immediate interests, and there were remote and permanent interests; we should take a comprehensive view of both, and be governed by enlightened principles in our choice. A Government, particularly if it was representative, had no right to be generous at the expense of the interests of the people. An individual may make sacrifices by which he does not expect, even ultimately, to be benefitted; a Government, acting for the people, cannot. The common phraseology of the world produces the fallacy that national interest and national honor are distinct. Nations, like individuals, are in the habit of boasting of their honor, generosity, and so forth. We have heard a great deal, of late years, of the generosity and magnanimity of England, in making so many sacrifices for the peace of the European continent, and in opposing the usurpations of Napoleon. Her authors and her orators have set forth her praises, in this respect, in very pompous strains, and the people of the Continent have been silly enough to repeat her boasts, and give her the credit for disinterestedness she claimed. But does any one seriously believe that England, in sacrificing so much for the peace and security of Europe, did not consider that she was surrendering inconsiderable and temporary for great permanent advantages? And, he would say, if she had acted on any other principle, she would have acted wrong. By the same principles we should be governed in our relations with South America. If we could have assisted her to achieve her independence, without bringing ruin on her as well as ourselves, we should probably have done so; for it is our interest that she should be independent. Generosity and interest would have corresponded; the only question would have been, as to the justice of our interference. But there can be no doubt, that, if the crowned heads of Europe were to commence a crusade against her, for the express purpose of putting down republican government, it would be both our interest and our duty to make common cause with her—to defend her, for the sake of defending ourselves; but, to maintain that it could ever be our duty to assist her when it was not our interest, or at least when it was against our interest, would be an argument utterly unsound and inadmissible.

Before I conclude, said Mr. G., I will make a few remarks relative to myself. I am perfectly satisfied with the reasons given by those gentlemen who voted against my declaration being inserted in the Journal—founded, as they were, on the inexpediency of establishing such a precedent; and I am gratified with the expression of their respect for my motives. The intention of that declaration, however, was to strengthen, (though certainly that was not required,) not to impair, the effect of the measure adopted by the majority, and to prevent my vote being misinterpreted at a distance, and at a future period, into hostility to the principles of the revolutionary Governments, and their independence: and certainly there was reason to apprehend this, when already that vote has been misconstrued by malignity, stupidity, or the obsequiousness which seeks to propitiate majorities, and to profit by flattery. I have been very undeservedly complimented for my sagacity in discovering dangers which were not visible to others. I do not pretend to have made any such discoveries. My merit or demerit consists solely in having adhered to the opinions I entertained, in common with many others, on the three former occasions, when this measure was discussed, since I have been a member of this House. I am, sir, equally undeserving the censure of singularity; it is known that my singularity was in my vote, not in my opinion. I am very far from blaming any one for yielding his opinion to the majority. There may be occasions, where questions of policy are involved, on which it may not be improper to make a compromise with our opinion; but it is a discretion, for the exercise of which it is exceedingly difficult to determine the proper occasion, and, when determined, it can never be exercised without danger.

The mischief is, when you once begin, you never know where to stop. You begin with great occasions, and you proceed from greater to less, until you have no opinion to compromise, and your only inquiry or care is to ascertain whether or not you are in a majority. Everything that is valuable in the character of a representative may be gradually destroyed by this system of compliance. Sir, the approbation of our own conscience is better than the applause of men. It was once my misfortune, or my fault, to have yielded my opinion to the majority. I allude to my vote in favor of the resolution under which Missouri was admitted into the Union—the most awful occasion on which this House ever had to act. I was opposed to it, not because I was an anti-Missourian, but because I was, if any thing, an ultra-Missourian. I was unwilling to deprive ourselves hereafter of the Constitutional argument, by admitting that Congress could impose any conditions whatsoever, on the admission of a State into the Union, even such as were thought nugatory; but I thought ruin threatened the country; I thought the safety of the Union—of the people, in danger, and I yielded my opinion to the majority, and voted for the resolution. I afterwards had an opportunity of recalling my vote; but had I lost that opportunity, this deviation, pardonable as it may seem, would have cost me much pain—pain that I would not have perpetuated by placing myself irrevocably in the same situation, for all the honors my country could bestow on me. Sir, my situation in being in so singular a minority is not an enviable one; but I am not afraid of minorities. A man who is afraid to be in a minority, is just as unfit for a legislator, as a man who is afraid to fight, is unfit for a soldier. I have, however, no occasion for uncommon fortitude to support the obloquy I may encounter. As far as I know, I have been censured by no one whose praise is, at least, very intensely to be coveted. Those who associate with me, and who know me, have done me the justice to bear testimony to the purity of my intentions, if not to the correctness of my judgment. As for those miserable panders to public opinion, who have aspersed me without knowing me; who, when I was in a large majority, and afterwards in a large minority, on this very question, were too cowardly to attack me, but waited, assassin-like, until my company had left me, to fall upon me; as to those boasted guardians of national rights, those watchful sentinels of public and private liberty, the chosen conductors of the free press, who evince their attachment to the freedom of nations, by trying to put down the freedom of individual opinion, their clamor and their calumny pass by me as the idle wind. On this subject, sir, as on all others connected with my public conduct, I am without fear and without reproach. I neither deprecate censure, nor solicit praise. I am always happy in the good opinion of others, but I do not depend on it. I am self-poised.

When Mr. G. had concluded, the question was taken, and the order to engross for a third reading was carried by a large majority.

JURISDICTION OF JUSTICES D. C.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia to fifty dollars.

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, moved to amend the bill by striking out the enacting clause, so as to test the principle—his primary objection to it being, (so far as the reporter, from his position, was able to hear,) that it was unconstitutional, on the ground that it took away the right of trial by jury.

Mr. CONDIOT moved that the Committee rise and report progress; which was refused.

Mr. NEALE said he had calculated on the objections that were made to the provisions of the bill under consideration; but he believed, if gentlemen would attend particularly to the terms of the Constitution, they would come to the same conclusion that the committee did who reported the bill. The terms of the Constitution are, that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." Mr. N. said he would be among the last to give a vote that would infringe or violate the Constitution; but he believed the provisions of the bill under consideration preserved entire the right of trial by jury. The bill authorizes either party, plaintiff or defendant, should either of them be dissatisfied with the decision of the justice of the peace, to appeal to the circuit court, where either may demand a trial by jury, or submit the same to the decision of the court. Gentlemen seem to think that the terms of the Constitution are imperative, and that the trial by jury must be had, in the first instance, before the justice of the peace. The error of this opinion, he believed, would be seen when we reflect that the Constitution does not define any particular time, or say at what stage of the proceedings, the trial by jury is to be had, but only guarantees to the citizen the right of trial by jury; consequently, the time when, or at what stage of the proceedings, the trial by jury is to be had, is a proper subject for legislation; provided you do not thereby prostrate the trial by jury, or involve it in such difficulties as would render it unavailing to the parties. Will the bill do this? It is believed not. It will be readily granted that a trial by jury would be better conducted before the judges of your court than before a justice of the peace. Many questions might and would arise, relating to the competency of witnesses, &c. during the trial, which your judges are more competent to decide than a justice of the peace. Justice would of course be rendered more certain from a trial by jury before the court, than a trial by jury before a justice of the peace. And it will not be denied that the right of trial by jury is secured to the citizen that justice may be done. This bill, in fact, extends the right of trial by jury, because it gives the right of appeal where the sum exceeds five dollars, and upon all appeals there may be a trial by jury. But it is objected that the party appealing must give security before he can have his trial by jury; and this is thought to violate the Constitution. In answer to this objection Mr. N. would remark, that, to constitute particular tribunals for the adjustment of controversies, and to submit to the exercise of summary remedies, or to a temporary privation of rights of the deepest interest, are among the common incidents of life: such are submissions to arbitrations, such are stipulation bonds, forthcoming bonds, and contracts of service. Again, Mr. N. would ask, is obliging a non-resident plaintiff to give security for costs before he can have his trial by jury, or holding a defendant to bail, a violation of the Constitution? We know this is every day's practice, and no one, he believed, ever thought it unconstitutional.

The provisions of the bill, Mr. N. said, were not more unconstitutional than the summary proceedings authorized by your revenue laws, attachment laws, &c. It authorizes the commencement of suit by warrant, to be tried before a justice of the peace in the first instance, instead of the ordinary common law process, and the laws mentioned authorize proceedings in the first instance different from the ordinary common law proceeding, and yet the right of trial by jury is preserved. In the construction contended for by him, Mr. N. said he was supported by the authority of most of the States in the Union, whose opinion he would not urge as conclusive with the Committee, but it would, no doubt, have great weight. Many of the States, indeed he might say all but three or four, had extended the jurisdiction of justices of the peace to sums above twenty dollars; regulating in different modes the trial by jury where demanded, when the sum exceeded that amount. He believed he was further supported by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the Bank of Columbia against Oakley, where the power given to the bank by an act of the General Assembly of Maryland incorporating the same, was incomparably greater than any power designed by this bill to be given to justices of the peace; and yet the court determined that the law was not unconstitutional, the right of trial by jury being preserved, although by that law a defendant could not exercise that right until the return of a capias ad satisfaciendum, fieri facias, or attachment by way of execution, which process might be in the first instance ordered against the debtors to said bank. Such a power, Mr. N. said, he would frankly acknowledge, he would not consent to give to any corporation or individual. As to the expediency of passing the bill under consideration, Mr. N. would observe, that claims under fifty dollars, for which suits were brought, were generally due from persons in moderate circumstances, and the costs accruing on suits in this part of the District, must be oppressive. He would, before he resumed his seat, refer to a paper placed in his hands by the Mayor of this city, by which it appears that the costs in a case in the Circuit Court in the county of Washington, in this District, where the sum exceeds twenty dollars, (for example, he would take twenty-one dollars,) and where judgment should be confessed, would amount to about twenty dollars. If such a case should be disputed, and a trial had, with two witnesses attending two days each, and supposing the attorneys in the case to charge ten dollars each, the whole amount of cost would be forty-nine dollars and fifty cents, as estimated on this paper. He would leave the members of the Committee to estimate what the costs would be if there were many witnesses attending many days. Believing, as he did, that the provisions of the bill were not inconsistent with the Constitution, and that the passage of it would benefit the creditor, by enabling him more speedily to recover his debts, and benefit also the debtor by reducing the costs incident to the recovery of small debts, he felt himself bound to give it his support.

Mr. Woodcock thought that, by reference to the 7th section of the bill, it would be seen that the right of trial by jury was entirely taken away; and he contended that the right of appeal, for which it provided, was not a Constitutional substitute, nor a desirable privilege. His objection to the bill was founded rather on principle than expediency.

Mr. KENT said, in legislating for the District, he would always be influenced by the same motives and feeling that would govern him were he a member of the Legislature of Maryland. He would there support a measure, if it could be consistently done, that was called for by a large majority of the people. The bill before the Committee, from the memorials presented, was asked for by a large portion of the people of this District; and, although it was a disfranchised territory, and could only gratuitously have its wishes known on this floor, he, for one, would support them, when intrusted to him, even in that manner. All Mr. K. asked of gentlemen was to extend to this District the advantages of such laws as were enjoyed by their constituents in their several States, nineteen out of twenty-four of which had, by their laws, extended the jurisdiction of magistrates from thirty to one hundred dollars; and he presumed what was Constitutional in the different States was equally so in this District. In Maryland, this system had been in successful operation for several years, very beneficially, he believed, and entirely to the satisfaction of the people—there had not been a murmur against it, that he had heard, and he was willing to test the same system here, in order to avoid the expense, delay, and loss of time, which was experienced under the existing Relief Bills.

H. OF R.

one. Mr. K. had no Constitutional scruples about the bill, inasmuch as the trial by jury was secured, if wished for, by the parties.

Mr. MERCER observed that when he assented to a report of this bill by the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which he was a member, he expressed his intention to reserve to himself the right of presenting his views on the subject, without being at all compromised by it. He said that that part of the District which was ceded by Virginia, was not, he believed, in favor of the bill. If such extortion as the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NEALE) had described, in reality existed, he thought it was confined to that part of the District which was north of the Potomac. The portion which was taken from Virginia were desirous to retain their ancient rights and privileges. If an evil existed, it was to be corrected only where it was to be found, and the remedy was, not by altering the nature of the jurisdiction, but by limiting those fees by law, which might be deemed oppressive and unjust.

The subject was further discussed by Messrs. WOODCOCK, NELSON, of Virginia, MITCHELL, of South Carolina, MERCER, MOORE, of Virginia, in favor of the motion to strike out—and by Messrs. KENT, MALLARY, NEALE, CAMPBELL, of Ohio, and BATEMAN, against it.

The question being taken on the motion to strike out, it was decided in the negative—only about 25 rising for it.

After some further remarks on the subject, in which Messrs. WILLIAMSON, NEALE, and NELSON, of Virginia, took part, the Committee of the Whole, on motion of Mr. TOMLINSON, rose, and reported progress.

Mr. BALDWIN gave notice that he should, on Friday next, call for the considerations of the resolutions he had heretofore submitted on the subject of manufactures.

THURSDAY, April 11.

Mr. METCALFE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to abolish the United States trading establishment with the Indian tribes," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the resolutions submitted by Mr. BASSETT on the 9th instant, the third of which being modified, by inserting "and naval" after the word "military," it was then ordered, that the said resolutions be committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill further to amend the several acts relative to the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments.

A motion was made by Mr. WOOD, that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution submitted by him yesterday, in relation to the establishment of a first meridian for the United States; and on the question, Will the House consider the said resolution? it was determined in the negative.

Bills of the Senate, of the following titles, to wit: 1. An act supplementary to the act, entitled

"An act for the relief of the purchasers of public lands, prior to the first day of July, 1820;" 2. An act for the relief of Alexander Humphrey, and Sylvester Humphrey; and 3. An act for the relief of Thomas W. Bacot; were severally read the first and second time, and referred, the first to the Committee on the Public Lands; the second to the Committee on Commerce, and the third to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1822;" "An act making appropriations for the Public Buildings;" and "An act making an appropriation to defray the expenses of missions to the independent nations of the American continent;" were severally read the third time and passed.

JURISDICTION OF JUSTICES D. C.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace, in the recovery of debts, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, proposed an amendment, the purport of which was to confine the operation of the law to future contracts.

The motion was supported by the mover, and opposed by Mr. NEALE, and lost.

Mr. WOODCOCK moved to amend the bill by introducing, as a second section, a provision, the object of which was to secure to defendants, in actions where the amount shall exceed the sum of twenty dollars, the privilege of demanding a trial by jury.

The motion was advocated by Messrs. WOODCOCK, WALWORTH, and NELSON of Maryland; and opposed by Messrs. WRIGHT of Maryland and NEALE; when the question was taken thereon and decided in the affirmative—ayes 56, noes 52.

Mr. WOODCOCK then moved that the Committee rise and report, with a view to recommit the bill, in order that the residue of the same might be made to correspond with the amendment which had been just adopted; but the motion was negatived.

After a remonstrance of sundry inhabitants of Alexandria had been read—

Mr. ROCHESTER renewed the motion to rise and report progress, which was carried; and

In the House leave was refused to the Committee of the Whole to sit again; and thereupon Mr. WOODCOCK moved that the bill be recommitted to the committee which reported the same, with instructions to make it correspond with the principle that had been introduced and adopted, in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEALE proposed to lay the bill on the table, and announced his intention to move the further consideration thereof in the House. This motion, which took precedence of the former, was put and carried, and the bill was ordered to be laid on the table.

RELIEF BILLS.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on a bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Baltimore; a bill for the relief of certain distillers in the sixth collection district of Pennsylvania; and a bill for the relief of B. H. Rand.

The first named bill was for indemnity for damages sustained by the sinking of vessels in the harbor of Baltimore for the protection of that city during the late war.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to amend the bill in such manner as to have the payment of damages commenced from the day on which the vessels were respectively sunk, instead of the day on which the peace was concluded, as the committee had reported.

This motion gave rise to a long discussion, in which the mover, Mr. WRIGHT, Messrs. REED of Massachusetts, and LITTLE, supported, and Messrs. RICH, EDWARDS of Connecticut, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, and McCoy, opposed it; when the question was taken and the motion was lost.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved so to amend the bill as to limit the compensation to the time when the vessels were returned to the owners; but after a few remarks thereon by the mover and Mr. McCoy, the question was taken and decided in the negative; and no further amendment having been offered to that bill, or to the bill for the relief of B. H. Rand, the same were reported to the House without, and the bill for the relief of certain distillers in the sixth collection district in the State of Pennsylvania with an amendment.

In the House, the bill for the relief of certain citizens of Baltimore being under consideration—

Mr. LITTLE renewed the motion that had been made by his colleague (Mr. SMITH) in the Committee of the Whole, to amend the bill so as to make the payment of the damages commence from the day on which each vessel was sunk; but the motion was negatived by a large majority, and the bill, with the two other bills reported by the same Committee of the Whole, were respectively ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. TRACY moved (it being 3 o'clock) that the House adjourn; but the motion was negatived.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims upon the petition of the sufferers on the Niagara frontier during the late war.

Mr. TRACY rose and addressed the House in an animated and eloquent speech in opposition to the report (unfavorable) of the Committee of Claims, and concluded his observations by moving to strike out the word not, so as to give the resolution an affirmative character; and expressed his determination, if that motion prevailed, to move a further reference of the subject to a select committee, to report a bill for some relief, however inadequate, to these unfortunate sufferers.

The question was then taken, and the motion prevailed—ayes 56, noes 41; and the resolution, as amended, was reported to the House; which thereupon adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 12.

Mr. Cook, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to confirm certain claims to lots in the village of Peoria, in the State of Illinois; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act for the relief of the purchasers of public lands, prior to the 1st day of July, 1820,'" reported the same without amendment, and it was ordered to be read the third time on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act further to continue in force, and perpetuate, an act passed on the 20th day of April, 1818, entitled 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,' passed the 2d day of March, 1799,'" and "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to set apart and dispose of certain public lands for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine and olive,'" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, on the petition of Sarah Easton and Dorothy Storer: whereupon, it was ordered that the said report be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports and statements of the number of persons employed in the Indian department, with a designation of such as have been appointed by the War Department, and such as hold appointments from the Governors of Territories; also the amount of money put into the hands of each Governor, superintendent, and agent, since the 1st of January, 1820; and how it has been applied;—rendered in obedience to a resolution of the House, of the 9th of January last. Which letter, reports, and statements, were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, the order of yesterday, committing the resolutions submitted by him on the 9th instant, in relation to accountability for public moneys to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill further to amend the several acts relative to the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, was rescinded. And the said resolutions were referred to a select committee; and Mr. BASSETT, Mr. HARDIN, Mr. GILMER, Mr. COCKE, and Mr. BLAIR, were appointed the said select committee.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act further to continue in force and perpetuate an act passed on the 20th day of April, in the year 1808, entitled 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,' passed the 2d day of March, 1799,'" was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to set apart and dispose of certain public lands for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine and olive,'" was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of sundry citizens of Baltimore;" "An act for the relief of certain distillers within the sixth collection district of Pennsylvania;" and "An act for the relief of Benjamin H. Rand"—were severally read the third time, and passed.

DISTRIBUTION OF JOURNALS, &c.

Mr. POINSETT, from the joint Library Committee, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of distributing the four volumes of the Secret Journal of Congress, and the Journal of the Convention which formed the Constitution, to those members of the sixteenth Congress who have not received them; and also to report on the propriety of distributing copies of the same books to the Athenæum, Antiquarian, Historical, and other learned Institutions in the United States; together with the Fourth Census, Pitkin and Seybert's Statistics, Wait's State Papers, and the Commercial Regulations of Foreign Countries. And who were also instructed to inquire into the propriety of purchasing a number of the sixth volume of the Laws of the United States, lately published by Davis & Force, for the use of the Library, and to be distributed among the members of the present Congress,—made a report adverse to the distribution, accompanied by the following joint resolution, viz:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Library Committee be and they are hereby authorized to purchase one hundred and thirty-eight copies of the sixth volume of the Laws of the United States.

Resolved, further, That the sum of five hundred and fifty-two dollars be appropriated for the purpose aforesaid.

The joint resolution was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

EXTRA PAY TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a Message from the President of the United States, furnishing, in compliance with a resolution of the House, certain information in relation to the amount of the public money paid to the Attorney General, over and above his salary fixed by law, since the 1st January, 1817, reported:

That the office of Attorney General was established by the act of the 24th of September, 1789, and his duty defined to be "to prosecute and conduct all suits in the Supreme Court, in which the United States shall be concerned, and to give his advice and opinion upon questions of law when required by the President of the United States, or when requested by the heads of any of the Departments, touching any matters that may concern their Departments."

The same act directs that he "shall receive such compensation as shall by law be provided."

By an act of the 23d September, 1789, the compensation of the Attorney General was fixed at $1,500 a year. It has been raised by successive acts of Congress, from time to time, as the increased labor and other just considerations seemed to require, and is now $3,500, which cannot be deemed more than a reasonable allowance, considering that the increased demand for the frequent legal aid of the Attorney General has made it necessary for him to reside at the seat of Government, and requires a much larger devotion of his time to the public service than was formerly called for.

From the act of 24th September, 1789, to the present time, no change has been made in the constitution of the office, or the definition of the duties which belong to it, nor is it believed that any such has been suggested; and it may, therefore, well be inferred that nothing has heretofore occurred to induce any one to suppose that a change was expedient; and the committee deem it fit to add, that they neither know nor have heard of any complaint that the office has not answered its purpose.

The appointments heretofore made, and the compensation heretofore and now allowed, have had reference only to the existing constitution of the office, and the duties belonging to it, as already stated.

It follows clearly that no department of the Government has a right, nor ever has had a right, to call upon the Attorney General to perform any other duties; and it would be difficult to show that an officer is under a greater obligation than a private citizen to render gratuitous services to the Government, particularly where they are of a nature to be estimated and paid for.

In the extensive and interesting concerns of the nation, it will nevertheless happen, as it has already frequently happened, that the Government will have occasion for other or further legal aid than that which their officers are bound, or in some cases able to afford. Such occurrences are, in their nature, contingent, and they can only be provided for by the establishment of offices, and the appointment of officers, upon a scale to embrace every possible contingency, (with adequate salaries and emoluments,) which, if it be at all practicable, would be onerous and wasteful; or by leaving to the Executive officers of the Government the power of engaging such aid, from time to time, as the occasions may occur; exercising this very inconsiderable discretion under the same responsibility as belongs to their more important duties: the latter has been the practice of the Government.

Where such occasional aid can be afforded by the Attorney General, without interference with his proper duties, (as in cases occurring at or near to the seat of Government,) there is no objection to his being employed upon the ordinary professional footing—of receiving a compensation for the service required. It was not the design of the office, as has already appeared, that he should render any other than the stated duties for the stated compensation or salary; and it was never understood or intended that the office was to deprive the officer of the right to employ his professional talents and learning for his own benefit, where that could be done without prejudice to the faithful performance of his stated duties. There is no good reason why the Attorney General should not, under the limitation just mentioned, be at liberty to engage in the general pursuits of the profession. Accordingly, such has been the usage, not only in the instance of the Attorney General of the United States, but, it is believed, of every State in the Union, to engage in private practice, abstaining only where it interfered with public duty.

In reviewing the past, then, the committee find nothing to disapprove. Where additional professional aid has been employed it seems to have been necessary and proper, and not to have been compensated beyond a fair and reasonable amount. Where compensation has been allowed to the Attorney General, it has been for services rendered which did not belong to his office, which he was in no manner bound to perform, and for which, therefore, if he did perform them, he was entitled to be paid as any other professional man would be. And they think it fit to state, explicitly, that in those instances where compensation has been allowed to the distinguished citizen who now fills the office, services have been faithfully rendered, well deserving what has been paid to him, and it certainly has not been greater than must have been paid to any other eminent lawyer.

In regard to the future, the committee can propose no other plan than that which has heretofore been adopted and approved. It seems to the committee to have well answered its purpose, and they perceive no good reason to fear that it will prove less effectual in future. They, therefore, offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. GORHAM, from the Committee on the Suppression of the Slave Trade, to whom was referred a resolution of the 15th January last, instructing them to inquire whether the laws of the United States prohibiting the traffic in slaves have been duly executed; also into the general operation thereof; and, if any defects exist in those laws, to suggest adequate remedies therefor; and to whom many memorials have been referred, touching the same subjects,—made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POINSETT stated that a bare majority only of the committee had agreed in making the said report; and he wished it to be distinctly understood that he (as a member of the said committee) did not concur in the measure recommended, which he deemed to be injurious to the best interests of the country.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on the Suppression of the Slave Trade, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 15th of January last, instructing them to inquire whether the laws of the United States prohibiting that traffic have been duly executed; also, into the general operation thereof; and, if any defects exist in those laws, to suggest adequate remedies therefor, and to whom many memorials have been referred, touching the same subject, have, according to order, had the said resolution and memorial under consideration, and beg leave to report:

That, under the just and liberal construction put by the Executive on the act of Congress of March 3, 1819, and that of the 15th of May, 1820, inflicting the punishment of piracy on the African slave trade, a foundation has been laid for the most systematic and vigorous application of the power of the United States to the suppression of that iniquitous traffic. Its unhappy subjects, when captured, are restored to their country, agents are there appointed to receive them, and a colony, the offspring of private charity, is rising on its shores, in which such as cannot reach their native tribes will find the means of alleviating the calamities they may have endured before their liberation.

When these humane provisions are contrasted with the system which they superseded, there can be but one sentiment in favor of a steady adherence to its support. The document accompanying this report, and marked A, states the number of Africans seized or taken within or without the limits of the United States and brought there, and their present condition.

It does not appear to your committee that such of the naval force of the country as has been hitherto employed in the execution of the laws against this traffic could have been more effectually used for the interest and honor of the nation. The document marked B is a statement of the names of the vessels, and their commanders, ordered upon this service, with the dates of their departure, &c. The first vessel destined for this service arrived upon the coast of Africa in March, 1820, and, in the few weeks she remained there, sent in for adjudication four American vessels, all of which were condemned. The four which have been since employed in this service have made five visits, (the Alligator having made two cruises in the past Summer,) the whole of which have amounted to a service of about ten months by a single vessel, within a period of near two years; and since the middle of last November, the commencement of the healthy season on that coast, no vessel has been, or, as your committee is informed, is under order for that service.

The committee are thus particular on this branch of their inquiry, because unfounded rumors have been in circulation, that other branches of the public service have suffered from the destination given to the considerable force above stated, which, small as it has been, has in every instance been directed, both in its outward and homeward voyage, to cruise in the West India seas.

Before they quit this part of their inquiry, your committee feel it their duty to state that the loss of several of the prizes made in this service is imputable to the size of the ships engaged in it. The efficacy of this force, as well as the health and discipline of the officers and crews, conspire to recommend the employment of no smaller vessel than a corvette or sloop of war, to which it would be expedient to allow the largest possible complement of men, and if possible, she should be accompanied by a tender, or vessel drawing less water. The vessel engaged in this service should be frequently relieved, but the coast should at no time be left without a vessel to watch and protect its shores.

Your committee find it impossible to measure with precision the effect produced upon the American branch of the slave trade by the laws above mentioned, and the seizures under them. They are unable to state whether those American merchants, the American capital and seamen, which heretofore aided in this traffic, have abandoned it altogether, or have sought shelter under the flags of other nations. It is ascertained, however, that the American flag, which heretofore covered so large a portion of the slave trade, has wholly disappeared from the coasts of Africa. The trade, notwithstanding, increases annually, under the flags of other nations. France has incurred the reproach of being the greatest adventurer in this traffic, prohibited by her laws; but it is to be presumed that this results, not so much from the avidity of her subjects for this iniquitous gain, as from the safety which, in the absence of all hazard of capture, her flag affords to the greedy and unprincipled adventurers of all nations. It is neither candid nor just to impute to a gallant and high-minded people the exclusive commission of crimes, which the abandoned of all nations are alike capable of perpetrating, with the additional wrong to France herself of using her flag to cover and protect them. If the vigor of the American Navy has saved its banner from like reproach, it has done much to preserve unsullied its high reputation, and amply repaid the expense charged upon the public revenue by a system of laws to which it has given such honorable effect.

APRIL, 1822.

Niagara Sufferers, &c.

H. OF R.

But the conclusion to which your committee has arrived, after consulting all the evidence within their reach, is, that the African slave trade now prevails to a great extent, and that its total suppression can never be effected by the separate and disunited efforts of one or more States; and as the resolution to which this report refers requires the suggestion of some remedy for the defects, if any exist, in the system of laws for the suppression of this traffic, your committee beg leave to call the attention of the House to the report and accompanying documents submitted to the last Congress by the Committee on the Slave Trade, and to make the same a part of this report. That report proposes, as a remedy for the existing evils of the system, the concurrence of the United States with one or all the maritime Powers of Europe, in a modified and reciprocal right of search on the African coast, with a view to the total suppression of the slave trade.

It is with great delicacy that the committee have approached this subject, because they are aware that the remedy which they have presumed to recommend to the consideration of the House requires the exercise of the power of another department of this Government, and that objections to the exercise of this power, in the mode here proposed, have hitherto existed in that department.

Your committee are confident, however, that these objections apply rather to a particular proposition for the exchange of the right of search, than to that modification of it which presents itself to your committee. They contemplate the trial and condemnation of such American citizens as may be found engaged in this forbidden trade, not by mixed tribunals sitting in a foreign country, but by existing courts, of competent jurisdiction, in the United States; they propose the same disposition of the captured Africans now authorized by law; and least of all, their detention in America.

They contemplate an exchange of this right, which shall be in all respects reciprocal; an exchange which, deriving its sole authority from treaty, would exclude the pretension, which no nation, however, has presumed to set up, that this right can be derived from the law of nations; and, further, they have limited it, in their conception of its application, not only to certain latitudes, and to a certain distance from the coast of Africa, but to a small number of vessels, to be employed by each Power, and to be previously designated. The visit and search thus restricted, it is believed, would insure the co-operation of one great maritime Power in the proposed exchange, and guard it from the danger of abuse.

Your committee cannot doubt that the people of America have the intelligence to distinguish between the right of searching a neutral on the high seas, in time of war, claimed by some belligerents, and that mutual, restricted, and peaceful concession by treaty, suggested by your committee, and which is demanded in the name of suffering humanity.

In closing the report, they recommend to the House the adoption of the following resolution, viz :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to enter into such arrangements as he may deem suitable and proper, with one or more of the maritime Powers of Europe, for the effectual abolition of the slave trade.

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, moved that hereafter the usual hour of meeting of the House be eleven o'clock. He stated that he had punctually attended pursuant to the rule recently introduced; but that experience had shown that no benefit had been derived from it. Calls of the House had on two mornings been made, which he had opposed, although a quorum had not appeared; and, if all those who were absent would vote for the motion, he had no doubt it would give a majority sufficiently large to carry it.

Mr. TAYLOR called for the question of consideration, and the House agreed to consider the same—ayes 70, noes 59.

Mr. TAYLOR then moved to lay the motion on the table, which was negatived—ayes 43.

Mr. HARDIN was in favor of the motion; not only on the ground that the present rule was inconvenient and useless in its operation, but also because it interfered with business at the public offices which the interests of their constituents required. Mr. H. was desirous to attend his duty in the House and out of it. He also adverted to the incompatibility of accomplishing the business which was confided to the committees, with a perseverance in the present rule of the House.

Mr. VANCE called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the question was taken, and the votes thereon were as follows: Yeas 79, nays 79. The question was decided in the negative by the casting vote of the Speaker.

NIAGARA SUFFERERS, &c.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the amendment reported by the Committee of the whole House on yesterday, to the resolution annexed to the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of sundry inhabitants of Niagara, in the State of New York; and the question pending yesterday at the time of adjournment, to wit: Will the House concur with the Committee of the Whole in expunging from the resolution aforesaid the word "not;" and being again stated—

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, addressed the House in a speech of nearly an hour, opposed to a concurrence with the amendment of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RICH moved to recommit the report to the Committee of Claims, with instructions to report thereon pursuant to the principles of a report presented to a former Congress on the same subject, allowing to the petitioners fifty per cent. on the value of their buildings destroyed, and thirty per cent. on their personal property exclusive of merchandise.

The motion was supported by the mover, Mr. TRACY, Mr. CAMBRELENG, and Mr. WALWORTH, and opposed by Mr. McDUFFIE, Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and Mr. MCCOY.

Mr. BASSETT also made a few remarks in opposition to the recommitment.

The question was then taken, and the motion to recommit was lost by a large majority.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to amend the resolution by recommitting the subject to the Committee of Claims with instructions to report a bill providing indemnity to those claimants on the Niagara frontier, whose property, at the time of its destruction by the enemy, was so occupied by the American Government, as justified its destruction according to the usages of civilized war.

The motion was supported by the mover, and by Mr. TRACY, and opposed by Messrs. HARDIN, WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and MCCOY, when the question was taken and decided in the negative.

Mr. TRACY then moved to refer the resolution to a select committee without instructions. A few remarks were made by the mover in favor of the motion, which was also advocated by Messrs. NELSON, of Virginia, and WRIGHT, and opposed by Messrs. HARDIN, and WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, when the question was taken, and the motion negatived.

The House then decided to non-concur with the Committee of the Whole, and agreed to the report of the Committee on Claims, unfavorable to the claim of the petitioners.

Mr. WHITMAN moved to adjourn, which was negatived.

Mr. BALDWIN, pursuant to notice, moved that the further orders of the day be postponed, for the purpose of taking into consideration a resolution submitted by him some time since, to alter the laws laying duties on goods imported and the question being taken thereon, it was decided in the negative—ayes 65, noes 79.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on a bill for the relief of the officers and soldiers engaged in the late war against the Seminole Indians.

Mr. EDWARDS, of Connecticut, moved an amendment of the bill, the purport of which was to deduct the amount which had been paid by the United States for the use and risk of the horses, from the sum claimed for their loss.

The motion was opposed by Mr. F. JONES, of Tennessee, and Mr. CANNON, and supported by the mover, Mr. MCCOY, and Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, when the question was taken, and the motion was decided in the affirmative—ayes 54, noes 45.

Mr. MCCOY moved a further amendment; but, before any decision thereon, on motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the Committee rose and reported progress, and leave was granted to sit again.

The House adjourned.

SATURDAY, April 13.

The SPEAKER assumed the Chair at 10 o'clock, and a quorum not appearing—

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, moved for a call of the House.

Mr. ARTHUR SMITH proposed that the question be taken by yeas and nays, which was agreed to; and the question was accordingly so taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 58.

It thus appearing that a quorum was present, the Journal of yesterday was then read.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom the subject was referred by resolution of the 9th instant, reported a bill providing for the payment of the salaries of public officers, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred by resolution of the 9th instant, reported a bill relinquishing the right and title of the United States to certain lots of ground to the president and commissioners of the town of Tuscaloosa, in the State of Alabama; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public lands, reported a bill confirming claims to lots in the town of Mobile, and to land in the former province of West Florida, which claims have been reported favorably on by the commissioners appointed by the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill concerning Abner L. Duncan; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WOOD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library of Congress be instructed to inquire into the expediency of modifying or rescinding so much of the joint resolutions of the Senate and House of Representatives, passed the 27th March, 1818, and the 21st April, 1820, as relates to the publication of the foreign correspondence of the Congress of the United States, from the first meeting thereof, to the ratification of the Treaty of Peace, and also, that part of them which relates to the distribution of the publications therein mentioned, to the members of the 15th Congress.

After a few remarks on the subject by the mover, and by Messrs. MALLARY, NELSON, of Virginia, and PLUMER, of New Hampshire, the resolution was agreed to.

REPORT ON FORTIFICATIONS.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the Message of the President of the United States, of the 26th March last, on the subject of fortifications, and particularly of those on Mobile Point and Dauphin Island, made a report thereon, which was committed to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill making further appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1822, and for other purposes. The report is as follows :

APRIL, 1822.

Report on Fortifications.

H. OF R.

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the Message of the President, of the 26th of March, on the subject of fortifications ; and particularly of those on Mobile Point and Dauphin Island, report :

That, on the important subject of defending the seacoast, they concur most fully in the opinion expressed in the Message. They are equally agreed in the preference of permanent works over those of a temporary and perishable nature, in all cases where they are adequate to the object. At the same time, a view of the numerous and extensive bays and rivers with which our country is indented, naturally suggests the idea that a floating force is required to co-operate with, and to derive protection from, the permanent fortifications.

The committee are further agreed, that it is the peculiar province and duty of the Executive Department of Government to select and determine on the proper sites, and on the nature and extent of the fortifications to be constructed. This power and this duty appertain necessarily to the President, who is commander of the national force, and is responsible for the national defence.

On the other hand, the means of carrying into effect the plans and designs of the Executive, are constitutionally and necessarily dependent on appropriations of money made by Congress. In the exercise of this power, which is exclusive on their part, it is the duty of Congress to inquire and examine into the nature, extent, necessity, or utility, of every object for which appropriations are required, and to judge of the expediency of granting or withholding them.

It is stated in the Message that an appropriation on account of the fortification on Dauphin Island was suspended by the last Congress in consequence of a doubt which was entertained of the propriety of that position ; that a new survey has been made, the result of which is reported, and the work, as originally contemplated, is recommended to be carried on.

The considerations which induced the last Congress to decline making an appropriation for Dauphin Island cannot be expected to be developed by this committee. It is well known, however, that the positions on Dauphin Island and Mobile Point, with their respective bearings and relations, and the extent and depth of the water-courses, were considered and made the subjects of public debate ; and it is to be presumed that the decision was made on due consideration of all the circumstances relating thereto, and with a just regard to public interests. Whether, and how far, they were influenced by a knowledge that the works on those sites had not progressed in proportion to the appropriations which had been already made ; and that, of $377,800, advanced under the contracts for their construction, a considerable part had not been expended on the works, and remained unaccounted for, or that this item would have increased the loan of $5,000,000, to which the Government was compelled in that year to resort ; and that of $8,000,000, borrowed in 1820 and 1821, one-eighth part had been appropriated to fortifications in those years ; how far any of these considerations may have had an effect on the last Congress is not for this committee to determine.

The material facts on which the committee rested the opinion contained in their report of the 28th of February, are sustained by the new survey, with two exceptions ; one giving only twelve feet of water, instead of eighteen, heretofore given by the first survey to the entrance of the anchorage ground under Pelican Island ; the other giving eight and a half instead of ten feet to the western channel. From this survey, it follows, and is, indeed, conceded, that one of the main objects of the fort on Dauphin Island, viz : that of covering the passage to the anchorage ground under Pelican Island, where our own or enemies' vessels might take shelter, and from whence they might annoy or protect the coast, is wholly lost, as the water is too shallow to float the smallest national vessel of an enemy. If the statement in the new survey be correct, that the depth of water in the western channel be ten feet at high water, and eight feet and a half at low water, and admitting that the pass of seven feet, laid down in Curtis Lewis's chart, has not been omitted in the late survey, the inference, drawn by the committee in their former report, is not materially affected, as, in either case, there is not sufficient depth of water for enemies' vessels of war to pass.

Other objects are now assigned for erecting a fortification on Dauphin Island, to contain one hundred and eight guns, requiring, in the estimation of the committee, the expenditure of one million of dollars.

First. That it would be important in the defence of New Orleans, as it would prevent the landing at Mobile bay, and render it dangerous for an invading force to land at any place between the Rigolets and the bay of Mobile, for the purpose of marching to the Mississippi above the city.

The importance of providing an efficient defence for New Orleans, is fully impressed on the minds of the committee. In their judgment, it is entitled to primary consideration, and no reasonable means or expense, necessary to secure it from attack, should be withheld by Congress. In addition to the works already projected, the committee would see with pleasure a proposal, and recommend an appropriation, for the small work on the Bayou Bienvenue, for repairing and strengthening Fort St. Philip, at the Plaquemine turn, with a work opposite to that fort on the western side of the Mississippi, provided a proper site can be had ; and for providing at Baton Rouge materials for a floating force.

It appears to be the opinion of the Board of Engineers that there is no danger of the landing of an enemy anywhere between Dauphin Island and the Rigolets, for the purpose of marching to the Mississippi above New Orleans. In their first report they observe, " We think that it is useless to say that an enemy cannot undertake any thing reasonable against that part of the frontier which is between the Lake Ponchartrain and Mobile bay ; the nature of the country uncultivated, and the facility to come from the West and the East to separate the vessels from the enemy's forces that would have thrown themselves into the country, and finally the non-existence of any profitable object, are motives enough to consider that part of the frontier sufficiently defended by itself."

With respect to any land operation on the part of an enemy from the bay of Mobile, the opinion expressed by the Board of Engineers, in the following extract from the same report, appears to be conclusive :

" An enemy that would attempt to go up Mobile, in order to get to Tombigbee and Alabama, would expose himself to be separated from the sea, by the arriving troops of the Westward, from the interior of the country; and if to all this be added the difficulties of conducting, offensively, a divergent operation, through the two valleys that unite themselves, it may be concluded that, on that part of the frontier of the Union, all kind of offensive operation must be limited to occupy Mobile and Mobile town," &c.

Admitting that, according to the Message, it were practicable for an enemy, when we have possession of Mobile Point, to overcome the obstacle of shoalness of water, and that presented by an efficient floating force on our part, to destroy the small craft in which he must land, and that he should effect a landing with ten or fifteen thousand men, on Dauphin Island; that, leaving his vessels, provisions, and munitions, with all hope of retreat, in case of disaster, he should have the temerity to pass over to land, and hazard a march of two hundred miles, to Baton Rouge, that being the distance, as laid down in Ellicott's survey—between the rivers Mobile and Mississippi—that the brave militia, who conquered at New Orleans, the last war, should be wholly unadvised of his movement, and suffer him to pass unmolested; admitting, also, that no preparations for his reception should be made at Baton Rouge, how is his descent to New Orleans to be effected? Having left his ships and boats two hundred miles in his rear, he must march down the levee, on the left bank of the Mississippi, a distance of one hundred and fifty miles, part of the way with a morass on his left, liable to be arrested in his march by temporary batteries in front, at every turn of the river, to be flanked by gunboats in the river, and, in the last resort to have the levee cut from under him, and the country inundated, the militia hanging on his rear.

Under these circumstances, would an enemy of any foresight or calculation make the attempt?

The preference of permanent fortifications over a floating force, in all cases where they will fulfil the object, being admitted, the only question is, whether this is such a case, or whether, in other words, the contemplated works on Mobile Point and Dauphin Island will defend the bay of Mobile? That they will not, is admitted by the engineers, who state, in their report, that a floating force is required in aid of the permanent works. It is further evident, because it is well known and conceded that vessels of war which can pass the bar, may, especially by night, pass the forts, run on out of reach of their fire, and leave them harmless in their rear. Thus anchored and master of the bay, the defence of which was the principal object of the fortifications, what security remains for the shipping, the towns, and the immense property above, against which he may commit his depredations at his own time, and according to the nature and amount of his force? A moveable and floating force, as contemplated in the former report of this committee, appears to be the only satisfactory answer.

In the last report of the engineers, a calculation is made of the relative expenses of permanent and floating forces. It would not be difficult to show that the interest on two millions of dollars, the cost of the contemplated works on Dauphin Island and Mobile Point, amounting in ten years to one million two hundred thousand dollars, would be amply sufficient for a floating force for twenty years; nor would it be more difficult to prove, from experience, that permanent works also require constant expenditures for alterations, repairs, garrisons, &c.; and that positions have been constructed at great expense, which are about to be abandoned, either on account of the positions, or because the nature or structure of the works are not approved, while a floating force is put in operation in time of war only, its expenses are limited by the war, and may, at the expiration of the war, be either preserved at a very small expense, or totally abandoned, which may perhaps be most eligible, preserving only their armament. It is also worthy of observation that, in their former reports, stating the necessity of a floating force to co-operate with permanent works to prevent an enemy from entering the Bay of Mobile, the engineers do not appear to have made these calculations nor indeed any objections to such a force. As this subject has been presented to the committee in a financial point of view, and as they have not yet obtained all the information necessary to enable them to give a detailed opinion in this report they leave that part of the subject for future consideration.

It is further stated, in the Message, that an enemy may take possession of Dauphin Island, and that he did so at the close of the last war. Having at the close of the war taken the small fort on Mobile Point, and possessed himself of the channel road, the enemy might make his incursions to Dauphin Island unmolested. It will also be recollected that he took possession of Tangier and Kent islands in the Bay of Chesapeake; but it is not inferred that it is therefore necessary to fortify these islands. If these should be fortified, others remain equally accessible to him in various parts of the coast.

From every view of the subject which the committee have been able to take, on a careful examination of all the facts, and with the most respectful attention to the opinions expressed in the Message, they do not find any justifiable cause for changing the opinion contained in their former report of the 28th of February, that it is inexpedient to construct the projected fortification on Dauphin Island.

In the opinion expressed in the Message, on the expediency of progressing in the completion of the fortifications on the seaboard, the committee entirely agree, and that the necessary appropriations therefor should be made. They are also well satisfied that, "in case any emergency should require it," the people would willingly submit to any burdens necessary to accelerate their completion. Whether, at this time, and under existing circumstances, they would be willing to increase the national debt, by recurring to loans, as in the two years last past, or that additional taxes should be imposed on them for this purpose; or whether the progress in these works ought to keep pace with, and to be limited by, the ordinary revenue of the country, are questions requiring, in the judgment of the committee, the most serious consideration of Congress.

All which is respectfully submitted.

VACCINATION.

Mr. BURTON, from the committee appointed to inquire into the propriety of repealing the act of 1813, to encourage vaccination, and if, on inquiry, it shall be proper, to report a bill to that effect, made a report, accompanied by a bill to repeal the said act; which bill was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

The committee appointed to inquire into the propriety of repealing the act of 1813, to encourage vaccination, and if, on inquiry, it shall seem proper, to report a bill to that effect, have attentively and deliberately examined the subject, and submit the following report:

The recent unfortunate occurrences in the State of North Carolina, having involved considerations of the utmost importance to society, and intimately connected with the dearest interests of humanity, your committee feel it to be due to the occasion to commence their remarks by a distinct and unequivocal declaration of their entire and unshaken confidence in the efficacy of the vaccine disease as a preventive of small pox. In addition to the experience of the most intelligent medical men, in all parts of the world, the committee have the satisfaction to state, that even the late unhappy accident in North Carolina has been attended by the consoling circumstance of another and a triumphant evidence of the virtues of vaccination. The inquiry, therefore, appears to be very properly limited to the mere expediency of the existing law, which authorizes the appointment of an agent, from and to whom letters may be transmitted free of postage.

While the committee would on no account offer a suggestion which could be construed to imply a doubt of the efficacy of vaccination, they conceive it may, nevertheless, be a question, whether the General Government can beneficially interpose for the furtherance of an object which seems, in a peculiar manner, to appertain to the municipal authorities in the several States, and which must, of necessity, be finally committed to the management and discretion of professional men, possessing the confidence of the community. All our regulations for the preservation of the public health are questions of police, wisely committed to those who are immediately interested, and therefore most likely to adopt efficient measures for their own safety. And it is doubted whether Congress can, in any instance, devise a system which will not be more liable to abuses in its operations, and less subject to a prompt and salutary control, than such as may be adopted by the local authorities. The privilege of franking letters, conferred upon an individual, for the purpose of enabling him to distribute the vaccine virus, and thereby to accumulate wealth, by levying contributions from all parts of the Union, affords an instance of monopoly as repugnant to the spirit of our political institutions as it is to the character of the medical profession, which, for public spirited and active benevolence, is too well established to require auxiliaries of this description in the performance of its duties. But another and more forcible objection presents itself. An establishment of this kind, under the authority of the General Government, naturally commands the attention of all portions of the country; and the numerous requisitions for the vaccine matter, from regions so extensive, must occasionally reduce any single agent to the necessity of either relinquishing the proffered fee, or of transmitting matter of doubtful character. Sub-agents must necessarily be employed to furnish a supply equal to the demand. Careless or incompetent assistants, guided more by cupidity than intelligence, may thus be instrumental in producing mischief, by the distribution of inert matter, or by the more fatal error of disseminating a pestilence instead of a prophylactic. That such unhappy mistakes may occur, is but too well attested by the recent events in North Carolina. The committee are, therefore, inclined to the belief, that any single agency, for the whole Union, must always be liable to similar objections; and from which they apprehend no institution, clothed with the character of a lucrative monopoly or privilege, can be entirely exempted. If, however, it should be deemed advisable for Congress to continue to aid in facilitating the distribution of vaccine matter by the mode now in operation, the committee are of opinion that some of the evils to which they have adverted might be obviated by the appointment of two or more agents, judiciously located in our large cities, in different quarters of the Union. But, after mature deliberation, they have come to the conclusion that it would be still better to commit the subject altogether to the local authorities, who, with the aid of the professional men, will be more competent to the successful management of it—and to whom, they believe, it properly belongs. They, therefore, report the accompanying bill.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

The House, on motion of Mr. RICH, went into consideration of the bill entitled an act, in addition to an act entitled an act providing for the prompt settlement of public accounts; when Mr. RICH proposed the following amendment to the bill:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, whenever, in the settlement of the accounts before mentioned, a difference of opinion shall arise between accounting officers, as to the extent of the credits to be allowed, under or by virtue of this act, such case shall be referred to the Secretary of War, whose decision shall be conclusive. And it is hereby made the duty of the said Secretary, to cause to be communicated to Congress, at the commencement of each session, a statement, comprising the names of the persons whose accounts shall have been settled the preceding year, agreeably to the provisions of this act, together with the amount which shall have been passed to the credit of each, under the several heads of expenditures, and upon other evidence than such as is prescribed by pre-existing laws and regulations.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, if any person shall swear, or affirm, falsely, touching the expenditure of public money, or in support of any claim against the United States, he, or she, shall, upon conviction thereof, suffer as for wilful and corrupt perjury.

Mr. COCKE moved that the bill, together with the amendments, be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RICH opposed the motion; to whom Mr. COCKE replied.

Mr. MCCOY opposed the motion, and incidentally supported the bill, and Mr. NEWTON gave the bill his decided approbation.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the bill was then ordered to be laid on the table, and the amendments submitted by Mr. RICH ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the House went into consideration of a bill further to amend the several acts relative to the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and, after a few remarks by Mr. H. NELSON, and Mr. SMITH of Maryland, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. BALDWIN moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of certain resolutions by him submitted, on the 7th of January, proposing an alteration of the laws laying duties on goods imported, and to commit the same to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and on that question he asked for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered.

The motion was divided, at the call of Mr. EDWARDS of North Carolina, and a discussion of some length ensued, in which Messrs. BALDWIN, EDWARDS, of North Carolina, MITCHELL, of South Carolina, WALWORTH, MALLARY, TRIMBLE, SAWYER, CAMBRELENG, BUTLER, ROCHESTER, and SMITH, of Maryland, took part, when the question was taken thereon, first upon the point of discharging the Committee of the Whole, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 66, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Barber of Connecticut, Barber of Ohio, Bateman, Borland, Breckenridge, Brown, Buchanan, Burrows, Butler, Campbell of New York, Campbell of Ohio, Cassidy, Chambers, Colden, Condict, Conkling, Darlington, Denison, Dickinson, Dwight, Edwards of Connecticut, Farrelly, Findlay, Fuller, Gebhard, Gross, Harvey, Hawks, Hemphill, Herrick, Holcombe, Hubbard, F. Johnson, J. T. Johnson, J. S. Johnston, Keyes, Kirkland, Litchfield, McCarty, McSherry, Matlack, Mattocks, Metcalfe, Milnor, Mitchell of Pennsylvania, Moore of Pennsylvania, Morgan, Murray, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Patterson of New York, Patterson of Pennsylvania, Phillips, Pierson, Pitcher, Plumer of Pennsylvania, Rich, Rochester, Ross, Ruggles, Russ, Sawyer, Scott, Sloan, S. Smith, J. S. Smith, Spencer, Sterling of Connecticut, Stewart, Stoddard, Swan, Taylor, Tod, Tomlinson, Tracy, Trimble, Vance, Van Rensselaer, Van Wyck, Walworth, Whipple, White, Wood, Woodcock, Woodson, and Worman.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Ball, Bassett, Bayly, Bigelow, Blair, Cambreleng, Cannon, Cocke, Conner, Crafts, Crudup, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dane, Durfee, Eddy, Edwards of North Carolina, Eustis, Garnett, Gilmer, Gist, Hall, Hardin, Hill, Hobart, Hooks, Jackson, Lathrop, Leftwich, Lincoln, Long, Lowndes, McCoy, McDuffie, McNeill, Mallary, Matson, Mercer, Mitchell of South Carolina, Montgomery, Moore of Alabama, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, New, Plumer of New Hampshire, Rankin, Reed of Maryland, Reid of Georgia, Rhea, Arthur Smith, Alexander Smyth, Sterling of New York, Stevenson, Swearingen, Thompson, Tucker of South Carolina, Tucker of Virginia, Upham, Walker, Whitman, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, Williamson, Wilson, and Wright.

Mr. BUTLER then moved, that the further consideration of the said resolutions be postponed to the first Monday in December next. As there was so much business of an important nature that required immediate decision, and the period of the session being limited to an early day, he thought it inexpedient to go into the discussion of a subject that would probably consume a fortnight. He also observed that the tariff should not be frequently altered, nor without great consideration, and he believed it would be proper to examine the subject in the vacation, and the House would be better prepared to decide upon the subject at the commencement of the next session.

Mr. STEWART opposed the motion; it was a subject of the greatest importance to the revenue of the nation, and of much more importance than many other subjects before the House. The tariff, he remarked, was not a new question. It had long occupied the attentive consideration of the people of this country, and he thought it was time it should be considered by the House.

Further remarks were made in support of the motion by Messrs. MONTGOMERY, CUTHBERT, WRIGHT, CAMBRELENG, RHEA, MITCHELL, of South Carolina, MALLARY, and NELSON, of Maryland, and in opposition to the motion, by Messrs. FULLER, SAWYER, RICH, BALDWIN, STEWART, WOODSON, F. JOHNSON, NEWTON, of Virginia, and BUCHANAN.

Mr. RICH called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered, and the question was decided in the negative—yeas 65, nays 87, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Ball, Bassett, Bayly, Bigelow, Blair, Butler, Cambreleng, Cannon, Cocke, Conner, Crafts, Crudup, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dane, Eddy, Edwards of North Carolina, Garnett, Gilmer, Gist, Hardin, Hill, Hobart, Hooks, Jackson, Kent, Lathrop, Leftwich, Lincoln, Long, McCoy, McDuffie, McNeill, Mallary, Matson, Mercer, Montgomery, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Maryland, New, Plumer of New Hampshire, Rankin, Reed of Massachusetts, Reed of Maryland, Reid of Georgia, Rhea, Arthur Smith, W. Smith, Alexander Smyth, Sterling of New York, Stevenson, Swearingen, Thompson, Tucker of South Carolina, Tucker of Virginia, Upham, Walker, Whitman, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, Williamson, Wilson, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Barber of Connecticut, Barber of Ohio, Bateman, Blackledge, Borland, Breckenridge, Brown, Buchanan, Burrows, Campbell of New York, Campbell of Ohio, Cassidy, Chambers, Colden, Condict, Conkling, Cook, Darlington, Denison, Dickinson, Durfee, Dwight, Edwards of Connecticut, Farrelly, Findlay, Fuller, Gebhard, Gross, Hawks, Hemphill, Herrick, Holcombe, Hubbard, F. Smith, J. S. Smith, Spencer, Sterling of Connecticut, Stewart, Stoddard, Swan, Taylor, Tod, Tomlinson, Tracy, Trimble, Vance, Van Rensselaer, Van Wyck, Walworth, White, Wood, Woodcock, Woodson, and Worman.

The question was then put on committing the resolutions to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and carried without a division.

On motion of Mr. H. NELSON, the House then took into consideration the bill for altering the times of holding the district court in the State of Mississippi, and after a few immaterial amendments, at the suggestion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, had been adopted, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

HORSES LOST IN THE SEMINOLE WAR.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to pay the officers and volunteers in the Seminole campaign, for horses lost in that service.

The question before the Committee was on a motion made by Mr. MCCOY to strike out the proviso; but he withdrew the motion with an intention of renewing it in the House.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill as amended, and the question was on concurring in the amendment, (which required the accounting officer to deduct, from the value of the horses to be paid for, the amount allowed and paid for the use and service thereof.)

The amendment was opposed by Mr. CANNON to the extent to which it went; and he supported, at considerable length, the justice and good policy of indemnifying the volunteers for their losses, as proposed by the original bill.

Mr. WOODSON also spoke at some length on the same side and to the same effect.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, briefly submitted the reasons which restrained him from voting to grant the compensation claimed for the volunteers.

Mr. RHEA replied, and—

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, contended, in a speech of some length, that justice, equity, and good faith, according to the understanding with the volunteers, required that compensation for the loss of horses, &c., ought to be made to them.

Mr. METCALFE took the general position that where the soldier has received less than the value of the horse for his service, the difference ought to be paid for his loss, but not more, and spoke some time in support of his opinion.

Mr. F. JONES replied to the arguments of Mr. METCALFE, and advocated the justice and equity of indemnifying the loss of horses, &c., sustained by the volunteers.

Mr. WOODCOCK made some remarks to show the propriety of modifying the bill (in the manner subsequently stated.)

Mr. BUCHANAN advocated the general principle of compensation for the horses; and

Mr. GILMER contended that the Tennessee troops were already fully paid, and this additional allowance was not demanded by justice or equity.

The question was then (about 5 o'clock) taken on concurring in the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, and decided in the negative—ayes 63, noes 65.

Mr. WOODCOCK then moved the amendment he had previously intimated, which was, in substance, to deduct any allowance previously made for the use of the horse, unless the volunteer shall show that he was re-mounted; in which case the deduction shall only extend to the time such volunteer served on foot; and provided, that if any payment had been made to any volunteer for clothing, such payment shall be deducted from the sum to be allowed for his losses.

Some debate took place on this amendment, on the part of Messrs. EDWARDS, of Connecticut, and WOODCOCK; after which it was agreed to without a division.

Mr. RICH then moved the adoption of an additional proviso, which was modified to read as follows:

"Provided, That no claim shall be allowed under the provisions of this act, until a proper return shall have been received by the accounting officers from the company to which the claimants shall have belonged, showing the number of horses lost in said company, in manner aforesaid, the time when lost, and the name of the owner."

Mr. F. JONES made some remarks to show that this amendment would produce no good effect, and would create useless difficulties in the settlement.

Messrs. MONTGOMERY, RICH, VANCE, CANNON, MALLARY, and MOORE, of Alabama, also made some remarks on the amendment, and the discussion continued until near six o'clock; when a motion was made to adjourn, which prevailed by the casting vote of the Speaker; and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, April 15.

Mr. ROCHESTER presented a petition of the members of the Board of Aldermen and members of the Board of Common Council, of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, praying that the bill now pending before this House, to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in said District, may be passed into a law, with an amendment, directing the justice to summon a jury to try cases exceeding twenty dollars, when required by either of the parties.

Mr. WARFIELD presented a petition and remonstrance, counter to the above, from twenty-five inhabitants of the county and town of Alexandria, in said District.

Ordered, That the said petitions and remonstrance do lie on the table.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants of the city of New York, concerned in cotton spinning, stating that, owing to a misconstruction of the act of April, 1816, coarse cotton threads that are bleached or colored are admitted to entry upon the payment of only about one half the duty to which they are or ought to be subjected, and praying an explanatory act may be passed; which memorial was referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage in Florida, and for other purposes," reported the same with amendments, which were read, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

An engrossed bill from the Senate supplementary to an act entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers of the public lands prior to the first day of July, 1820," was read a third time, and, after a few remarks by Mr. COCKE against the passage of the bill, and by Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, in favor of it—

Retrenchment of Expenditures.

APRIL, 1822.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, moved that the same be laid on the table; which was agreed to—ayes 65, noes 53.

The bill from the Senate altering the time of holding the district court in the district of Mississippi; and an engrossed bill further to amend the several acts relative to the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, were respectively read a third time, and passed.

RETRENCHMENT OF EXPENDITURES.

Mr. HARDIN, from the committee appointed on the 18th of February last, to inquire whether any part of the public expenditure can be retrenched, without detriment to the public service; and whether there be any offices or appointments in the Government of the United States which have become useless and unnecessary, and can be dispensed with, made a report, in part, thereon. The report is as follows:

The select committee appointed to inquire whether any part of the public expenditure can be retrenched without detriment to the public service, and whether there be any offices or appointments in the Government of the United States, which have become useless and unnecessary, and can be dispensed with, report in part:

The first subject which presented itself to the Committee in the discharge of the duties imposed on them by the resolution of the House was, to ascertain, with as much certainty as practicable, the sums properly chargeable upon the revenue by the existing laws:

The next in order, the means of the Government to meet those demands.

The public debt, independent of the floating unliquidated demands, is $93,423,605 73; the interest upon that sum, annually, is $5,165,248 24:

The stock composing the debt, and when reimbursable, is shown by the following table:

In addition to the public debt as it now stands, there will have to be added, it is presumed, $5,000,000 of at least five per cent. stock to discharge the claims against Spain, agreeably to the stipulations with that Government, and which is the consideration for the purchase of Florida; which will make the public debt $98,423,605 73; the interest upon which will be $5,410,248 24 annually.

The estimates, as furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the year 1822, stand thus:

Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous	$1,664,297 00
Military service, &c.	5,108,097 52
Naval service, &c.	2,452,410 27
To the Naval service add	300,000 00

(part of the $500,000 for the gradual increase of the Navy, not included in the estimate;) and, also,

The interest on the national debt, as above estimated, (which will be the amount after the year 1822,) - 5,410,248 24

Making the sum of - $14,935,05 03

This estimate is made without allowing one cent to the Sinking Fund for the gradual discharge of the public debt.

The civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenditures, they believe, are estimated too low; because the foreign intercourse about to be opened between the United States and Portugal, and also with the independent nations of North and South America, will add to the sum at least $120,000. Although it may be objected, that, in the estimates for the military service, &c., a sum is included for arrearages prior to the 1st of January, 1817, yet it is believed by the committee that the deficiencies not included in the estimate in that department for the year 1821, which amount to $521,886 57, are equal to the arrearages prior to the 1st of January, 1817. It may also be objected, that part of the estimates for the War Department—such as fortifications—are only temporary. To that it may be answered, that, when the fortifications are finished, the expenses will be rather increased than diminished, by the additional number of men necessary to man them. It may be further objected, that, in the estimates for the naval service, the sum of $500,000 is included; which expenditure is also temporary, as the appropriation for that object is to last but five years. The committee are of opinion that the additional number of men and officers which the Navy will then require, in addition to the sums required from time to time to refit and keep in repair the vessels, will make a greater demand from that Department upon the Treasury than is estimated.

Retrenchment of Expenditures.

H. OF R.

They would further remark that Congress, each session, upon an average, appropriates for temporary purposes, and which cannot be taken into any estimate, a sum equal to $200,000.

They therefore have no hesitation in giving it as the result of their most deliberate opinion, that, according to the now existing laws, the estimate which they have made, of $14,935,053 03, as a permanent charge upon the revenue, is not too high.

The committee will now proceed to the consideration of the means of the Government to meet the current demands against it. The estimates given by the Secretary of the Treasury are as follows:

Customs	-	-	-	-	$14,000,000
Public lands	-	-	-	-	1,600,000
Bank dividends	-	-	-	-	350,000
Arrears of direct tax and internal duties	-	-	-	-	75,000
Moneys recovered out of advances made in the War Department before the 1st of July, 1815	-	-	-	-	60,000
Incidental receipts	-	-	-	-	25,000
Total	-	-	-	-	$16,110,000

The committee are apprehensive that the customs will not be as productive as by some have been supposed, and by others confidently predicted. For the year 1821 the receipts from the same source amounted to $12,968,915 15.

Why then this increase in the estimates? It is a fact, well ascertained, that the exports of domestic articles for the year 1820 amounted to $51,684,000; and that the exports of the same articles for the year 1821 amount to but $43,671,894. Although the amount of imports may have an apparent increase, yet it may be considered as an axiom in political economy that the imports never can be considered as increasing, when, at the same time, there is a falling off of the exports. And if in any one year the imports shall appear to increase, when the exports, instead of a correspondent increase, are actually diminished, we ought to attribute it either to an excrescence upon the regular operations of trade, or that the imports were intended for exportation again. That the excess in the importations for the year 1821 was owing to an intention of re-exporting part of the same goods, is now manifested by the fact that the debentures will greatly exceed the estimate of the Treasury Department. They can therefore see no reason why the estimate for 1822 ought to exceed the amount received from the same source in 1821. But, suppose that the customs shall yield for a series of years $14,000,000—and beyond that sum it would be entirely unsafe to estimate them; because, although the nation is increasing in population and wealth, yet with feelings of pride it ought to be recollected that she is rapidly increasing in her domestic manufactures; and as far as they are consumed, so far will the foreign fabrics be thrown out of market, and part of the exports be turned into the channels of domestic trade by way of barter.

The duty arising from sugar imported will be greatly diminished, if not in a few years entirely cut off, by the use of the sugar of Louisiana and Florida. The estimate for the year 1822 of $1,600,000, from the public lands, they flatter themselves will be realized, owing to the discount of 37½ per cent. which is offered to the debtors for public lands who shall pay by September next. All who do not avail themselves of the discount offered for prompt payment will accept the credit given by the act of 1821. From this circumstance it is believed, that, as a permanent source of revenue, after the year 1822, one million per annum would be a high estimate. The resource of public lands cannot be considered as entirely a permanent one; and they very much deprecate the policy of throwing so much land into market, and hope for the future it will not be pursued beyond the limits of the present States and Territories. The policy is ruinous to the Western country, by draining it of all the precious metals, and consequently embarrassing its circulating medium. The origin of all the pecuniary difficulties of the West may be traced to this cause. The impolicy of the measure is again made manifest, by dispersing the population over too great an extent of territory; by which means there is great danger that the Government, at a day not distant, if the policy be not checked, will fall to pieces by its own unwieldiness, and consequent imbecility. The administration of such a Government can never be felt to the extremities of the empire. This system of measures keeps up an irritated state of feelings between the Indian tribes and the people of the United States. Besides, humanity forbids the driving those unfortunate people to the ends of the habitable earth. At the same time, self-respect ought to restrain the United States from amusing and gulling them and the world about, in point of practice, the unmeaning word of civilization.

In the estimate of the bank dividend of $350,000, on what data the Secretary went in making that estimate they know not, as the bank has never yet averaged 4 per cent per annum. The items in the estimate of seventy-five, sixty, and twenty-five thousand dollars, are not of a permanent character.

Suppose, then, the estimate of a permanent nature should stand thus:

Customs	-	-	-	-	$14,000,000 00
Public lands	-	-	-	-	1,000,000 00
Bank dividends	-	-	-	-	350,000 00
Total	-	-	-	-	$15,350,000 00

The estimates of the committee, as a permanent charge upon the revenue 14,935,053 03

Balance in favor of the revenue - $414,946 97

Which balance is scarcely sufficient to relieve the Treasury from its immediate embarrassments, and meet the unforeseen contingent expenses of Government. To talk of the present resources of Government, encumbered with the demands as now authorized by law; and, also, the present embarrassments of the Treasury, which will be more particularly noticed hereafter, as being sufficient to operate at all upon, much less redeem, within a reasonable time, the public debt, is the veriest delusion that any enlightened people ever fell into, and nothing could keep it up but a reluctance at parting with any of the expenditures of Government. The conclusion of the committee, of the inadequacy of the present revenue, encumbered with the existing demands, is confirmed by the melancholy fact that, in 1820, the public debt was $89,112,916 63; in 1821, $91,294,416 51; in 1822, $93,423,605 73.

The committee regret to find the Treasury not in as flourishing a situation as the President supposed, in his Message to both Houses of Congress, at the opening of the session. It is true that, on the first of January, 1822, there was a supposed balance in the Treasury of $1,777,648 58 which is part of the loan of 1821, and no part of the permanent revenue of Government.

That sum, nevertheless, is to be subjected to the following deductions $226,135 83

The estimate of the quarter ending the 31st of December, 1821, being estimated too high by that amount.

Deficiencies in the Indian and Pension Department, for the year 1821 521,886 57

Unavailable funds in the Treasury 842,159 60

1,590,182 00

Leaving only $187,466 58

This sum of 187,466 58

is all that is, in reality, left to discharge the balance of appropriations for the year 1821, which must be required, and which amounts to 2,268,611 28

Leaving a balance of $2,081,144 70 which must remain a charge upon the revenue of 1822.

From the previous part of this report, these three conclusions are clearly deducible.

First. That the present resources of the Government are scarcely equal to the authorized and current demands upon the Treasury, without operating upon any part of the principal of the public debt.

Secondly. That the Treasury, after deducting the deficiencies for the last year, the over estimate for the quarter of the year ending 31st of December, 1821, the amount of unavailable funds, and the balance of appropriations, as above stated, which will be required, is in arrear $2,081,144 70, for the year 1821, which sum must be charged upon the revenues of 1822.

Thirdly. That the public debt now amounts to $93,423,605 73, and will shortly amount to $98,423,605 73.

The question comes fairly before the nation, What disposition shall be made of the public debt? Shall we go on and make the experiment, and solve the question long agitated among politicians—is a national debt a curse or a blessing? The committee, however solicitous some may be to try the experiment, and leave to the silent operations of time the solution of the proposition, are unanimously of opinion that every effort, within the power of the Government, and which would not be extremely prejudicial to the interest of the people, should be made to redeem the public debt as soon as possible.

A national debt creates, in the persons of the stockholders, a proud, haughty aristocracy, in their manners extremely offensive, and ever destitute of that kind of patriotism and love of country that would sacrifice their pecuniary interest for that of the nation. It creates a body of men whose interest is separate and distinct, and at war with that of the great mass of the people, and who have an undue influence upon the administration of Government. The stock contributes nothing to the support of Government, when every other kind of prosperity does. The balance of the nation, as we see by an example in Great Britain, become the slaves, the hewers of wood, and drawers of water, for the stockholders. Already have the people of the United States paid to the stockholders, on the score of interest, $119,489,394 84.

Money has been emphatically denominated the sinews of war. A payment of the public debt in times of peace is a much better and more pleasing preparation for war than armies, fortifications, and navies. It puts public credit upon a better footing, and, in another war, loans can be more advantageously obtained. In every war, the nation may be engaged in—and an exemption from that scourge of mankind is not to be expected—a resort must be had to loans. The consequence will be, that, if the public debt is not paid off in times of peace, and additions made to it in times of war, the payment of the interest will become an insupportable burden.

In 1816, a sinking fund was created of ten millions. It is believed by the committee, that unless commerce is much more prosperous than can be anticipated, that with the most rigid economy practicable, consistent with keeping up the necessary establishments of Government, and without resorting to the aid of internal duties and taxes, the Government cannot set apart ten millions of her revenue on account of the public debt; and that, instead of ten, eight millions will be the extent; but whatever the amount of the Sinking Fund may be, the same should not be nominal, but real, and held inviolate, and never touched for any other purpose. The people would thereby have certain assurances, that the national debt would be discharged within a given time. The full operation of a sinking fund of eight millions, would redeem the public debt in 1842, by extinguishing first the six per cent. stock until the seven shall become reimbursable, and then operate upon the stock bearing the highest interest first, computing the three per cent. stock at two-thirds the nominal amount. In this estimate, the stock which will be created on account of the purchase of Florida is included, and the stock due the Bank of the United States excluded, because the stock which the Government has in Bank, will always be equal to the like amount of five per cent. stock due the Bank.

From the facts exhibited in this report, and the conclusions deduced therefrom by the committee, these questions necessarily occur:

First, has the Government the means of creating and keeping up a sinking fund of eight or ten millions; and if she has, what are those means?

Some politicians have supposed that, at the end of each fiscal year, there will be an unexpended balance of appropriations which will be required in the year succeeding, and that the same will average from year to year, one million and a half of dollars; that the Government can consider that sum as a bank would her deposits, and carry the same to the credit of Government for the succeeding year. The amount of unexpended balances which will be required to meet the object of appropriations, depends so much upon unforeseen events, and contingencies, (some years the appropriations are deficient, other years, when the Government has a full Treasury, and appropriates liberally, the balance may be considerable,) as, in the opinion of the committee, to render that sum too unsafe and precarious to be calculated upon.

APRIL, 1822.

Retrenchment of Expenditures.

H. OF R.

The means within the control of Government are not temporary loans, as a late short-sighted policy seems to indicate, but they are, first, a new modification of the tariff of duties; secondly, retrenchment in the expenditure of Government; thirdly, internal, direct, and indirect taxation.

In relation to the first question proposed, the committee decline going into the question with any other view than that of revenue; they do believe that an additional duty upon woollen manufactures, and that a diminution of the duties already imposed upon articles, particularly cotton, imported from countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, would increase the customs; besides, should the whole tariff be revised with no other view than that of revenue, they have no doubt but that the same could be made much more productive. As it respects the second proposition, to wit, a retrenchment of the expenditures of Government, the committee disclaim all intention of cutting down and destroying any one useful or necessary establishment of Government; but, at the same time that they make this declaration, they have no hesitation in saying that, from the best investigation they can give the subject, that such retrenchments can be made in public expenditures as will save to the Treasury, annually, near two millions of dollars, and not impair or weaken any of the permanent establishments of the Government; but, on the contrary, give it renewed health and vigor, like cutting away the dead timber from a forest of young trees. If there be one feature in the administration of the different Governments of the earth more uniform, more alike, and more inveterate than any other, it is the continued disposition to increase the expenses of Government, and an unwillingness to retrench; the cause is obvious: those in power are disinclined to part with any of the emoluments of office. Even should not much be saved by efforts towards retrenchment, yet a check to the present disposition of Government to increase the expenditures thereof, is gaining a great point. Fabius, the Roman Dictator, and Washington, both thought, and so did their countries, that to prevent the enemy from gaining a victory, was to obtain one themselves.

The committee, in this report, decline going into the several subjects of the retrenchment which they intend to propose; because each distinct subject will form the basis of a separate report and bill.

The third subject proposed in this inquiry, as forming a part of the ways and means of Government, is a resort to a system of internal, direct, and indirect taxation; this mode of raising and collecting a revenue is at all times to be avoided by Government, unless the most imperious necessity requires it—such as war—when the other resources of Government are to a great extent cut off. In the imposition of internal direct taxes, only such objects can be selected as are visible, and to a certain extent tangible; it consequently falls principally upon the agricultural part of the country, and the great moneyed capitalists escape its operation. Owing to that clause in the Constitution, which compels Congress to apportion direct taxes according to the representation, it falls unequally upon the different States, some paying three times as much upon the hundred dollars as others; again, the collection of that kind of revenue is odious and oppressive, because there is no choice left to the people, whether they have the means of payment or not, as there is in the duty collected from the consumption of goods; and nothing is so consoling to the feelings of a man as to have, or seem to have, the right to elect whether he will pay the tax or not.

The very collection of that kind of revenue is vexatious in its operation, by introducing into the domestic circle of man the rude and not unfrequently fraudulent tax-gatherer; moreover, internal taxation is the only source left to the States to support their respective governments, and common justice towards them forbids a resort to this kind of revenue, until every other means shall fail; besides, two sets of tax-gatherers at the same time collecting from the people, renders it difficult for them to know how much they owe to each government, and greatly increases the facilities which the collectors of the revenue too frequently avail themselves of, to practise frauds and impositions in their collections. Another reason, which has great weight with the committee, is, that it costs the solvent man more to get his contribution in that way into the public Treasury than any other mode of collecting a revenue ever resorted to by the United States. From an inquiry at the Treasury Department, it is ascertained that the gross amount of the direct tax, since the formation of the Government, is $14,029,997 60; the payments into the Treasury from the same source, is $12,626,813 50; from which deduct $672,516 27 for the expenses of collection, which leaves a balance of $11,954,297 23; this result shows that, from former experiments, it has cost the man who did pay $14 78 for each $100 that reached the Treasury. The gross amount of internal duties for the same period is $25,015,720 43; the amount received from the same sources is $21,957,061 14; the expenses of collection $2,105,317 78, which, deducted from the amount received, leaves $19,851,743 16—the per cent. is $20 64. The above calculations include insolvencies of individuals, defalcations of officers, and all the expenses of collection.

It is probable that some of the outstanding debts and dues may yet be collected, but it is believed the amount will be trifling.

The gross amount of customs for the same period is $494,933,179 11; the expenses of collection are $14,356,853 97; making $2 90 upon each hundred dollars. In 1819, an estimate was made of the amount of revenue bonds due, and the whole amount was equal to forty-five cents upon the hundred dollars of the gross amount of the customs, the greater part of which bonds are considered recoverable; since 1819, the revenue bonds due and unpaid, have not increased in a greater proportion.

The foregoing considerations induce the committee to believe, that it would be unwise and impolitic to resort to the ways and means of internal duties and taxes for the support of Government, and redemption of public debt, at this time, when every object of Government can be answered without it.

H. of R.

Retrenchment of Expenditures.

APRIL, 1822.

The committee cannot, in justice to themselves, conclude this report without bringing to the view of the House the former operations of this Government under the Administration of Presidents Jefferson and Madison. In 1801, at the commencement of Mr. Jefferson's Administration, the public debt was $83,038,050 80; the whole amount of revenue for that year was $12,846,530 95, and from that period up to the year 1812, inclusive, $48,254,675, 01, of the principal of the public debt was redeemed without resorting to internal, direct, or indirect taxation, and with a commerce embarrassed and trammelled by embargoes, restrictions, and non-intercourse; French Berlin, and Milan decrees, and British orders in council; and at the same time deriving little or no aid from the sale of public lands, and a very inconsiderable sum from loans, except the loan of 1812, which was obtained to enable the Government to prepare for war. It has been said by some, that the Government can, without any material alteration in her present ways and means, meet her current expenses as now authorized by law, and, within a period not very remote, pay off the national debt; to support this position a reference is made to the amount paid since the war; the public debt in 1816, was $123,052,782 62, which is the highest point to which it ever arrived; at the same time there might be a floating debt, such as arrearages due the Army, &c. The reason of this operation upon the national debt is obvious; the Government had at that time extraordinary means; the proceeds of the war taxes and duties; also, an unexpended balance of the loans of 1815 and 1816; the excessive importations immediately after the war, made the receipts of the Treasury, from customs alone, in 1816, $36,000,000, when they had only been estimated at $25,000,000.

In conclusion, the committee submit to the House the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the policy of resorting to loans, for the support of Government in times of peace, is unwise and inexpedient.

Resolved, That this Government owes it to the people to take efficient measures for the redemption of the public debt.

Resolved, That the resources of this nation are such as to render unnecessary a resort to a system of internal, direct, and indirect taxation.

Resolved, That this Government ought to adopt such a system of retrenchment as will dispense with useless expenditures, and bring the pay and salaries of the officers of Government to what they were during the Administration of former Presidents.

Resolved, That the tariff ought to be new modified with a view to revenue.

The report was read through, and a motion being made to lay the same on the table and print it—

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he thought the merit of the report would justify the printing of an extraordinary number of copies; and he therefore moved that a thousand extra copies be printed. [Two thousand were moved for by another member.]

Mr. McDUFFIE said he did not know why an extraordinary number of copies of this report should be printed. It was, in the first place, a report made by a committee not authorized to make it. A committee is appointed to inquire what expenditures of the Government are susceptible of a retrenchment; this committee transcends its power, goes into the business proper to the Committee of Ways and Means, presents to the House a report which is a tissue of fallacies; and now the House is asked to print two thousand extra copies of it. Mr. McD. professed that he could not understand this matter. Why is it that, at this time of the session, this report is brought in upon the House by a committee whose business it is not to undertake such an investigation? and why are extra copies of it to be printed? He said he would not now go into an examination with a view to show all the fallacies of the report; but he would show how the committee, in one item, overlooked a million of dollars. It was in this: that the committee had omitted all notice of a late report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he states that the revenue from imposts for the present year will be one million of dollars more than he had previously estimated it at. Mr. McD. trusted that, seeing the committee had transcended its authority, and misstated facts, the House would not consent to print the extra number of copies of the report as proposed.

Mr. HARDIN said he cared not how many copies of the report, nor whether any, were ordered to be printed. But the committee had not transcended its province, as charged upon it. The object for which this committee was raised was to inquire whether or not it was proper to retrench the expenditures of the Government. If so, what part of them, and how much, is to be retrenched? How can it be ascertained what retrenchment is necessary, unless a fair and impartial view be taken of the resources of the country—of the demands upon the Treasury, and of the sums properly chargeable upon it? These, it struck the committee, were necessary and preliminary inquiries. Whether any part of the report was false or not, Mr. H. would not say with the same positiveness as had been shown in the assertion of the gentleman from South Carolina; but, as one of the committee, he could say that the committee who made the report had anxiously labored to present a fair and impartial view of the revenue; and he had in his hand documents which, he believed, would prove every jot and tittle of that report. It was not stated in the report, he said, what the amount of debentures would be; but a view was taken of the amount of imports for successive years, and from which an inference was drawn that a considerable part of the excessive importations in 1821 was intended for re-exportation; and before this opinion was hazarded, an inquiry was made from the Secretary of the Treasury whether the debentures would exceed the calculation for the present year or not. To this the Secretary replied, that no certain answer could be given to the question, but that, without fear of contradiction, the committee might say that the amount of debentures would exceed what had been calculated. If any part of the report should be incorrect, Mr. H. said he should at all times be ready, and it would afford him pleasure, to correct it. But he held it to be the indispensable duty of this House to tell the nation how its finances stand. The fact is, said Mr. H., we have added to the national debt, since 1820, upwards of four millions of dollars; and, even with the aid of a loan of five millions, the deficiency of the revenue for the year 1821 will prove to have been about two millions of dollars, which must be charged upon the revenue for 1822. To refuse to print the number of copies of this report, as moved for, on the ground that the statements in the report are false, before any inquiry was made on that head, would be treating the committee with a disrespect and contempt which this House had thrown on no committee, though no other committee could have been more anxious to discharge faithfully the duties imposed on them; in doing which they had encountered great labor.

APRIL, 1822.

Retrenchment of Expenditures.

H. OF R.

The question having been taken on laying the report on the table, as moved, and afterwards on printing the usual number of the report (one for each member, &c.) and agreed to, and the question recurring on printing an extra number—

Mr. VAN WYCK said, as this appeared to him to be as fair and candid an expose of the situation of our country as had been laid before Congress at the present session, he moved that five thousand extra copies be printed.

Mr. BALDWIN said it was very unusual to have a discussion of the merits of a report when first presented to the House, and he was surprised at the subject being now debated. This report, he said, had been drawn up with great pains, and no doubt according to the best judgment of the committee. It certainly contained a great deal of useful information, which ought to go forth to the people. Documents of this kind were little read or understood by being published in scraps in the newspapers of the country; and the money of the country was, he thought, well laid out that was spent in the circulation of documents like this. He was therefore in favor of the printing, &c.

Mr. McDUFFIE said he did not wish to be understood as being opposed to the printing of this report; because, until it was printed and fairly before the House, all its fallacies could not be exposed. But he was unwilling to print it for diffusion among the people, until it was examined and ascertained to be worthy of being so diffused. To show that it was not thus worthy, he referred to one particular feature in the estimate, contained in the report, of the ways and means for the current year. The gentleman stated that he had it from the Secretary of the Treasury, that the amount of the debentures will be increased for the next year. This, Mr. McD. said, was very extraordinary; for he himself had it from the Secretary of the Treasury, both verbally and in writing, that the revenue from imposts for the present year will exceed the estimate by a million of dollars. [Mr. HARDIN here briefly explained. Mr. McDUFFIE would have gone on further in debate, but the Speaker declared debate on the principle of the report not to be in order, on this incidental question.] Mr. McDUFFIE concluded by saying that, on this point at least, the report was directly in the face of the documents on the table, and of the oral statement of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COOK said he was decidedly opposed to printing an extraordinary number of this report. He thought that when a document of this sort was presented to this House for its special patronage, to go through the country in extraordinary numbers, the House should be satisfied that the report was such an one as to deserve its special approbation. He did not say whether this was such a report; but this he would say, that the doctrine in this report applicable to the Western country—that which applies to the policy of bringing the public lands into market, was one which the whole Western country would revolt at and reject. Mr. C. was going on, but was stopped by the Speaker in the range of his remarks.

Mr. WRIGHT opposed the publication of more than the usual number of copies of the report. He was not at this time prepared to decide on the merits of the report; but sure he was of this—that it was an improper mode of proceeding for committees, in reports to this House, to report to it the opinions of officers of this Government instead of their own. Such a practice would lead to collisions between this House and the departments, &c. On the general subject of retrenchment, Mr. W. said he was as much devoted as any one to such a reduction of expenses as was consistent with sound policy—that is, to a just economy, though he had no idea of parsimony being mistaken for it.

Mr. MITCHELL opposed the motion under consideration. Many members had not heard the whole of the report, as read. He confessed, for one, that he was not master of the principles of that report. He did not know that the policy therein proposed would be agreeable to the House or to the nation. If five thousand copies were ordered to be printed of it, the report would go forth as the act of the House. But it is not so; it is the report of a committee only, the principles of which are not so clear as to receive unanimous assent. He was not prepared to say whether this document was fallacious or not; he professed to know very little of it—and for that reason was opposed to printing more than the usual number of it.

Mr. GILMER asked whether gentlemen, in opposing the motion now before the House, acted in consistency with their own conduct on former occasions? Did not the House recollect that five thousand copies had been ordered to be printed of the late report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, as soon as it was made, and a like number of the report of the Committee of Commerce? The subject of the present report, he said, was one of equal importance; and the practice of the House, as far as he had observed it, had uniformly been to order papers to be printed when presented, and without the formality of a previous critical examination of their contents. The subject of the report, he said, is one which is to divide the politicians of this country; and he therefore wished the people, as well as the House, to have full information upon it.

Mr. COCKE and Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, both rose to address the House on the subject; but the Speaker announced that the hour allotted for the consideration of original motions had expired; and the House proceeded to other business.

HORSES LOST IN SEMINOLE WAR.

The unfinished business of Saturday was resumed, (relative to the compensation for horses lost in the Seminole campaign,) and the question recurred, upon the motion of Mr. RICH, in relation to the proof of such loss that should be required.

After a few remarks by Mr. CANNON, in opposition to the amendment, the question was taken thereon and carried—yeas 67, nays 56.

Mr. GILMER moved a further amendment, the object of which was to extend the provisions of the bill to all persons other than the officers and volunteers of Tennessee.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, proposed to amend the amendment, by further extending the provisions of the bill to the late war with Great Britain, as well as the Seminole war.

Mr. VANCE thought all the horses lost in the late war had been already paid for, and he was not disposed to have this bill trammelled by superfluous provisions.

Mr. JACKSON replied, that he thought the bill ought to be general and uniform in its operation, and, in point of fact, he believed there were horses lost at Fort Meigs, for which no indemnification had been made.

Mr. JACKSON'S amendment to the amendment was then negatived.

Mr. CANNON moved to strike out of Mr. GILMER'S amendment the words "impressment or," so as to limit the payment to such horses, &c., as had been obtained by the United States on contract.

Mr. McCoy was opposed to the amendment, and generally to the bill.

Mr. CANNON withdrew his amendment, and contended that the bill was not restricted to the citizens of Tennessee, but applied to all who had sustained loss of their horses in the Seminole war, without regard to their residence.

Mr. GILMER made a few remarks in support of his amendment, and Mr. TATNALL also expressed his sentiments in favor of its adoption; when the question was taken, and the amendment was negatived.

Mr. GILMER moved an amendment of the first section, the purport of which was so to modify the same as to confine the payment to the case of such horses as were killed in action, or were unavoidably abandoned and lost.

The amendment was opposed by Messrs. F. JONES, MOORE, of Alabama, and Mr. CANNON, and advocated by the mover and Mr. TATNALL; when the question was taken, and the motion negatived.

Mr. REID, of Georgia, moved to recommit the bill to the select committee that reported the same; with instructions so to amend it as to extend the provisions thereof to all persons, of whatever State, who lost horses in the Seminole campaign.

The motion was supported by Mr. REID, and opposed by Mr. F. JONES, and negatived.

Mr. CANNON moved an amendment so as to extend the bill to "cavalry and other persons" who lost horses, &c.—which motion was carried.

Mr. GILMER moved to amend the second section by extending the proposed indemnity to wagons and other carriages which were lost or destroyed in the Seminole campaign; but the amendment was lost.

The question then recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. McCoy called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, made a few observations in favor of the bill, when

Mr. WHITMAN moved to strike out that part of the bill which proposes payment for such horses as escaped from the owner and were lost—on the ground that that was one of the ordinary risks that was covered by the per diem allowance. The question being taken thereon, it was carried.

Mr. REID made a few additional remarks, stating that he should vote for the bill, although he did not think it sufficiently broad to include all cases that justice required.

The question of engrossment was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen of Tennessee, Archer, Baldwin, Ball, Barber of Ohio, Baylies, Blackledge, Blair, Breckenridge, Brown, Buchanan, Cambreleng, Campbell of N. The bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. BALDWIN moved that the resolution submitted by him in relation to the tariff be now taken into consideration; and the question being taken thereon, it was decided in the negative—ayes 58, noes 70.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. EUSTIS moved that the Committee take into consideration the bill in addition to the act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment; which was agreed to—ayes 69.

Mr. TATNALL rose and remarked, that he was about moving to strike out (with the exception of the enacting clause,) the whole of the four first sections of the bill.* He had embraced these sections in this motion, as they were essentially blended together, and could only be fully considered by being taken up together. His object in moving to strike out these sections, was to test the sense of the Committee upon the bill. This bill, said Mr. T., which is now presented to the consideration of the Committee, has in view the most material alteration, nay, the almost total subversion of the present organization of the Army. I trust, sir, said Mr. T., that, notwithstanding the prejudices that have heretofore prevailed in this country against the regular Army, its well sustained reputation, and its vast importance during the late war, have made it, as it ought to be, an object of less suspicion and higher estimation. He hoped the Committee would bear with him, for a short time, whilst he endeavored to show the ill consequences that would inevitably follow the adoption of this part, at least, of the bill. He had had, as an officer of the regular Army, (to which he was attached during the war,) but little experience; but, little as it had been, it had enabled him to view this bill in a very different light from that in which the Military Committee had appeared to regard it. He claimed no power either to amuse or interest—he had no pretensions to oratory—he was a stranger to Parliamentary exhibition, but he trusted, as he had not been hitherto a frequent intruder upon the patience of members, he should now be indulged with their attention. He asked it not for himself, but for the subject that was now under their consideration. That subject was important, for, I confidently assert, said Mr. T., that, if you pass this bill, your Army will very soon become worthless and inefficient.

This might be much more properly called a bill for disorganizing, than a bill for organizing the Army. It is calculated, by the destruction of the staff, to make it a nest of idlers—a disgrace instead of an honor to the country. The professed object of the bill is not, indeed, to destroy the staff, but that will be its effect. Gentlemen may rely upon it, that will be its effect. He had, himself, no very serious apprehensions of the passage of the bill, provided the present military organization were fully understood, and provided the odious features of the bill were laid open to view. The honorable chairman himself, (Mr. EUSTIS,) who is the reputed father of the bill, he had some suspicion, was already considerably weaned from his first attachment to it, and began to feel very indifferent as to its passage.

The bill, sir, said Mr. T., contemplates the total destruction of the military part of the staff, and the striking off from the roll of the present Army, a Major General and a Brigadier General. It provides that the Brigadier General (when not otherwise employed,) shall discharge the duties of the Adjutant and Inspector's departments at the Seat of Government, where he will be permanently located, except when his lineal duties may call him away. It also reduces the rank of the Quartermaster General to that of Colonel, and strikes off the two Quartermasters authorized by the act of 1821.

Of the importance of the staff, there ought not to be a doubt. Upon it depends most vitally the character, good discipline, and efficiency of your Army. It was an anxiety with regard to this important, this essential branch of the Army, that had brought him out of a sick chamber on this occasion.

I will, however, said Mr. T., proceed at once to the subject. I will endeavor to show, if my strength will permit me, what the act of 1821 established in this particular—notice distinctly, though briefly, the respective duties of each of the members of the staff, and then present the objections to the alterations proposed in the present bill.

The departments of the staff, in which the bill contemplates alterations, are those of the Quarter-

* The sections are in the following words :

That, from and after the — day of — next, in lieu of one Major General with two aids-de-camp, two Brigadier Generals with one aid-de-camp each, one Adjutant General, two Inspectors General and one Surgeon General, there shall be one Brigadier General with one aid-de-camp, to be taken from the subalterns of the Army.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Brigadier General, when not assigned to other duty, shall have charge of the office of orders and inspection, which shall be attached to the War Department; and that he be allowed, with the approbation of the Secretary of War, to detail, for temporary service in the same, so many officers of the line of the Army, as may be necessary for the discharge of the duties of that office; and, also, to detail one surgeon, or one assistant surgeon, for duty in the said office, and that an additional surgeon be appointed if necessary.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the requisite inspections in all the arms and departments of service, including the ordnance, shall be performed by field officers of regiments and corps, by districts, and in rotation, in order that the same officers shall not inspect the same post twice in succession: Provided, That commanders of regiments and corps, and the senior officer of all separate commands, as far as it may be found convenient, shall correspond with, and receive orders from, the Department of War, through the military inspection office attached to the same, excepting such parts of the Army as may be united in large bodies.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Quartermaster General, after the — day of —, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments, of a colonel, and that the offices of two quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments, of majors, be abolished after the said — day of —.

master General, Adjutant General, and Inspector General. First then, sir, as to the Quartermaster General's Department. On this part of the subject, Mr. T. said he would not dwell. The bill, as regards the Quartermaster General himself, had nothing in view but the reduction of his rank to that of Colonel. Mr. T. was aware of the importance of this department, but he candidly confessed, if the subject could have been under his consideration when the general organization took place, he should have expressed it as his opinion, that no rank should be given to this officer over the other members of the staff. He would not be understood to say any thing in the way of objection to the officer, who, at this time, fills that station. He was as gallant, as able, and as distinguished a young soldier as our country could boast of. He spoke of the office, and did not see any strong reasons for the precedence given to it over each of the other departments of the staff. Filled, however, as it is, and important and arduous as are its duties, he did not see any urgent reasons for the alteration proposed. On the subject of this department, he would not, however, detain the Committee, but leave it, and several other matters of detail in the bill, to those gentlemen whose strength would permit a more ample discussion.

He would now call the attention of the Committee to the Adjutant General's department. This department, said Mr. T., is of essential importance, and he would, therefore, beg the particular attention of the Committee to the few remarks he should make with regard to it. Such a department must be indispensably annexed to your Military Establishment. It is the key of the Army; all orders of a general nature are issued through it. It is through it that all the movements, all the dispositions of your forces, are effected. It is charged with the whole military correspondence of the Army. It is, in this respect, to the Commander-in-Chief, what the Secretary of State is to the Executive of the country. The various returns of the strength of the Army, comprised in reports from the numerous posts and cantonments occupied by the troops, are regularly and periodically made to this department. So, also, are all returns of courts martial and courts of inquiry. It is the important medium of communication between the Commander-in-Chief and the various members of the Army. It is in this department that the records of the Army are kept. In short, it is an essential feature in your military organization. So he trusted every member of the Committee would regard it. So, in fact, the chairman of the Military Committee, (Mr. EUSTIS,) himself, was fain to acknowledge it, for he proposes to allot to this duty the highest officer that is suffered to survive the contemplated wreck of the present establishment. He allots to this duty the only Brigadier General proposed to be retained. In this respect, sir, the gentleman evinces the most palpable inconsistency. He plainly acknowledges the vast importance of this office, by attaching so high an officer to it, and yet he gives other duties to the Brigadier General, which belong to his character in line—duties which may, and probably would, occasionally, call him away for a length of time from the Seat of Government. The gentleman seems to be aware of the importance of this department, and yet he attempts to have its duties discharged by an amphibious being, that is neither entirely one thing nor the other—an officer "of the true mongrel breed."

Suppose, for instance, that this officer be called away to a distant point, upon a sudden emergency—suppose, for instance, to Detroit or to Pensacola—what is the consequence? Why, sir, your Army is without an Adjutant General, and that office is vacant which the gentleman deems the most important in the Army! I do not know, sir, whether it would be in order for me to state that the gentleman has suggested to me, in conversation, that the absence of the Adjutant General would not be sensibly felt, because his place would be sufficiently well supplied by the officers whom the bill authorizes him to detail from the Army, to assist in the duties of the department. Who, sir, are these officers alluded to, and why would they have been detailed? Why, sir, they would have been taken from the subalterns of the line, and their duty in the department would be that of clerks. Would they be deemed the persons who should be answerable for the correctness of the orders that may be issued? What information can they have reaped in this department? They would be better clerks, indeed, but perhaps worse officers; and all that they would have acquired would be to write better hands, and to stick the quills more gracefully behind their ears. The stool of the clerk is not the proper step to rank in your Army. The President of the United States and the Secretary of War might not be military men, and in nine cases out of ten would not be. In the absence of this officer, therefore, they would be completely hamstrung—they would not stir an inch—they would want an officer to advise with and give shape and effect to their plans. The present Secretary of War is certainly as able an officer; nay, sir, I will go further, for I am no approver of his political principles, and I will, therefore, be more scrupulous in giving him all that is due him—he is, perhaps, the most able officer that has presided over that department for many years. His talents and character seem to be peculiarly adapted to the situation; and yet, sir, he is, no doubt, entirely ignorant of the details of military matters. The fact is, sir, the Heads of our Departments are statesmen bred, and you would be as likely to find one of them able to manage a division of the Army, or to know the wants of that body, as he would be to work a ship-of-the-line, or know what she would require to be "well found;" and yet, the President of the United States, it will be recollected, is Commander-in-Chief of the Navy as well as the Army. No, sir; you cannot rely upon the military talents of your Heads of Departments. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, they would be found to be very similar to those who shed so bright a lustre upon the field of Bladensburg. This alteration, in short, sir, is totally inadmissible. You must have a military man of talents and experience constantly at the elbow of the Government. So much, sir, for the Adjutant's department.

I come now, sir, said Mr. T., to speak of the inspector's department. The duty of the inspector is personally to inquire, (I lay a stress, sir, upon this word, for therein consists the essence of the inquiry)—it is his duty to personally inquire into the state of the Army—to see whether its discipline, its police, its morality, its equipment, and its efficiency, be such as it ought to be—whether the officers are qualified both theoretically and practically for their stations, and whether they attend to their duties—whether the fortifications, arms, ammunition, and other public property, are properly taken care of, and whether the rules of the Army are strictly observed. In short, to save enumeration, said Mr. T., I would remark that the title explains what the duties would be. It is the most important member of the Staff, and without it, any army must soon sink in its character, and lose in its efficiency. Important, however, as it is, this bill meditates its destruction. In European armies this station is considered of the utmost importance, and, in our own country, it has also been so considered. General WASHINGTON always highly estimated it, and, at a late period of his life, the selection by him of General Hamilton (then Colonel Hamilton) to fill this station, and the rank given to him, (that of Major General,) shows its importance both in his view and that of Congress. The opinion, on such a subject, of this great patriot and experienced soldier, is, I trust, not undeserving of weight. I would here also add, said Mr. T., that the Inspector's reports are secret and his visits unexpected. His reports meet no eye except at the Seat of Government, whither they are regularly forwarded: and, consequently, his communications are free and unembarrassed. His visits, too, being unexpected, the officers at the various posts not knowing when to look for his presence, are constantly on the alert, and carefully attentive to every minute part of their duty. The Inspector is selected on account of his talents, military experience, and peculiar fitness for the office. Not having any connexion with the line, or with any corps of the Army, he has no partialities to bias his judgment, and being kept constantly on the wing, he neither forms such personal intimacies, nor contracts such personal prejudices, as would operate to discolor his opinions. Thus, sir, said Mr. T., I have endeavored to explain the duties and point out the peculiar character of this officer. I will now briefly state my objections to the alterations proposed by this bill. The bill proposes to do away with the inspecting officers, and to substitute, in their room, the field officers of regiments, i. e., the Colonels, Lieutenant-Colonels, and Majors—who are to discharge, in regular rotation, all the duties of inspection. This alteration, sir, will never answer. In the first place, it is not always that officers of the line are competent to the perfect discharge of this duty. Though possessed of all the science and information required, they may be deficient in other qualifications. They may want, for instance, the talent of observation—may be naturally careless or negligent—may not possess the necessary scrutiny of character, or the disposition to pry deeply into every thing, and so forth. Besides, they are subject to improper bias, as they belong to the very corps, and form a component part of that very body, with regard to whom you would require them to report. If you wish to correct abuses, in your War Department, your Treasury Department, or your Post Office Department, would you select a man from the Department which is to be inspected, to examine into it and to report to you? I think not. Besides, sir, these officers are constantly in the habit of close association, and will they not necessarily either become partial to each other, or prejudiced against each other? And, in either case, can you rely implicitly upon their report of each other?

But, above all, sir, this bill would make the inferior the corrector of his superior. May not, then, the superior refrain, in some instances, from a proper severity to the inferior, when that inferior is soon to have the right of making a secret report of him? Your colonels and other officers would soon become courtiers of popularity, instead of exhibiting a proper independence.

That sternness in the discharge of duty, so essential in an army, would soon yield to a feeling of selfish policy. Such a feature in your organization would be odious indeed. Each officer would be turned into a spy upon his brother. It would, depend upon it, be making your officers a set of informers, (the vilest character that man can assume,) and would destroy all that fine, noble feeling—that frankness of manner, generosity of spirit—that sternness and fidelity in the discharge of every duty, social or public, that so distinctly mark the character of the "old soldier." It would make him suspicious where he would otherwise confide, and timid in the discharge of his duty, where he would otherwise be bold and inflexible. In short, sir, it would make him every thing but what a true soldier ought to be. No, sir, when you create your inspectors, let them have nothing to do with the line, and all things will go on well. The good order, morality, and efficiency of your army, will be preserved.

One glance at this bill will satisfy any man that its object is (at all events its effect will be) to destroy the staff. Destroy the staff, and bring in a bill then to destroy the Army, and I will give it my vote. Take away the staff, and your Army will soon become dissipated and worthless; the officers of it will have no watchful eye over them, and will abandon themselves to idleness and its concomitant vices. The very principle producing efficiency is coercion—the soldier, like the school-boy, (and we are all alike in this particular, where the discharge of duties is irksome,) requires the eye of authority constantly over him. In short, sir, destroy the staff and you destroy the very life and usefulness of the Army. The members of the staff are so many veins and arteries through which flow the very life-blood of the body; destroy these and the rest is a useless mass of limbs, which will soon become corrupt; or, if it be permitted me to make another comparison, the staff is the main-spring of the military machinery, and if you destroy that, all efficient operation ceases. The Army is, at this moment, more efficient and in higher order, both as to its police, its equipment, and its discipline, than it has perhaps ever been before. Whatever it be, however, it owes almost entirely to the staff.

Gentlemen are in the daily habit of complaining of the size of the present staff. They say "they have no idea of a large staff for a small army." Sir, we have not a "large staff," although we certainly have "a small army." Gentlemen fret themselves into a brain fever, and then imagine things to exist which have no existence whatever. Let us see where is this "large staff for a small army." And here, sir, said Mr. T., I speak of the staff, which is the object of the attack of these gentlemen.

I will first state the case as to the Adjutant's department. Under the organization which prevailed immediately previous to the adoption of the present system, there were two Major Generals and four Brigadier Generals, the former of whom had each an Adjutant General, with the same rank as the present Adjutant General, and the four latter of whom had each an Assistant Adjutant General with the rank of Major, making, when summed up, six field officers attached to this department, besides an Adjutant and Inspector General, with the rank of Brigadier General, permanently located at Washington. How many have we now? Why, sir, one, and but one, and his rank only that of Colonel.

Now, sir, as to the inspectors. How many had we under the old regulations? The same number as of adjutants, and with the same rank, viz: six, two with the rank of colonel, and four with the rank of major. How many have we now? Two. As few as it is possible to have for the discharge of the duties. Unless gentlemen can, by an act of Congress, give to one of them something of the ubiquity of the Deity, two are as few as can discharge the duties. The Committee will bear in mind that the visits of the Inspector are personal, and, when we have in view the immense tract of country over which the troops are spread, and that at the most distant posts there will always be more remissness in the discharge of duty, and less care in the preservation of public property, we must at once be satisfied of the absolute necessity of keeping in service at least two Inspectors. To sum up, then, the whole of the staff, under the former organization, (that is, the Adjutant's and Inspector's departments,) there will be found to have been thirteen, viz: one Brigadier General, four Colonels, and eight Majors. Now, under the present law for the same departments, there are three Colonels. And so much, sir, for the "large staff for a small army."

This, Mr. T. said, was as far in his remarks as he expected to have proceeded. His strength, he found, however, greater than he had anticipated, and he would proceed on with his observations on the bill.

The bill also proposes the reduction of the general officers, so as to strike off one Major and one Brigadier General. As to the retaining of the Major General, I confess I am not particularly solicitous. He is by no means essential to the Army—that the Army could get along very well without him. He has, however, duties to perform, and his influence in keeping the Inspectors attentive to their duties is beneficially exercised. The only reason for striking him off is the saving which would be effected of the amount of his pay. His services during the war were distinguished, and perhaps as he is now a member of the Army, it may be as well to retain him. On this point, however, it is due to myself to say that I am by no means anxious.

With regard to the propriety and necessity of retaining the two Brigadier Generals, there ought not to be any hesitation in the committee. If you strike off your Major General, your plan should be to retain your Brigadier Generals, locating one of them in each of the two divisions of the country now marked off. You will then also attach the two Inspectors severally to each of these officers, under whose control their inspections will continue to be faithfully attended to. It is important that the country should have at least two military men, of high rank and experience, upon whom every reliance can be placed in case of emergency. Your country is extensive—its points of defence are various and widely apart. Is it not important that you should have an officer of well tried ability, who should be at hand in case of necessity on your Northwestern frontier? And will any one deny, in the present unsettled state of the late Spanish provinces bordering upon the Mississippi, and of the Spanish possessions in the West Indies, that it is highly necessary that there should be an officer of this rank in the southern division? Added to this, the present unsettled state of Europe would seem to demand some little attention from us. The bill contemplates retaining one Brigadier General; the only thing gained will, therefore, be in the personal expense of an officer of this grade, should you adopt this feature of the bill. The presence of these two officers, in their several divisions, will be of very great importance; they will have many and important duties to perform. Mr. T. said he hoped the Committee would decidedly reject this part of the bill, at least so much of it as embraced the curtailment of a Brigadier General.

I do not believe, sir, said Mr. T., that the honorable chairman of the Military Committee feels any hostility to the regular Army, or that he, in any manner, would wish to aim a blow that might effect its destruction. But I do believe, sir, this is the object of the majority of those gentlemen who form his auxiliaries on this occasion. They scout at its usefulness, notwithstanding the lessons which we received at the commencement of the late war, from the want of a well organized military. They say the militia are quite sufficient for all our purposes. Sir, said Mr. T., I am not disposed to detract from the merit of our militia; I think, with the gentlemen, that it is the grand military bulwark of the country, upon which we must principally rely. But, sir, it does not follow from this that we ought not to have a small proportion of regular force. It is a pity that gentlemen did not avail themselves of their Constitutional privilege, and employ themselves in organizing this militia, rather than to be constantly puzzling themselves with very sage plans to disorganize the regular Army. I have no prejudices against militia, and particularly such militia as our country can boast of. I believe them to be, under some circumstances, almost as efficient—nay, perhaps quite so, as regular troops, for instance, behind entrenchments; behind these an individual acts more independently—he is not so much bound to act in concert as in the field, where he necessarily loses his individuality. It is on this account that militia are so efficient in such situations, and not (according to the vulgar prejudice entertained by many in the regular Army) that their fears require their persons should be covered. Take them, however, into the field, where concert and union of action are essential, and where combination of movements, and all the intricacy of military science are required, and you cannot rely upon them against disciplined troops. Brave as they may be—nay, sir, brave as my countrymen are—they cannot, in such cases, be relied upon. They will tell you so themselves. To support this opinion, I need only to refer to the letters of General Washington, (and he, sir, must have had the highest opinion of the patriotism and bravery of his countrymen)—to those of General Greene, and of all the officers of that day, as well as to our officers during the late war. Preserve, then, your regular Army, and you retain the seeds of that discipline which, in case of a war, can easily be spread over your country. I mean not a large standing army. To that I have always been opposed; but preserve a body sufficiently large to furnish a basis for a larger army, should war or impending danger suddenly require its increase. Perhaps the present body is sufficiently large. I am willing to believe it to be so. In case of Congress deciding upon the sudden and large increase of the regular Army, it should at the same time determine (in order most speedily to produce discipline and efficiency in the newly created regiments) that the old regiments should be broken up, and the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, be separated from each other, and, in equal proportions, distributed among the new regiments. If such a plan had been pursued immediately upon raising the last War Establishment, its good effects would have been visible to every one. It is also important, I would remark, that, on your Peace Establishment, your proportion of officers to men should be much greater than upon a war footing. The object should be to retain as much science as possible.

There are some men who profess to be jealous of our regular Army. These apprehensions are idle. If its size did not of itself contradict all foundation for these, its character, and the materials of which it is composed would prove them trivial. It is composed of distinguished citizens, who are as much attached to their country and its institutions as we can be.

We are too apt to view this body of our countrymen as forming a class distinct from the body of citizens. We are wrong in doing so. They will never forget that they are citizens, until we ourselves forget that they are so. Protect their rights as you would those of any other portion of your citizens; see that the old veteran who has spent his twenty years in your Army—who has, perhaps, bled freely in your service, but who, at least, has always done his duty—see that he is not “overslaughed,” and another suddenly popped over his head; see that his rights are not trampled upon by the tyrannical principle of any Department—suffer not promotions to be made from a clerk’s stool, or from any department not connected with the line; in short, sir, let that be done always which has been done this session; let their interests be guarded by the proper power, and your officers will never forget that they are Americans, and that they are the citizens of a free country, and not the liveried servants of any branch of our Government.

When Mr. T. took his seat—

Mr. POINSETT said, we ought to give to the Army, however small it may be, such an organization, and such a complement of commissioned officers, that in passing from the Peace to the War Establishment, the force may be sufficiently augmented, without adding new regiments or battalions, so as to raise the War on the Peace Establishment; instead of creating a new army with all its inexperience and want of discipline, and adding it to the old army, as was done at the commencement of the last war.

Though the company officers under the present Peace Establishment bear a large proportion to the rank and file, yet, from the organization of the respective branches of the general staff, no supernumeraries can be said to exist. The details made from captains and subalterns of the line, as assistant deputy quartermasters; acting assistant adjutant generals; assistant commissaries of subsistence; aids-de-camp; adjutants; assistant teachers of the Military Academy, and for ordnance and topographical service, leave at most of the posts not more than two, and with some companies not more than one officer for duty. So that in point of fact there are no supernumerary officers in the service.

It must not be supposed by gentlemen that the present arrangement of the Army requires a greater number of officers than the old organization. It requires only the same aggregate number of company officers; they are differently, and in my opinion much better employed. Formerly there were four officers to each infantry, and four to each artillery company, making eight to two companies; now there are but three to an infantry, and five to an artillery company, still making but eight to two companies. This distribution has been found best adapted to the nature of the service to be performed; particularly as the ordnance duties devolving on the artillery, require a greater number of officers to be attached to that arm. Besides, the artillery most commonly acts by detachments, and not in large bodies as infantry. The organization of companies on the present reduced scale, susceptible of rapid augmentation, is peculiarly adapted to the situation of this country, to the extended and exposed frontiers we have to protect, and especially to the multiplied posts on our maritime frontier, all requiring garrisons in peace as well as war. The companies in service bear a proper proportion to the posts to be occupied; consolidate the four regiments into two, by increasing the rank and file, but reducing the number of companies of artillery, and many important posts must either be evacuated or garrisoned by detachments of companies under the command of non-commissioned officers. The dividing of companies has always been found to produce the most injurious effects on the moral character, as well as on the military improvement of the officer and soldier, and ought to be avoided. The present organization of artillery companies at their minimum, form competent garrisons in time of peace, for the posts which should be occupied, while the same companies augmented to their maximum, to be effected by a simple operation, and aided by the neighboring militia, would be fully adequate to the defence of all the maritime posts.

As reduction of expenditure is the sole motive in support of the change proposed to be made, Mr. P. would observe, that no actual saving can be made by dismissing officers who are necessary to the system established. If the organization is disturbed, or if the means of transacting the business of the departments be taken away, the administration of the disbursing departments of the Army must be embarrassed, and a loss will be incurred much greater than the amount saved in the pay of officers dismissed.

The rank and file of the present Military Establishment amount to 5,642, a numerical force, above the most approved organization of armies, consisting of two brigades, and one division; consequently superior to the command of one major general, and two brigadier generals. The existing staff of the army does not bear its full proportion to the enlisted men in service, but with the rank and file has been organized at its minimum. Pass the bill on your table, reduce the staff, and it will soon be discovered that the rank and file are too numerous for the officers commanding, and we shall be called upon again to diminish the number of soldiers, and so on until the Army is entirely annihilated, and it would be better to do so at once than disorganize it, and render it inefficient. The present formation contains all the elements composing the Army. It is susceptible of being increased as emergencies may demand, without creating new corps, or new departments, by the simple operation of adding to the rank and file, and inferior grades of commissioned officers. The whole machinery of an army is preserved; the duties of each department are distinctly defined, and a regular chain of responsibility is enforced, from the soldier to the commander-in-chief. Each department of the general staff has its chief located at Washington, and is so organized that it may be enlarged or reduced in its inferior members to suit any circumstances. Under the present system, in any emergency, orders from the Executive can be distributed through the proper channels, prompt measures adopted; the rank and file increased to the war standard; and the operations conducted under experienced commanders.

The present Military Establishment, but 6,183 aggregate, including the staff and engineer corps, may be increased by the proposed operation to 9,483, and by doubling the battalions of infantry, and adding to the company officers only, to 15,169 aggregate. In a very few months, therefore, after the proper orders were extended, the present army may be more than doubled in strength, disciplined, and prepared for active operations in the field.

Let me ask gentlemen to recollect what time and expense it required at the commencement of the last war, before we could raise such a force, and at what cost it was rendered equally efficient for operations against the enemy. And here let me remark, that respectable rank is as indispensable to the character and efficiency, as to the perfect organization of the Army. Talent and character cannot be commanded in any country without adequate compensation, and to the high-minded soldier, the simple wages of his profession can be no object. He is induced to serve by the rank and distinction to which he may aspire. Limit these prospects, or destroy them, as this bill contemplates, and talent and character must necessarily be driven from the military to other professions of life, where the prospects of distinction are more inviting.

This may appear a consideration of but little importance, and in time of peace it is so. But those who may be called upon themselves, or who may send forth their children to fight the battles of their country, ought to reflect before they drive from the service men of talent and experience. They ought to recollect that the talent and experience of an officer can be acquired only in the field, and at the cost of blood, and that the want of these qualities in those who command may expose their sons to useless slaughter, and their country to dishonor.

The second section of this bill degrades the Brigadier General to be retained to be the chief of the office of distribution and inspection, destroys the Adjutant General's department, leaving its duties to be performed by temporary details from the line, and assigns to the surgeon to be designated the important control now exercised by a Surgeon General, over the medical department of the Army.

The bill concedes the propriety and necessity of an office of distribution and inspection. It is clearly better, then, to retain the organization of the Adjutant General's department under competent officers, specially commissioned, than to impose its duties on officers irregularly and temporarily detailed for the purpose from the line.

This rotation in office must operate injuriously on the proper administration of any department; and the details must draw officers from their ordinary commands, equally important with the duties of the Adjutant General's office.

The organization of the regiments of the line preserves only the full complement of officers; and, if the staff officers of the Army are drawn from them, the number for important duty with their companies or commands, must be injuriously diminished. The detailing a surgeon to control the medical department, is equally defective. It would be impossible to procure an individual, with that inferior appointment, fully competent to discharge the important duties of the Surgeon General. The organization of the medical department, under a chief, at Washington, has operated greatly to its improvement; and if the superintendence, now exercised by competent talent, be removed or transferred to temporary details from surgeons, that department, so important to the efficiency of an army, must suffer.

The third section is, if possible, still more objectionable. It changes the system of inspectors, confining the duties exclusively to the field officers of regiments and corps.

The field officers of regiments have important duties to perform. They are responsible for the discipline, military improvement, and efficiency of their respective commands. They are the immediate inspectors of their respective regiments, and are bound to hold themselves and their commands always prepared for active operations in the field. They are responsible for the execution of all orders emanating from higher authority within their commands, and cannot be withdrawn from them for the performance of other duties, without interrupting the channel of communication and execution of orders. To constitute them Inspectors of the Army, as this section proposes, is incompatible with their more important duties, and the constant inspections by districts; and a rotation throughout the whole army would keep the field officers of regiments in constant motion, a greater part of their time absent from their respective commands, and distract their attention from the only objects to which it ought to be unceasingly directed, to the serious injury of the discipline, improvement, and efficiency of the whole Military Establishment. Besides, sir, from the esprit du corps which exists in every army, the field officers of regiments would constitute a body of prejudiced inspectors, each partial to their own commands. The most perfect inspections are made by a distinct and independent branch of the general staff; a system which has been approved and introduced into most of the European armies, and has been adopted in the American service with the most beneficial results. It is only by a distinct branch of officers, without any partialities for particular corps, that proper inspections can be made, and the actual condition of the Army, whether it respects the improvement of the personnel, or the quality and condition of the material, be faithfully presented to the Executive. Nothing contributes so effectually to the perfection of a military organization as a separation of the different departments of an army. Field officers of regiments should be answerable only for their discipline and improvement. Impartial inspections by a distinct competent branch of the general staff, can alone determine how far these duties are faithfully discharged.

The fourth section reduces the rank of the Quartermaster General, and dismisses the assistants; in short, disorganizes the whole department.

The rank of Brigadier General is not more than equal to the duties to be discharged and the responsibilities that devolve upon the Quartermaster General. Diminish the rank, and it would be impossible to command the talents, character, and experience, necessary for the chief of that department, which can only, in time of peace, receive such an organization as will prepare it for the operations of war. The only difference to be made in time of war in this, as in all the departments of the Army, ought to be, the increased number of the inferior members.

It is essential to the organization of every branch of the Army, that there should be a chain of communication between the chief and the inferior officers. By dismissing the assistants, who rank only as Majors, the very imperfect link now existing between the chief of the Quartermaster's department and his subordinate officers, is entirely destroyed.

It must be known to every one at all conversant with the subject, that this department requires a sort of talent not often to be met with; that a just system of economy can only be enforced by active and experienced officers; and that it requires no ordinary degree of foresight, prudence, and knowledge of mankind, to conduct with ability the heavy and varied expenditures of the Quartermaster's department; a department which, in addition to certain regular defined duties, acts on every emergency, which must be prepared to make good every deficiency, so as to perfect the whole military system.

Few officers, properly qualified for the discharge of the duties of Quartermaster, will encounter the responsibilities devolving upon Assistant Deputy Quartermaster, without the prospect of future advancement. That organization is imperfect, and must operate unfavorably on the public service, which does not form a school for talent and ability in the inferior grades to qualify themselves for the more distinguished and extensively useful stations.

The Quartermaster's department possesses, in some degree, such an organization. As vacancies occur, the Assistant Deputies may be made Assistant Quartermasters, with the rank of Majors, and from thence be promoted to be chiefs, if they are found to possess the requisite talent and ability.

The bill destroys that organization, reduces the chief to a Colonel, and confides the duties of that department to selections from the line, with no additional rank, and with very inadequate compensation for the responsibilities incurred.

The alleged motives for the changes proposed by this bill are—retrenchments in the expenditure of the Military Establishment. The amount to be saved by the provisions of the bill, are stated by the Paymaster General to be—

Reduction of the staff - - - $22,207

Difference in ordnance pay and disbanded ordnance	- - - - -	13,692
Servants	- - - - -	42,379
Brevet pay	- - - - -	500
		$80,254

The actual saving by the reduction of the general staff is but $22,207; and for this sum the whole military organization is to be disturbed, and the Peace Establishment rendered inefficient for the objects for which alone it ought to be maintained. The amount deducted from the pay of staff officers, so as to equalize it with that of the infantry, is too inconsiderable to authorize a change so unjust. Their duties expose them to increased expenses.

The pitiful sum of $500, proposed to be saved by reducing the brevet pay, ought never to have been mentioned in this bill. That pay was won gallantly in the field, and ought not lightly to be taken away from the brave men who now receive it.

The amount proposed to be saved by the ninth section is, in fact, merely a reduction in the number of rank and file in service. I have, however, no objection to it.

The amount to be saved by dismissing the ordnance men is conjectural. In my opinion that measure will augment the expense of that branch of the service. Hired labor must be resorted to at an increased cost; but, as that subject is now before the committee we shall not dwell upon it.

The present staff and officers of the Army are, as I have before observed, organized at the minimum, and ought rather to be increased than diminished. I am in favor of a numerous staff, and of maintaining, in time of peace, more officers than are absolutely requisite for the duties of their respective commands, with a view to the organization of a more numerous army in time of war. I am aware that military writers were divided on this question. I say were, for all modern writers, since the art has been perfected, are united in favor of maintaining constantly what the French technically call frames of an army—what we call the skeleton of an army.

Of all the elements that compose an army, the soldier is the only one that can be created in a short time. It is mere technical knowledge he requires, and that very limited. The instruction necessary to form an officer is totally different. It requires not only time and application, but experience, which is to be gained only in the field.

It is hardly necessary to recall to the recollection of gentlemen in this Hall, the disasters and disgrace which attended our arms at the commencement of the last war. They are to be traced to the want of organization of the Army—to that defective system to which gentlemen wish to bring us back—and to the inexperience of our officers. The glorious manner of its termination can be attributed only to the talent and experience of our commanders, acquired at the cost of so much blood and treasure.

A striking illustration of what I have advanced may be drawn from the history of the wars that grew out of the French revolution. At the commencement of the revolution, the emigration of the nobility had left the French army almost without officers, the strong excitement of that moment armed thousands in the cause of their country, the citizens of the new republic flocked in crowds to defend the frontiers. Numbers and enthusiasm made up for the want of talent and experience in the commanders. They repelled the invaders, but with an immense loss of men when compared with that of the disciplined bands opposed to them, a loss almost incredible.

In the midst of this scene of carnage, and after two years of war, such men as Pichegru, Moreau, Kleber, and others, were distinguished from the crowd; but their military education was formed at the expense of torrents of blood. About this period the army of the Republic, exhausted by the immense losses they had suffered, required to be recruited; but the citizens, discouraged by the prodigal waste of life, resorted to by inexperienced officers, as the only means in their power to repel the enemy, refused to march to the frontier. Government was compelled to resort to a requisition, and the conscription grew out of these causes.

The advantages of a well-organized staff, and of possessing the frames of an army, are illustrated in an equally striking manner by those wars.

After the destruction of the great French army in Russia, and after the retreat from Moscow, it was reduced to 25,000 men, which took a position behind the Saal. But France possessed a number of experienced officers of every grade, and a well organized staff. In less than six months a new army of 150,000 men was formed of young soldiers, but commanded by experienced officers. This army of recruits was marched into Germany—was arrayed against the veteran bands of Russia and Prussia, flushed, as they were, with victory—beat them at Lutzen, at Bautzen, and at Wurtzen—took up their position on the Oder, and obliged the enemy to conclude an armistice.

These examples ought to warn us of the dangers to which a country is exposed by a defective organization of the military establishment, and convince us of the advantages to be derived from its perfect organization and from a well appointed staff.

If then, this bill be calculated, as I think I have proved, to destroy the organization of the Army—to make it unfit for the only object for which it ought to be maintained—to render it inefficient in time of war, and in that event to involve us again in all the disasters and difficulties attendant on a defective system, I hope the Committee will unhesitatingly reject it.

Mr. STERLING, of New York, rose and remarked, that he had paused, in expectation that some of the friends of the bill would come forward to defend it. But he had waited in vain, and he felt it a duty incumbent upon him to express his sentiments on the subject. He could not agree with the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. TATNALL,) that there existed in this country against the Army a general prejudice. The assertion operated as a libel on the people of this nation. He could not believe it possible that they were so lost to gratitude, and the best feelings of the human heart, as to look with an averted eye upon the heroes that defended them in the hour of peril. If there ever was a set of men who deserved the good will and lasting regard of their countrymen, it was the remnant of the Army that has survived the cold and calculating policy that has assailed them. They are covered with honorable scars, and however little their worth may be valued by some, it is a mistaken idea that it is not appreciated by the nation. The question at present is, not whether we shall disband the Army, but whether we shall cut off the heads of that army. It is not whether we shall introduce a graduated system of reduction, but whether we shall lop off the limbs which give it life and energy. And for what? To save a little money. I, too, said Mr. S., am in favor of saving money, but not at the expense of the safety and independence of my country. I, too, am in favor of reform, but it is that reform which builds up, not that which prostrates and destroys. Mr. S. was opposed to the bill, because it introduced into our system, and indicated in our Government, a fluctuating, and, of course, a pernicious policy. What had been the course of our policy in relation to this subject? After the war it was necessary to reduce, and a salutary reduction was made, to ten thousand men. The force thus retained was respectable and efficient—it was popular. We had not then forgotten their services, or the safety of our country. But soon the sufferings and alarm we had endured faded from our recollection. Danger receded, and the tone of the country relaxed. In 1816, it was deemed expedient to reorganize the staff of the Army—it was reduced. In 1818, a further amputation took place. The danger still receding, and the solitudes of the past being less fresh in the mind, some began to think the Army unpopular; and hence, in 1821, it was again reduced. After all these ordeals, the nation did believe that the Army might rest, for a while at least. Those gallant officers who were still retained, and who had not yet been compelled to seek for employment in the departments of civil life, had reason to expect that they would not be disturbed. But what do we find? Not twelve months had elapsed, before this little band was attacked by resolution after resolution on your table. Mr. S. would by no means doubt the correctness of the motives that had led to their introduction; but he did not believe that such were the temper and feeling of the nation. He did not believe they were in favor of that fluctuating and unsettled policy which builds up one day, and tears down the next—which begins in folly and ends in weakness. It was a policy at war with every sound maxim of legislation, and with all those wholesome rules of government which teach us to confirm its strength by placing it on the most firm and substantial basis. It was ruinous to the Army, and subversive of all discipline, and opposed to all correct and economical administration. It shows a fickleness and instability in Congress, injurious to its character, and destructive of the confidence of the nation. It destroys all stability and permanency in your Military Establishment. No system of defence can be a good one, unless it is bottomed upon a stable and permanent basis. This wavering policy is destructive to military science, disheartening to all military pride and ambition, and is calculated to drive from your Army the best talents and the most useful acquirements. It savors of persecution and injustice towards those who have fought and bled for the country, and who merit a better fate than is held out to them by these persevering and repeated attempts to shift them off, and throw them upon the world, unfitted by habit to mingle in its toils, and gain a support by its occupations.

But he (Mr. S.) had another objection to this bill. It was presented too early. The period since the last reduction was too short to have fairly tested the experiment, or proved the policy of the old system or of the new. Even the principles of the last reduction were not yet settled, as was well known and fully understood. And still we are again called on to apply the pruning knife, and thrust these men, who have fought our battles, into private life. Is it right in respect to them? Mr. S. contended it was unjust, ungrateful, and oppressive, and he would express the views on which that sentiment was founded. It was unjust, because they will have been deceived should this bill pass. The very title of the act was "An act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment"—not an act to reduce and unfix it; to set it in motion and to render it uncertain. It was not, indeed, a contract—but it held out good reasons to expect that the establishment was fixed upon a basis as permanent as peace. If this kind of policy then was unjust, it was also ungrateful. Mr. S. was aware, he observed, that it was contended by some, that the principles of gratitude had nothing to do with the policy of Government. To this doctrine, said Mr. S., I cannot assent. Gratitude is not only a correct and noble feeling, but was consistent with the soundest policy, of which this country had set the most splendid examples. If there are any of the corps of officers you purpose to disband, and such there are, whose blood flowed to secure and save your country, is he not entitled to your gratitude? And what but that principle has induced you to pay the pensioners of the Revolutionary war? Rome and Greece raised monuments to their departed heroes, and will you not do justice to the living? Shall we bear, and justly bear, the scorn and sneer of princes and despots, who reproach republics with ingratitude? This wavering policy operates oppressively upon the officers proposed to be reduced—and upon one of my constituents (said Mr. S.) upon the commander-in-chief, it bears with a heavy hand. It aims at him a severe and undeserved blow. His situation is peculiar, and demands from his country, not a cold and unfeeling course of policy, but its sympathy and consolation. The hand of affliction is now upon him. The God of Heaven has seen fit to visit him with a calamity severe and dreadful. And is this the moment for his country to forsake him? Whence has this affliction befallen him? Under Providence, it has originated from his exposures, his sufferings, and his toils, on the Niagara frontier. He there took a disorder which never left him until a more dreadful one set in. In the midst of this affliction, and when health and hope begin to open upon him—when just recovering from the almost fatal stroke, shall he be abandoned, and stripped of honors acquired by his blood, and of emoluments richly earned by the greatest personal and pecuniary sacrifices? I say pecuniary, said Mr. S., as well as personal—for true it is, that, devoting himself to his country and his profession, his private affairs were confided to other hands, and the result is deep and heavy embarrassment. Yes, sir, a handsome estate is deeply encumbered, and the effect of your policy may be to strip from him the remnant of his savings from a life of toil, of enterprise, and the most persevering industry.

Mr. S. was opposed to the bill therefore, because he contended it was impolitic to destroy the office of Major General. That officer was a constituent of the present system, and cannot be removed without deranging and injuring its organization. Our Army, said Mr. S., affords a command equal to that of a Major General, and our forces being scattered throughout numerous posts, strengthens, instead of weakening the argument to retain him. In point of economy, we should lose by abolishing this office. The occasional inspection of an officer of such a grade, so nearly connected with the Government, and to whom the whole Army will look up, will have a powerful influence to preserve discipline, order, and economy, in money and in property. It will save more than the extra expense of the office. If our Army was to be organized on military principles, he contended that this office was essential to its correct regulation and discipline. It was impossible for the Secretary of War to be familiar with all the minutiae and details of the Army. By this officer he can be aided in the most effectual and useful manner, and freed from an intolerable burden, which is inconvenient, if not incompatible with the discharge of his other numerous and pressing duties. But this is not all. Your Secretary of War often changes. This deranges and confuses the whole system, unless you have an officer of high grade upon a permanent footing, acquainted with the details of the Army, and responsible for them. This office was also a just reward for high and distinguished services. It excites emulation, and ambition, and gives to the aspirant for military fame something to fix his eye, and stimulate his zeal. It makes the Army more respectable, and adds to the character and dignity of the nation. For these and other reasons, Mr. S. hoped that officer would be retained.

He would not dwell long upon the expediency of disbanding the other officers, as proposed by the bill. That subject had been so fully discussed by the gentlemen who had preceded him, (Messrs. TATNALL and POINSETT,) that he would forbear to comment particularly upon them. He briefly reviewed the duties, &c., of the adjutant, surgeon, and inspectors general, and he thought it unwise to legislate out of office men of such distinguished talents and services, without very strong and palpable reasons. In respect to the latter, it was an office as old as the Government, and the substitute proposed was, in his opinion, extremely faulty. It was an office of detail and minutiae, and required great skill and attention. Two were necessary on account of the posts being so scattered, and the difference between the inspection of infantry and artillery. These inspectors, he observed, travel from one part of the Union to the other, and make to the Government very valuable reports, but the mode of inspecting by field officers was peculiarly improper. They were interested to conceal all the defects in their own regiments, and collusion might easily take place. And would they, he asked, report their own faults and errors? Besides, if they inspect any regiments but their own, they must necessarily leave the latter destitute. If the object is to dispense with the department, then abolish them and save their salaries, and not transfer them where the duties cannot and will not be performed. Mr. S. presented a variety of other considerations with respect to this subject, and thought that the adoption of the proposed plan would go far to ruin the Army. With respect to the office of surgeon general, the object was to save $1,800; and what would be the probable result? You destroy the best arranged part of the Army. You introduce disorder, waste, and confusion, in the place of system and economy. There was no department better organized, or in finer condition, or which has been more fortunate in its results than this. By a renovation of the system, there has been a reduction made in the expenditure, from about seven to three dollars per man. And how has this been accomplished? By introducing system, and order, and responsibility. The Surgeon General is the efficient head of the department. He has now the sole responsibility of purchasing and distributing the medical stores. He knows all the posts where the troops are stationed—the climates, the diseases, and the wants. He can tell whether the medicines are suitable for this or that post; the proper quantity and quality; and, with his extensive knowledge of the country and market, can purchase at the lowest prices and at the most suitable places. He is responsible for the whole, and hence the great reduction of expenditure. And shall we now go back to what is essentially the old and wasteful system? Under that, the surgeons of each post made their requisitions for medical stores at their discretion, and the commissary general of purchases directed the supply accordingly. Here was room for waste, and ignorance, and fraud, and by the bill the responsibility will be divided, which must necessarily lead to similar results. Under the present system there had been no defalcations, no lost vouchers. The surgeon general and commissary general have no money, but it goes directly from the Treasury into the hands of those of whom the purchases were made. Mr. S. was opposed to the bill because the present organization is the best adapted to keep up a rigid system of responsibility. Each department of the Army terminates in a head responsible for its correct administration. This is as it should be, as it keeps up a system of responsibility, attended with the most beneficial results. In no other way can you establish an efficient and well organized system. It is more perfect than any heretofore organized. In case of war, all would move with harmony and vigor, each man would know his station, be responsible before the people for the correct discharge of his duty, and all that waste of money and destruction of property which took place during the late war, would be avoided.

Mr. S. was opposed to the reduction, because he believed the present system was the most economical, and more so than any other which could be devised.

The whole object is to save money. If the present, therefore, is a money-saving system, more so than the one proposed, the change must be inexpedient. The amount to be saved is the emoluments of the officers reduced; but if, in doing this, you derange the whole system, you hazard the loss of more than you save. The great object in any system is, by proper checks, to prevent the loss of money and the waste of property. No system can be so good as that which makes an efficient head responsible for the errors and the waste of his department. Some one known, prominent, responsible officer, should be at the head of each department, and remain accountable to the Executive and to the people for the money disbursed in that department. This is the excellence of the present system, and its results have been admirable. Before it was established all was disorder, waste, and confusion; since, the greatest order, the most rigid economy, and the strictest responsibility, are preserved. Your records give you the results, which afford a most powerful and conclusive argument in favor of the present system. The proof is clear, the effects palpable, and the causes are as obvious as the results are astonishing. The law organizing the general staff, agreeably to its present formation, did not take effect until April, 1818, and could not be matured before the close of the year 1819. Since then the expenses of the Army have been reduced to an extent and with a rapidity truly surprising.

This shows the reduction per man :

Cost per man.		Reduction.
$451 00 for the year 1818
434 70	1819	$16 87
315 88	1820	135 69
287 02	1821	164 55
299 46	1822	153 11

The proportion of officers to the men in 1822 being greater than before, prevents the result of that year from being as favorable as prior to that time.

Again : the whole expenses of the Army since eighteen hundred and eighteen have decreased as follows, viz :

1818	$3,072,495 04	No. of Army	8,199
1819	3,663,735 16		8,428
1820	3,061,884 00		9,693
1821	2,327,552 13		8,109
1822	1,929,179 91		6,442

Adding a fair amount for the difference in the price of provisions, viz : from 40 to 39½ per centum in the price of provisions, and in that of clothing and medical stores from 7 to 8½ per centum.

Again: In 1818 the Army was 8,199 strong, and cost $3,702,495 04.

Now, for the same force and at the same rate of expenditure, the cost would have been, after making allowance for difference in prices, viz :

For 1819	-	-	-	$3,564,105 30
1820	-	-	-	2,589,900 12
1821	-	-	-	2,353,270 98
1822	-	-	-	2,455,272 51

Which shows a saving upon this estimate for 1819 of $138,389 74, by difference of administration.

1820	-	-	-	$1,112,594 92
1822	-	-	-	1,247,222 50

And how has all this been accomplished? By the plain and simple principle of giving every department an efficient and responsible head. By the rigid control which this has given to the disbursements of public money; by the preservation of public property; and by the prompt rendition and settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers. As an evidence of the practical result of the system, it may be stated as a fact, that, in the year ending the 1st of June last, there were ninety-one disbursing officers in the department of the Commissary of Subsistence, and seventy-one contracts, and all the accounts were settled, except to the amount of $5,405. Other departments are equally prompt. The difference in the expense of the Subsistence department alone, under the old and new system, for the last year, was $323,489 04.

In old	-	-	-	-	-	$800,377 72

Such are the results of that enlightened system of economy which pervades the present organization and administration of your Army. It is in this point of view, so all-important, that the present system manifests itself to the greatest advantage. It is this system, so well organized, so admirably arranged, and productive of such immense savings, that is now proposed to be disorganized. Mr. S. was also opposed to the bill, because he regarded it as a departure, not only from the true principles of economy, but because the present was the best system for a Peace Establishment. It would enable the Government to pass from peace to war with the least danger, the least expense, and with an efficient and powerful force. In a very short period a well organized army could be prepared for the field. You have only to fill up the ranks of companies, battalions, and regiments, and you are ready for action, under able, skilful, and experienced commanders. It gives you all the advantages of a large army in time of peace, without its danger or expense. The operation of the present organization of the Army, in a pecuniary point of view, shows the excellence and the power of the right kind of economy—that which is founded in justice and regulated by principle—that which does not lose a pound while looking at a penny. True, genuine economy is a great political virtue, and the statesman who does not possess it is unworthy of confidence; but there is a sound and enlightened system of economy, which ought never to be confounded with a false, niggardly, and short-sighted parsimony. False economy is regardless of consequences. It looks not to results, and takes no broad and extended view of things. It saves by destroying—breaks down a system to day to save money, and is obliged to build it up again to-morrow with infinite loss, and waste, and extravagance. It robs the individual to replenish the Treasury—withholds money, because it has the power—scrutinizes little matters, and overlooks great ones; is without order, system, or principle, and is as much at war with private right as with permanent public good. But sound economy consists in supporting the necessary establishments of the nation with the least possible expense—in calling every man to a rigid and prompt account for every dollar of the public money—in putting a stop to any useless expenditure—in keeping up a thorough system of responsibility, and in detecting and punishing public defaulters. Such, said Mr. S., is the economy of the present system, and such had been its operation. But there were other considerations that should induce a rejection of this bill. Were it even meritorious in itself, yet the time in which it is brought forward is unpropitious. By a public act, almost unanimous, we had recognised the independence of the late Spanish provinces in South America. The results of that recognition could not be foreseen. It was assuming an attitude that might lead to a war. The Holy Alliance will look with an evil eye upon free America. Instead, then, of crippling our military power at this time, he thought we should make liberal appropriations to sustain and invigorate our Army and Navy, so as to be prepared for the worst consequences, at the same time we hope for the best.

When Mr. S. had concluded—

Mr. EUSTIS (chairman of the Military Committee) explained the views which had induced them to report the bill. The position, however, of the reporter, and other causes, precluded him from hearing his remarks distinctly, and, of course, an imperfect report only can be made or expected. He was understood to say that he was not disposed to urge the bill on the House; but, having reported it, it became his duty to explain and defend it. The real objections to which it was liable were those which had been urged by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. TATNALL,) and the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. POINSETT,) and if what had been said was true, that it went to destroy the staff of the Army without providing a substitute, he would agree that it ought to be rejected. Mr. E. then adverted to the subject in detail to show that the objection was not well founded. He would agree that the office of Adjutant General was indispensable, both as an office of the military records, to issue orders and to receive the returns. But he contended that the transfer which the bill contemplated was beneficial to the service. With respect to abolishing the office of Inspector General, he would go further than even the gentlemen were disposed in asserting its importance. It was indispensably necessary. And how were the duties of it to be performed? By detailing from the field officers of the Army to do that duty. But gentlemen contended that it should be done by a separate and distinct branch, and that officers detached for that duty from the line of the Army would be partial to their own corps. Had gentlemen adverted to the circumstances of the Revolutionary war? It had been stated that the Inspector General had the rank of Major General. Did they recollect the case of the Baron Steuben, who was not only the Inspector General, but a Major General, commanding a division? It was a well known fact, that, instead of relaxing, and being partial to his own command, he was more rigid with them, if possible, than with any others. They feared his eye more than that of any other inspector, and he was extremely vigilant to see that his command appeared as well at least as that of any in the Army. But it was objected that the officers would inspect their own regiments. With the exception, however, of those stationed at the Council Bluffs, near Pensacola, and at Sackett's Harbor, he believed there was no whole regiment at any one point in the country; and he apprehended no danger from any partiality the officers might feel towards their own commands—but on the contrary, believed, so far as it could have any influence, it would be an incitement to a more vigilant scrutiny. It was also objected that the officers would seek for popularity. He would grant it; but it was a popularity, he contended, that would consist in endeavors to please their superior officer, by making rigid inspections and faithful returns. It was also contended that this extra duty would take the field officers away from their proper duties; perhaps they would leave behind them as good officers as themselves. Mr. E. observed, that he wished to retain the Inspector General. He regarded his worth, his valor, and his intelligence; but they could not save every valuable officer, nor legislate for particular men. It was well known that there were many field officers from whom a selection might be made, with perfect convenience, and without the least detriment to the service, who were eminently qualified for this duty. With respect, also, to the talents and services of the Surgeon General, he fully agreed to all that had been said in his favor. But, if individual worth was to retain any man, there would be no reduction at all. The object, in this instance, was to detail a surgeon for the duty, and to save the expense of a separate bureau. The bill contained a provision for the Surgeon General, in a more subordinate station, indeed, but he hoped that gentleman would be disposed to accept it, when Congress thought proper to reduce the establishment. Mr. E. would admit that he did not think the calculation of saving was a primary object. He would agree that the staff of the Army was its main-spring and life, and he would not contribute to destroy a valuable department of it for twice the expense which it cost to maintain it; but could neither agree that the proposed reduction would injure the service, nor that it would not make a saving of money. With respect to the Quartermaster General, he would agree that, for an army of 6,000 men, he thought the rank of Colonel was as high as its extent would justify. He made honorable mention of the virtues and talents of that officer. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. STERLING,) had alluded to the gallant services of the Commander-in-Chief as a reason for retaining him. Mr. E. appreciated fully the services of that distinguished officer; but he contended, as a general principle, that neither the spirit of our country, nor the genius of our Government, would authorize the retaining of officers when their services were no longer wanted. Such were the views, and such was the practice of Washington. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. POINSETT) has objected to abolishing the additional pay annexed to rank by brevet. Mr. E. contended, however, as a matter of principle, that no officer, in time of peace, should receive additional compensation on that account. The present Brigadiers, it appeared, from documents on the table, were decided, by the Attorney General, to be entitled to the pay of Major Generals. But was such the intention of the law? Brevet officers were entitled to the distinction of their rank, but not to the pay of that rank. In respect to the alteration contemplated in the Inspection department, it had been further objected that the field officers would be taken temporarily and irregularly from the line. This he did not think could be the case; it could be done, and the officers would have to travel but little distance, whereas the Inspector General has to traverse a vast extent of country. Mr. E. believed that the present Inspector General could never be exceeded in the performance of his duty. He had only risen, however, to answer the objections that had been urged; and, should the bill be rejected, there was no one whom it would disturb less than himself. He would only add his belief, that, by the provisions contained in the bill, the command of the Army would be brought within a smaller compass, and under the more immediate inspection of the Secretary of War; and that, instead of the present circuitous course, all orders, returns, inspections, and informations, would pass in a direct line between the head to the most remote branches of service.

Mr. BASSETT asked for a division of the question, so as to have each section put separately.

Mr. WOODCOCK announced his intention, should the House refuse to strike out the first section, hereafter to propose some amendments thereto; when Mr. COCKE expressed a wish to make known his sentiments on the subject, and, the hour being late, he moved that the Committee rise and report progress; which was agreed to, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 16.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to set apart and dispose of certain public lands for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine and olive,'" reported the same without amendment, and it was ordered to be read a third time on Friday next.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion made and depending yesterday, viz. that five thousand additional copies of the report of the committee appointed to inquire whether any part of the public expenditures can be retrenched without detriment to the public service, &c. be printed for the use of the members of the House; when it was, on motion of Mr. COOK, ordered that the said motion lie on the table—ayes 62, noes 43.

Mr. BUTLER moved that the House do come to the following resolution viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be instructed to report such evidence or estimates as may be in their power, showing the annual amount and cost of the raw material consumed in any one or more branches of manufacture, the number of persons employed, the amount of wages paid, the amount of capital invested in, and the amount of the articles annually manufactured, and their market value.

The resolution being read, the question was taken, Will the House agree thereto? and was determined in the negative.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the joint resolution providing further security in the transmission of the public mails be discharged from the consideration thereof.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Military Affairs made on the 2d instant, in relation to the execution of the act of the 2d of March, 1821, to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States: whereupon, it was ordered that the said report be committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

The Committee of the Whole were discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution in relation to the use of Imlay's new invented patent for the security of the mail, and the same being laid on the table—

Mr. BATEMAN moved two amendments, the one to make it imperative upon, instead of discretionary with the Postmaster General to obtain and use the said improvement; and the other striking out the direction to pay the expense from the contingent funds of the Post Office Department; which were respectively adopted, and the resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. PATTERSON called for the consideration of the resolution, by him submitted some weeks since, making it the duty of the respective Departments, at the commencement of the next session, to report to this House whether any of the officers of the same are inefficient or can be dispensed with, &c.

The House agreed to consider the same.

Mr. RICH moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was lost—ayes 45, noes 56.

A verbal modification, suggested by Mr. FULLER, was agreed to; and, after remarks thereon by Mr. WALWORTH, Mr. COCKE, Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. PATTERSON, Mr. MALLARY, and Mr. CONDUCT, the question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. SCOTT, the House took into consideration a bill from the Senate concerning the location of certain lands in the State of Missouri. A discussion ensued upon ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading; the bill being supported by Mr. SCOTT and Mr. RANKIN, and opposed by Mr. COCKE and Mr. MCCOY; and, the question being taken, the engrossment was ordered—ayes 74. So the bill is to be read a third time.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, the House agreed to consider a bill from the Senate, supplementary to an act for the relief of purchasers of public lands prior to the first day of July, 1820; and, after a few remarks by Mr. RANKIN, explanatory of the necessity for the bill, and by Mr. MCCOY on the same side, the bill was read a third time, passed, and returned to the Senate.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the officers, volunteers, and other persons engaged in the Seminole campaign, was read a third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the relief of the representatives of John Donnelson, Thomas Carr, and others;" "An act to authorize the building of light-houses therein mentioned, and for other purposes;" "An act to repeal the fourteenth section of 'An act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment,' passed the 2d day of March, 1821;" "An act to authorize and empower the corporation of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, to drain the low grounds on and near the public reservations, and to improve and ornament certain parts of such reservations;" and "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Greenbury H. Murphy;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of the House.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill in addition to the act, entitled "An act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States."

The question recurred on striking out the first section of the bill—

Mr. COCKE remarked, that he understood the question before the Committee to be on striking out the first section of the bill. In examining the merits of this section, it would be proper, in the first place, to show that the remarks of the gentlemen who were in favor of it, were not tenable.

Mr. C. would agree, that the inspection of the Army ought to be kept up; and he would also admit that the duties of the Adjutant General should be performed; but he contended they should be done in such way as was consistent with the public good. He would never consent that a strict scrutiny into the conduct of our public servants, whether in the military or civil department, should be dispensed with. But, in the reduced state of our finances, it was proposed to examine and see if the public burdens could not be lessened without injury to the public service. Mr. C. would not legislate for men. He had as much confidence in the present incumbents as other gentlemen; but, if their services could be dispensed with, and the public sustain no injury, he thought it ought to be done. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. STERLING,) had contended that the Government should treat the officers with gratitude. Mr. C. would admit it in its fullest extent. But could an instance be pointed out in which it had not been grateful? If there has been, at any time, a vacancy in the civil department, have they not been the first persons selected to fill it? The only exception that he could remember was in the appointment of Commissioners under the Spanish Treaty. The officers, he thought, were the peculiar favorites of the Government. Yet he could not agree to keep any men in office longer than the public interest required. If the gentleman from New York (Mr. STERLING) could show any practical use or benefit in retaining the Major General, he (Mr. C.) would vote for retaining. He entertained for him a great personal respect. But can he have a command at any point? At the Council Bluffs there are about six hundred men; at Sackett's Harbor about five hundred; and at New York two or three companies. Is it necessary that we should have a Major General to command them? Shall he, then, be called on to discharge the duties of a command to which no force in the country is adequate? There is nothing for him to do, unless he also is made an Inspector. Almost all our superior officers have been made Inspectors. The two Brigadiers have lately returned from this service, in addition to the Inspector General. One reason which the gentleman has urged in favor of retaining the Major General is, that he is embarrassed in his pecuniary concerns, occasioned by his devotion to his country and his profession. Mr. C. would only say, that, if the fact were so, it was not his country that had embarrassed him. From the year 1817 to 1820, the Major General received upwards of $6,000, besides extras to the amount of upwards of $1,000 thousand dollars more. Last year, indeed, his compensation was reduced to about $4,500; but, with such liberal allowances, he thought the country could not be charged with contributing to his misfortunes. He, Mr. C., was as little disposed to make the Army inefficient as any gentleman on this floor, and, if it could be fully shown that the bill would do it a real injury, he would vote against it. But until that time he should support it. It was not necessary, at present, to bring into view the situation of the country. The state of the Treasury was well known to be such that we were compelled to resort to loans.

Mr. C. examined the details of the bill, and remarked, that, if it should pass, it would concentrate the military system to a point in the city of Washington. There would be, in fact, a reorganization of the whole Army. The gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. TATNALL,) contended that inspection was necessary, and that there was no provision for it in the bill. If this argument were founded in fact, it would be conclusive. But could not the inspection be as well and as faithfully done by officers detailed for that purpose, as by persons specially appointed? If the experiment should not prove beneficial, it would be easy to revert to the present system. The same might be said of the Adjutant General's department. It was less expensive, and worth the trial—and if, at the end of twelve months, it should be found injurious, there would be no difficulty in going back. It was always easier to create officers than to get clear of them. There was no sort of difficulty in getting the offices filled. Mr. C. expressed the most unlimited confidence in the integrity and correctness of the Inspector General, but, if the Government did not want his further services, he thought it was a sufficient reason why the office should be dispensed with. The expenses of transportation in that department, said Mr. C., are enormous, and we have two Inspectors, which was certainly more than was necessary. The Adjutant General is only the secretary of the Major General. He keeps a bureau at the Seat of Government, and a Brigadier might as well perform the duty. The Quartermaster and Subsistence departments must be kept up. In this, said Mr. C., we agree. All others in time of peace, should be reduced to the smallest number possible. It had been said that the science of the Army should be retained. Had not experience shown that this expectation was fallacious? Had we not a peace establishment before the last war? And what was the result? The old officers performed little or no service. It was the young officers who gained the battles. The old ones seemed to have forgotten all they had ever known. This bill, Mr. C. stated, would save about $110,000, and with the amendments contemplated it would save upwards of $400,000, which, in the present condition of our fiscal concerns, was not an unimportant saving.

The gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. TATNALL,) had objected that, in case of a Brigadier being ordered to a distant post, his place could not be supplied. But the bill provides for that contingency. He would not contend that the bill was perfect. In one particular he wished to amend it. But he was for going further than the bill in getting clear of the host of unemployed officers. That they are unemployed, your gallery daily and sufficiently shows. He hoped the Committee would not strike out this section of the bill. He would add one word with regard to the Surgeon General. He would admit that he had been a valuable officer; but, in calculating the retrenchments of this department, gentlemen had not taken into consideration the material reductions in the price of the supplies, which had contributed greatly to the result which had been stated.

Mr. J. SPEED SMITH replied in a speech of considerable length.

Mr. WOODCOCK said that it was with great deference that he had proposed the amendments to the bill now before the Committee, a bill drawn by the honorable the chairman of the Committee of Military Affairs, (Mr. EUSTIS,) a gentleman in whose military experience he had the greatest confidence. But, believing as he did, that the present organization of the peace establishment was too expensive for its utility, and that the bill, as reported, would not remedy the evil, he felt it his duty to propose the amendments, and briefly submit his views on the subject. His object was not to destroy the Army, as had been alleged, but retain such an establishment, and such an one only, as was sufficient in time of peace, and such only as could be brought within the compass of a reasonable expense. Mr. W. observed, that it had been stated, and stated correctly, that the property of the United States belonging to the War Department, was scattered over the various parts of the Union, and that it should be preserved; our military depots guarded, and our frontier protected. He admitted the principle to the full extent, and whatever might be the expense of an army, sufficient for all these purposes, he would retain; but beyond that he did not believe an army in time of peace useful. He considered it at war with our Constitution, and the genius of our Government to keep an army, when we were at peace with the whole world, in anticipation that we may have a war; and such is the arguments of the gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. We have been told that it is necessary to retain officers beyond what is wanted for the existing establishment, that our country may receive the benefit of their military skill, should they be engaged in another war. Again, we are told that gratitude for those who have fought our battles, and defended our country, requires us to retain them in office, even if their services are not required. Mr. W. said, he had mistaken the characters of the officers of the last war, if that was the kind of gratitude they asked. Sir, the examples of those brave men, who fought your battles in the Revolution is not forgotten; the same spirit which actuated them, and led to victory, inspired the officers and soldiers of the late war, to return to private life when their services were no longer useful to their country, and always ready when their services should be required, again to take the sword and defend your liberties; and they ask the same gratitude, not an office, by the way of pension, but the blessings of a free people, and remembrance in the day of adversity. Office, said Mr. W., should be created and filled for the benefit of the nation, not the individual. Neither, in his opinion, ought Government to retain a single officer on the principle that we may have a war, and may want their service. The gentleman, my colleague, (Mr. STERLING,) has called our attention to Greece and Rome for example.

Mr. W. said he wanted no examples from Greece or Rome, either for our military or civil institutions; our habits, situation, and Government, is different. But should it, as the gentlemen say, again be our misfortune to have another war, we have the materials for a sufficient army always at hand. They are to be found in every State in the Union, and he had rather take a man from his farm, or merchandise, to command an army, than he who held the rank of an officer, without the service. If you retain officers, give them service, for he who is an officer but in name, and is not required to perform the duty attached to the office, in a few years becomes worthless to himself, and useless to his country. If, said Mr. W., we must retain supernumerary officers, not required for the present service, he should recommend placing them in the Military Academy, where they might undergo a rigid discipline, lead an active life, and retain at least habits of industry, and the theory of war. Mr. W. adverted to the appeal which his friend, Mr. S. had so eloquently made to the gratitude and good feeling of this House, in favor of the Major General, who, by the provisions of the bill, as reported, is to be dispensed with. Mr. W. expressed his personal respect for that officer; he had known and admired him; the best feelings of his heart were in his favor, but he must separate his official duties from his personal feelings; he came to legislate for his country, not for individuals; and he thought his friend, Mr. S., had mistaken the high and honorable feelings of the hero of Niagara and Chippewa, if he supposed that he would condescend to accept a compensation from his country for services no longer required.

Mr. W. said, he would be the last who would say to the officers who have fought your battles, retire, if they could be beneficially employed in the service. This was not his object, but to keep in service those only who could be thus employed. He was in favor of retaining the Adjutant, Inspector, and Surgeon Generals; that the officers at the head of these departments should be retained, he had no doubt. If you keep an army, give each department a competent officer at its head; for without that, your whole system is destroyed. On this point he should not dwell. That amendment which he had the honor to propose had been adopted, and he thought the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. TATNALL) on that part of the bill conclusive. But, that the regiments and companies should be consolidated, this skeleton system done away, and the supernumerary officers disbanded, he had no doubt. Your Army, as now organized, consists of four regiments of artillery, nine companies each, and seven regiments of infantry, ten companies each. To these regiments and companies, you have more than four hundred commissioned officers—this without your staff, and when the strength of your Army, including your general staff, corps of engineers, officers of ordnance, academic staff, and the cadets of the military academy, is but five thousand seven hundred and seventy-four. Out of this number there is but about four thousand privates, giving about four hundred to each regiment; and to your regiments of artillery, forty-eight commissioned officers; infantry, thirty-three. Mr. W. would ask whether these officers could be all usefully employed? For one, he thought not, and if not, he must have other and better reasons assigned, to convince him this amendment ought not to be adopted. We have, but forty-six military posts; at some of these there are stationed but three and five men. Officers cannot be required, unless to recruit, where there is not a sufficient number of men for a corporal's guard; and will you not have a sufficient number of officers should you consolidate your regiments and companies agreeable to the amendments which he had submitted? It cannot be denied that, for every purpose, either to discipline your men, guard your posts, superintend your military depots, or take care of your property, you will have officers sufficient. There is but one argument in favor of a skeleton army. It is, as he had before observed, to have your army so organized that you can expand it in case of a war; and to support this principle, the opponents of the amendment are compelled to resort to this argument: keep your officers in service; give them pay whether you can employ them or not; for, should they retire to private life, to habits of industry, and become our most useful citizens, they will lose all military science, and forget the art of war; and should our country again be engaged in war, and their services again required, they will tell you, "We were driven from the Army; you must call on other men to fight your battles." This is an imputation upon those brave men which they do not deserve. Mr. W. said he hazarded nothing in saying, the officer who ought to be retained on any system, who, should he be discharged from the service by the adoption of the amendment, will not thank you to retain him in your peace establishment any longer than you have duties for him to perform. It has been asked by my friend, (Mr. STERLING,) will you drive men from the service who have made military science their profession—who know no other business, and who are fit for no other? And if, said Mr. W., he understood the gentleman, "will you cut their heads off?" The gentleman and myself differ as to the character of those officers who would be of any use to us in the event of a war. The man who is useless, and worth nothing in private life, is worth but very little in public—yes, so little, he had better be out of the Army than in. Mr. W. was unwilling to believe there was any, he hoped not any, of that character in the Army.

But he who is fit to command your army, is fit and willing to retire to private life when his country no longer requires his service. For the truth of this, he should not appeal to Greece and Rome; he would call the attention of the gentleman to the close of the Revolution; there he will find men, whose names are identified with the liberty of our country, who retired to private life. Neither they nor their friends (when I say friends, I mean the people of the United States) understood the doctrine that officers were to be retained on a Peace Establishment, to build on in case of war.

Military Peace Establishment.

H. OF R.

This doctrine is of more recent date; it was first taught in 1797 and 1798, when the French were on the eve of invading our country. It was then thought necessary to have an army of officers without men: and, had the French landed on our shores, the skeleton army would have expanded to a host, and protected every foot of our territory from the invader. Fortunately, the French thought it advisable to keep the other side of the Atlantic. The army of officers were disbanded, and you hear no more of them until the last session of Congress. Then Congress became alarmed that Spain might not ratify the treaty ceding to us the Floridas. It was found necessary to have another army of officers without men. When it was understood that the treaty was ratified—that the Floridas were ours—no army wanting to take them—it was to be hoped there would be no longer a pretext for keeping this skeleton system. But new dangers are foreseen. The late recognition of the Spanish provinces may lead to a war; and the storm of war is foreseen in every part of the political horizon; and it is with triumph asked, will you destroy your little army on the eve of a war? Will you invite aggression by destroying all means of defence? Mr. W. observed that he would neither destroy the Army nor invite aggression or invasion; he would render the Army useful by retaining only those who could be usefully employed. But he must be pardoned for refusing to give full faith to the political wisdom of those gentlemen whose prophetic eye always discovered danger when you propose any reduction in the expenses of your Government.

We may have war, and, should it come, he trusted his country would be able to meet it, and again maintain our rights. The defence of your country is in her citizens and her free institutions. Let your citizens have confidence in your Government, and they want no standing armies in time of peace. Let them know that your Government is administered with prudence and economy; that the system you are pursuing will not entail on them and their posterity a national debt; and they will defend your rights. A well-organized militia is their motto. And believe me, said Mr. W., I had rather nearly an half million in your Treasury, which must be annually spent in the pay of your supernumerary officers, should be appropriated towards the payment of your national debt.

Mr. W. said he might be called a Radical, for wishing to adopt a system of economy in the several departments. He was indifferent as to names. But it was a fact, and not to be disguised, that all the money we could save would be wanted to meet the payments of our national debt, as fast as it became due.

But a few weeks had elapsed when the bill for the exchange of stock was before us, which bill was nothing more nor less than obtaining a credit of eight or ten years for a part of our national debt. And is there a gentleman in this Committee who would have voted for that bill, did he believe that we could safely calculate on our revenue to meet those debts at the time they would fall due, without resorting to loans or a direct tax? For one, he would not.

The advocates for that bill were frank in saying it was to get more time to meet those debts, that we might hereafter have an increase of revenue, and, by deferring the payment, we should not be compelled to resort to a loan or tax. Do gentlemen think, when they talk of war, and see the storm gathering, that it will bring you commerce and revenue? The same gale will not waft us both. It is easy to talk of war when your army is to be reduced, and of commerce and revenue when means are proposed to meet the expenditures of your Government. These visionary schemes will not do. If Congress cannot be convinced, the tax-gatherer will convince the people, and they will speak a language that must and will be heard and understood in this Hall.

Mr. W. observed that his remarks had been desultory. It was his wish that his views in proposing the amendment might be distinctly understood. He did not intend to reduce the effective strength of the Army. It will, with the number of men now in service, put seventy-two privates into each company, and ten companies into a regiment, and gives the same officers to your regiments and companies which are now in service by the present arrangement. There will be two hundred and eighteen commissioned officers, exclusive of your staff, your engineer corps, and ordnance department. This number appeared to him amply sufficient to command your four thousand privates, and enough to be stationed at your forty-six military posts. This arrangement disbands the officers of two regiments of artillery and sixteen companies, three regiments of infantry and thirty companies; and will save annually in the expense of the Army, including the saving by the other sections of the bill, a sum not less than $402,000; and the amendment now proposed a sum over $350,000.

Mr. W. said that he agreed with the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. TATNALL) that the bill, as reported, is better calculated to disorganize than organize your army. Impressed with that belief, and that the good of the Army required that the officers of the several departments should be retained, he moved the amendment to the first section of the bill.

It is now for the Committee to say whether they will adopt this amendment—whether they will retain supernumerary officers on a peace establishment to build on in case of war, or whether they will consolidate the regiments and companies, and retain such officers as are necessary for all purposes in time of peace, and at a saving of nearly an half a million of dollars annually. Mr. W. said he had been told that prejudices existed against the Army. He disclaimed any; and, if he had prejudices, they were against an useless expenditure, and not the Army.

When Mr. W. had concluded—

Mr. McDUFFIE said, the gentleman from New York (Mr. WOODCOCK) had presented to the Committee a project, by which he promised to realize extraordinary results. But he thought the gentleman would experience the fate of all projectors; and that his calculations, by which he had deceived himself, and unintentionally misled the Committee, would be found, upon examination, to be altogether fallacious. He said that he, too, had consulted documents and made calculations. And though he admitted that his were partly conjectural, as all calculations must be on this subject, yet he would venture to say that they approached as near the reality as those of the gentleman. The gentleman proposes, said he, to effect an annual saving of four hundred and forty or fifty thousand dollars by consolidating the regiments of artillery and infantry. This consolidation would have the effect of destroying the existing proportion between the officers and men, and of disbanding considerably less than one-half of the commissioned officers. Now, said he, the whole annual expenditure for the pay and rations of all the commissioned officers in the artillery and infantry, amounts only to but little more than three hundred and twelve thousand dollars. If to this we add one hundred and twenty thousand dollars, for contingent allowances, it will amount to something less than the gentleman proposes to save by a partial reduction! By what principles of calculation a part could be made to cost more than the whole, it was for the gentleman to explain. But, Mr. McD. said, he had minutely calculated the pay and rations of all the commissioned officers proposed to be disbanded, and they amounted to less than one hundred thousand dollars; and, if even fifty per cent. were added for contingencies, the gentleman's four hundred and fifty thousand dollars would dwindle into one hundred and fifty. But, said he, it is a very mistaken supposition that even this sum will be saved by the proposed consolidation. The gentleman has entirely overlooked the fact, that all the subordinate officers of the administrative branches of the staff are filled by details from the subalterns of the line.

What gentlemen improperly denominate the supernumeraries of the Army, are not, therefore, unemployed. They are efficiently and profitably employed in performing those functions by which the expenditure of the Army has been so extensively economized since the present organization has been fairly in operation. He would not pretend to speak with absolute precision, but he should hazard nothing in asserting, that at least one-half of the subalterns of the line, which the gentleman's amendment would throw out of service, were engaged in the performance of staff duties—equally indispensable to the efficiency and economy of a Military Peace Establishment; and for which officers must be provided, to whatever point of depression we may carry the general reduction of the Army. What then, said he, will be the consequence of disbanding the officers detailed from the line to perform these duties? A saving of expenditure? No, sir, but a change of the officers who are the objects of it. And the only difference would be, that we should have those duties badly performed, at the same expense, by officers who have no rank in the line, divested of all military pride and military experience. To this extent, therefore, he said he might safely say that the scheme of consolidation would produce positive and uncompensated evil; change without improvement, and derangement without economy. But, said he, there is still another source of delusion in the gentleman's calculation. His proposed object was to bring back the relative proportion between the officers and men, to the standard of the Peace Establishment of 1802. But, if he will extend his calculations a little further, he will find that his amendment will reduce the relative number of officers much lower than it was even in Mr. Jefferson's Peace Establishment. In that Establishment there were sixty-four men to a company of infantry, and fifty-six to a company of artillery, making an average of sixty men to the company. Now, if we divide the whole number of the present Peace Establishment, by the number of companies proposed to be retained, we shall find that each company will contain at least ninety men; fifty per cent. more than the number that constituted a company in Mr. Jefferson's Peace Establishment. If, then, we do not carry the consolidation principle farther than it has been carried in any former Administration, it will be found that this magnificent scheme of saving will almost entirely vanish. In fact, said Mr. McD., the gentleman has alarmed himself, and perhaps the Committee, by exhibiting the fearful aggregate of more than fourteen hundred officers; not reflecting that two-thirds of this number were officers of the ordnance and engineer corps and non-commissioned officers. No man would propose to abolish any part of either of those corps, for, if we had not ten privates in the Army, it would be on all hands admitted that they must be retained. The whole number of commissioned officers in the artillery and infantry, upon which alone the amendment can operate, is four hundred and twenty-seven.

But, sir, said he, I have now done with the calculations of the gentleman from New York, and must solicit the attention of the Committee to topics of infinitely greater importance. The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. JOHNSON) seems to be quite alarmed at the idea of having any military knowledge in the country in time of peace, and exhorts us to place our entire reliance on the militia in the event of a war. These fatal and delusive doctrines, he said, which were but too extensively prevalent, demanded the most serious refutation. A great question is now presented to us, and we should approach it with a gravity proportioned to its magnitude. We are called upon to determine what shall be the policy, the permanent and settled policy of this Government in time of peace, in reference to those great national exigencies which must inevitably grow out of our relations with the other Powers of the world. The theory of our Government is almost completely adjusted; and the embarrassing difficulties which have been experienced in the practical operation of our system, have almost entirely passed away. But that remains to be determined, which is not less important, whether, by a liberal and enlightened policy, we shall sustain the high rank in the great society of nations, for which Providence seems to have formed us; or by disregarding the dictates of wisdom, and the impressive admonitions of our own experience, sink into feebleness and contempt, putting to hazard all that is dear to us, and all that is interesting to the friends of human freedom throughout the world. There is not, said he, on earth, a nation occupying so important and responsible a station as the United States. The only established Republic in existence, she is charged with the maintenance of those great principles, which are destined, as I firmly believe, to overthrow every despotism in the civilized world. Sir, they do not know the people of this country, who suppose them to be actuated by a spirit of narrow parsimony, and that they will not cheerfully bear all the burdens necessary to sustain the character of the nation, and vindicate her rights. It is a slander upon them to suppose that they will not pay the price of their liberty, by making the sacrifices necessary to defend it. You could not offer a greater insult to an American, than to ask him whether, when the rights and the honor of his country are assailed, he would count the cost of defending them. I beseech gentlemen to consider the character of the people they are about to disarm. No people on earth are more high-minded or more prompt to resent an insult or an injury. They possess, in an eminent degree, that lofty sense of national honor, without which no nation can be either respectable or happy. And it is for this people, rising rapidly to greatness, and having in their political institutions, as well as in their commercial relations, never ending sources of jealousy and collision, with the great Powers of the civilized world, that we are called upon to adopt a policy which nothing could justify but the prospect of an eternal peace. By a strange infatuation, we seem to be as prompt to adopt measures that may produce war, as we are reluctant to prepare for it. What a scene did we exhibit but the other day, when the question of recognising the independence of Spanish provinces was presented to us? How did we then reason? Were there any cold calculations of probable danger? We saw nothing but a brave and oppressed people, who had been for years struggling with difficulties, which they had at length almost surmounted. We were asked if we would receive them with a fraternal embrace and introduce them into the society of nations? The heart of every American responded in the affirmative. Then, indeed, we were all Americans. With a noble disinterestedness we unanimously adopted a measure, to which we were stimulated by no prospect of gain, and which may seriously jeopardize the peace of the country. I will not say that I believe it will produce a war with Spain. I incline to believe, on the contrary, that it will not. But it would be blindness to say there is no danger. For, though Spain is feeble and distracted, and could promise herself nothing from a war with this country, yet, with the encouragement and secret aid of other Powers, she might carry on a desolating war upon our commerce. And there is one Power in Europe that will be prompted both by political feeling and commercial interest, to foment a war between this country and Spain. It cannot be disguised, however we may lament it, that America and Great Britain are destined to entertain towards each other feelings of rivalry, approaching almost to hostility and hatred.

Every historical recollection and every anticipation of our future greatness, all that is past and all that is to come, warn us that these two nations, the dissevered members of the same empire, are destined to be the Rome and Carthage of modern times. From sources the most authentic, from every respectable writer and every respectable witness, we are assured that there is but one thing in which all classes and all political parties in Great Britain concur; and that is, a deep and settled feeling of hostility to the Americans. The very name is execrated. And what is the fact in relation to ourselves? What is the first lesson which the father instils into the infant mind of his son? It is, that when he grows up to be a man, he must fight the British. I do not mention this with a view of being responsible for its philosophical correctness, but for the purpose of showing what the fact really is, in relation to the mutual feelings of the two countries. And will any man flatter himself that those feelings, unlike all the other strong sentiments of the human heart, will remain forever inactive? But, upon mere commercial principles, Great Britain has much to gain from a war between the United States and Spain. Such a war would throw the whole carrying trade, and most of the direct trade now enjoyed by us, into the hands of Great Britain. For, however contemptible we may consider the naval power of Spain, her privateers and ships of war could so annoy our commerce that the enhanced price of insurance would drive our shipping from the ocean, and leave Great Britain in the undisturbed enjoyment of a monopoly. Sir, said he, it is under these circumstances that we have recognised the independence of the Spanish American provinces; a measure in every respect just and magnanimous, but certainly not characterized by a cold and calculating prudence. And yet this is the moment gentlemen have selected, with what consistency it is not for me to determine, for destroying entirely the utility of the Army, considered as a preparation for war. For, I shall hereafter show that the present organization of the Army is of the very essence of a Peace Establishment; viewed in reference to war, the only object which can justify its maintenance. But we are told that the militia are capable of defending us, and that this nation ought to be taught to rely wholly upon that species of force. Sir, I do declare, upon my conscience and before God, that there is not, in my opinion, amidst all the heresies incident to this young nation, a more fatal delusion than this. We may trace its origin partly to an injudicious and indiscriminating application of general maxims against standing armies in time of peace, and partly to our classical recollections. Greece and Rome, the nations of antiquity with whose history we are most familiar, and whose achievements we most admire, were nations of soldiers. War was their trade ; rapine and plunder the sources of their public and private revenue. The whole mass of their population was trained, by perpetual wars, to the use of arms. In a word, the whole nation was a standing army ; and such was the rude simplicity of the art of war, that, not only was every citizen a soldier, but almost every soldier was capable of commanding. Hence, the provision in the Roman laws that prohibited the consul from commanding the armies of the republic two years in succession, was productive of no great inconvenience, though, in the organization of modern armies, such a regulation would be utterly absurd and ruinous. And hence, also, the absence of standing armies, distinct from the great body of the community. The defence of the republic was left, not to untrained militia, but to citizen soldiers, drawn out by conscription or voluntarily rushing to their favorite pursuit. But the habits, the pursuits, the propensities, and the entire structure of modern society, are precisely the reverse of all this. Our occupations are essentially peaceful. Each individual is dedicated to the pursuit of his own private interests, and in this way, most effectually contributes to the grand aggregate of national wealth, power, and happiness. This is eminently the case in the United States ; and the very essence of the freedom of which we are so justly boastful, is the security and the safety with which the citizen pursues his occupation. Now, if we abandon the idea of defending the country by a standing army, we must be inevitably driven into the conscription system—a system wholly inconsistent with the state of our society—a system at once intolerably oppressive to the people, and absolutely insufficient for the great purposes of national defence. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. CANNON) to admit, distinctly, the consequence which I have stated as resulting from his position, and to maintain the policy of the conscription system. I think a slight examination will dispel this delusion. One would suppose that no man would deny the general proposition, that, whether the country shall be defended by conscripts or regulars, they must be trained and placed under the command of skilful officers. To deny this, would be to set at defiance every dictate of reason and every lesson of experience. War, in its present state, is the most complex and difficult of all arts. There is none so extensive in its elements and so infinite in its combinations, requiring so perfect a union of theory and practice. There is scarcely any limit to the increase of physical power which an army may derive from training. There was, perhaps, never an army on earth, not excepting those of Frederic the Great, or of Napoleon, that might not have been visibly improved by longer training and more experience. Then, how perfectly idle is it for us to imagine we can, with untrained militia, led by inexperienced and unskilful officers, encounter with success the disciplined troops of other nations ? This would be denying the efficacy of experience and practice in an art whose whole power depends upon them. While then other nations keep up a certain state of military skill and discipline, it would be madness in us to neglect it. Then what is the consequence ? According to the views of the gentleman from Tennessee, we must train, in time of peace, our entire population. This result cannot be avoided. And thus, instead of a standing army of six thousand, we should substantially maintain one of nearly as many millions.

Sir, such a scheme, besides that it would be harassing beyond endurance, either in peace or in war, is utterly visionary and impracticable. You cannot train a nation of freemen, of the education and habits of the Americans, to the exact and slavish discipline of soldiers in time of peace ; and if you could, it would be the most expensive and ruinous preparation for war that could be devised. Disregarding the great principle of the division of labor, it would disturb all the relations and pursuits of society, and render peace but little preferable to war. So that we are driven back to the question, Whether we shall maintain a Military Peace Establishment, organized for war, and susceptible of the utmost expansion in that event, or rely upon the militia, without training and without competent officers, for the first two or three years of every war ? We have heard much of the bravery of the militia, and no man will go farther than I will in doing justice to their gallantry and devotion. I rejoice in the exalted character of my countrymen, and indulge the proud belief that there is not on earth so brave and so generous a population. But they will not thank gentlemen, I am sure, for that sort of kindness which praises and then sacrifices them. When the country shall be involved in difficulty and embarrassment ; when our soil shall be contaminated by the foot of an invader, who can doubt that every American would nobly and fearlessly encounter every danger, and sustain every burden, demanded by the safety and honor of the Republic ? But what is the just inference ? Because they are brave, shall we send them to be slaughtered in an unequal conflict with the trained legions of European despots ? Because they are devoted, shall we offer up their blood in disastrous and unprofitable battles, where all their heroism cannot save the arms of the Republic from discomfiture and disgrace ? Sir, it is a cruel policy thus to tax the noble virtues of this people—to graduate the suffering and the sacrifices to which you expose them by their disposition to sustain them. And, after all they shall suffer, they will not even have the consolation to reflect that their sufferings have saved their country from desolation. You may find victims in abundance ready for the altar ; you may build a wall of the dead bodies of our slaughtered countrymen, but you cannot by that means secure and defend the country. What, sir, was our experience in the late war ? The blood is hardly cold that was so wastefully shed in that contest, and we are called upon to disregard its solemn admonitions. Even here, in the seat of legislation, we are surrounded with monuments, at once of the Gothic ferocity of our enemy and of our own disaster and disgrace, and, before the marks of the spoiler are effaced, we seem to have lost all recollection of what we have suffered. After the experience of the late war, there was but one opinion among the statesmen who had been most active in its prosecution. They were convinced that the honor and safety of the country demanded that we should assume a respectable attitude of defence. The nation demanded it. And, sir, if the present Administration, regardless of the lessons of our past experience, had not pursued their present policy, but left the country unarmed and defenceless, how heavy and awful would have been their responsibility in the event of another war! The blood of the brave, the tears of the widow, and the cries of the orphan, would have risen in judgment against them. I do most solemnly protest against this cold-hearted economy, which, to save a dollar, would sacrifice the life of a freeman. I protest against this vacillating policy, vibrating from one extreme to another, and which, to avoid those burdens which we can easily bear in peace, causes millions of money and torrents of blood to be squandered in vain in time of war. This is the fatal weakness against which every nation ought to guard. We are too apt to imagine that what now is, will always continue, and to neglect, consequently, all preparation for the storm, 'till its desolation has commenced. This is the weakness of children. But even they will not put their hands a second time in the fire, and I trust we shall not act less wisely. I will venture to assert that no nation ever suffered as much as did the United States in the late war, if we take into consideration the duration of the war, the geographical position of the country, and its latent capacities for such a conflict. And how unjust is that policy which throws the whole weight of suffering upon that disastrous period which is least capable of sustaining it. In war we tax the people, though their commerce is destroyed, and the productions of their industry perish on their hands. And yet in peace we are to make no preparation to mitigate the shock.

But preparation is not only necessary to enable us to prosecute a war with success, but it is the most effectual means of preserving peace. We invite aggression by being unprepared to repel it. No truth is more fully established than this by our own experience. What was the condition of this nation before the late war with Great Britain? From about the year 1806 or '7, no high-minded nation ever suffered so deeply and patiently. It was unmixed and unmitigated suffering—the privations of war, without its consolations. Why was it inflicted, and why did we endure it? Because, sir, we were not prepared to redress our wrongs. Our enemy knew this. He was as well apprized of our situation as we were ourselves. And how did he reason? Why, said he, "I will cut off this branch of their trade, and see how they will bear it." And we, making a cold calculation of profit and loss, said, "This is not worth defending by war." Finding us tame and submissive, he lopped off another branch of our trade, and we still submitted, because a war would cost more than we could gain by it. And thus one aggression prepared the way for another, until we reached the lowest point of national degradation. At length the wounded spirit of an indignant people called for war. And what were we then told upon this floor? That, though our commerce was swept from the ocean, and thousands of our citizens were held in disgraceful bondage, we ought to submit patiently, and trust to the magnanimity of our enemy, because we were unprepared to defend our rights and avenge our wrongs! If we had commenced a formal preparation for war, I doubt not the enemy would have retracted. And if we should hereafter pursue the wretched policy of preparing for war, after we have received the injury which justifies it, we shall be the sport of every nation that can gain by destroying our commerce. For they will continue their aggressions till we are prepared to obtain redress, and then will abstain till we have again disarmed ourselves. That Great Britain did not pursue this course, I ascribe to her firm belief, to the very last, that we would not go to war unprepared. But, unprepared as we were, we rushed fearlessly into the conflict. The nation resolved nobly to hazard every thing to redeem its character. And what confirms my views of British policy, the edicts by which our commerce was annihilated, and which were the prominent causes of the war, were soon repealed after it commenced. But, having commenced the war, we determined to persevere till all our rights were secured. By the favor of Providence we succeeded; but, when I look back upon the sufferings we endured, and the perils we escaped, I pray to God that I may never see my country again involved in a crisis so awful.

But we are told of the dangers of a standing army in time of peace. Sir, if a standing army is at all dangerous, it is not in peace, but in war, that our fears should be excited. And the more unprepared the nation is at the beginning of the war, the less military knowledge there is diffused through the country, the greater will be the danger. When a country is weakened by disasters, and humbled by disgrace; when all the ordinary means of safety have failed, then is she driven by desperation to confide the utmost power, and offer the most unbounded homage, to some great military chieftain who shall rise up to redeem her from approaching ruin. Then, sir, even gratitude is dangerous. What was the fact in the late war? The military engrossed all the admiration, the rewards, and the honors of society. No one was heard of but the brave and heroic defenders of the country. But how are they now treated? With cold neglect and cruel contempt, as mere outcasts from society. Yes, those to whom, in the hour of danger, we almost bent the knee of homage, scarcely receive naked justice at our hands. If this is wise, it is certainly not consistent. But it shows clearly that our army is not dangerous in peace. The only objection to an army in peace is, the expense of maintaining it; and I shall now proceed to show that, whether we regard economy or the efficiency of a Peace Establishment, the present organization ought to be preserved. In this view of the subject, the question is, what organization will, at a given expense, give us the greatest capacity for war? It must be admitted, by every one, that the success of modern wars principally depends upon the skill of the commanders. And it is equally clear that, to form officers, much time is required, in comparison with what will be sufficient to train common soldiers. We have been told that, in the late war, the officers of the former Peace Establishment obtained no distinction.

Gentlemen are mistaken in point of fact. Have they forgotten the names of Scott, who was among the first to carry the terror of our arms into the frontiers of the enemy?—of Gaines, whom we shall long remember as the hero of Fort Erie? and of thirty others who signalized their skill during every period of the war? But even if the fact were as gentlemen suppose, I would not admit their inference. No historical events could convince me that, as a general rule, officers can be created without much study and long experience. To be sure, as gentlemen say, we have materials enough to make officers, if this could be done by the mere imposition of hands, or the investiture of a red coat. I know we have had many such officers; but we have found from experience that a red coat does not always give assurance that there is an officer and a soldier under it. Gentlemen really talk as if we had only to stamp on the earth, and not only armed men, but trained armies, would rise up to defend us. The hero of New Orleans has been held up as a prop to a falling argument. But Jackson is a man of extraordinary genius, and nothing can be more unwise and unphilosophical than to draw general conclusions from a military prodigy. Taking it for granted then, that skilful and experienced officers are indispensable, and that it is the work of years to make them; it will follow that the extent of your capacity for war depends upon the number of competent officers. Hence the importance of maintaining in peace the skeleton system, by which the Military Establishment can be promptly increased to double its present number without appointing a single new officer, or changing in any respect the organization of the Army. It will only be necessary to place a new recruit by the side of each regular soldier, and by this simple operation the work is completed. And it is admitted that in three months, raw soldiers thus thrown in, can be adequately trained. Thus our present establishment gives a capacity for war, equal to what we should derive from twelve thousand men upon a war establishment. Nothing is more certain than that the present organization is the most economical, as it gives us a given military preparation for little more than half the sum it would cost, if the regiments and companies were kept full, as proposed by the gentleman from New York. While on the subject of economy, I will advert to a single fact, to show the effect of false economy. I believe it can be shown that fifty millions of dollars were wastefully expended in the late war, for the want of such an organization as we now have. If this sum were converted into a permanent fund, the interest of it would maintain, forever, a much larger Peace Establishment than the present! Yes, sir, the fact cannot be too deeply impressed, that in a little more than two years of war, the mistaken system into which gentlemen would now carry us, besides the cost of blood, subjected the nation to the actual loss of a sum which would support an army of ten thousand men for as many centuries. I do then beseech gentlemen, by every consideration, to reflect upon the consequences of the proposed reduction. I beseech them by the lessons of history, by the bloody record of our own disastrous experience, and above all, by the precept of the Father of this Republic; a great and venerable name, destined, I firmly believe, to reclaim us from a downward and degenerate policy, where even reason shall fail. For, of all the great men in America, WASHINGTON alone will be found, "in war and in peace," to have been "wise unto salvation."

When Mr. W. had concluded—

Some remarks ensued in relation to the effect of the question before the House, in which Messrs. RHEA, SMITH of Maryland, TAYLOR, and WILLIAMS of North Carolina, took part.

Mr. COLDEN took a general view of the subject, in opposition to the bill.

Mr. COCKE would vote for the amendment of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. WOODCOCK,) although it did not fully meet his views of the subject.

The question was then taken, and the motion of Mr. WOODCOCK was carried by a large majority.

Mr. WRIGHT spoke in favor of the amendment of Mr. WOODCOCK.

The question then recurred upon striking out the first section as amended.

Mr. RHEA said he was in favor of retaining the first section of the bill under consideration. This bill proposes further to reduce the Army. We have been told to give pensions to officers by way of office. Magnanimous, high-minded men, such as the officers of the Army of the United States are, will not continue in service on such condition; if their country does not desire their service, they will not desire to continue in it. Very pathetic appeals, in strong language, have been made; attempts are made to enlist our feelings in this case. The day of feeling on such subjects is gone by—two laws have been enacted by Congress to reduce the Army of the United States. By the act of the 3d of March, 1815, entitled "An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," the Army was reduced to ten thousand men—that was the day of feeling; in virtue of that act thousands of brave meritorious officers and soldiers were dismissed from the service—that was the time of feeling, when we were about to say farewell to thousands of those gallant men who victoriously drove the enemy from our country. I remember (said Mr. R.) when that bill was under consideration, attempts were made to have a section in the law providing that a portion of land might be given, in proportion to rank, to every officer who, by that act, would be deranged; but a provision of that kind could not obtain. By that refusal the feelings of several members were outraged, but we had to bear it; at that time we were told that every thing promised was given. The law of the 3d of March, 1821, made a further reduction of the Army; by that law many meritorious officers and soldiers, and among them he who, under the Almighty, directed the energies of this nation against the enemy at New Orleans, and who, with the troops under his command, on the 8th of January, 1815, gained a victory over that enemy—a victory unequalled in ancient or modern times—were legislated out of service. Feelings were high at the time these two laws were enacted, but they were enacted; and what was the reason? The state of things in this nation required their enactment. I remember, said Mr. R., that, when the act of 1815, fixing the Military Peace Establishment, was under consideration in the House of Representatives, a member from Massachusetts urged a reduction of the Army to less than three thousand men, and it was with difficulty that ten thousand men were retained on the Establishment.

It has been asked, what has been done for the officers and soldiers of the Army? To this, it has been answered, that every thing promised has been paid. Congress made ample provision by giving a bounty in land—one quarter section to each soldier who enlisted under the first act, and one half section to each soldier who enlisted under the second act, for five years or during the war; besides bounty in money, subsistence, pay, and clothing; all these things the soldiers merited. The United States of America have always bountifully rewarded the officers and soldiers of their Army. Witness the law giving pensions to officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army. But it is intimated that the bounty land given to the soldiers is not good; if that be true, it is not to be ascribed to the Government. Congress provided by law that the bounty land be fit for cultivation; if it is not, some mode will be adopted to discover how that is, and who has been the cause of it.

It is often urged that, to preserve peace, a nation must be prepared for war. On this proposition an inquiry arises—at what time will war be? What is the adequate measure of preparation? The existing nations of Europe, great and powerful several of them, in themselves, and respectively contiguous to, and surrounded by, powerful nations, are compelled, by the principle of self-preservation, to retain and keep large and numerous standing armies in time of peace; other reasons, showing why the ruling powers of the nations of Europe are compelled to keep large and numerous standing armies in time of peace, can be stated. The existence of standing armies in Europe did not always obtain—the overflowing nations of the north, in the decline of the Roman Empire, poured their swarms from the northern hive into the provinces of that Empire, and even into Italy itself, and ultimately rending in pieces that Empire, established new governments thereon, bottomed on the feudal system. The power of the leaders, and of those named barons, became obnoxious to the chief. Jealousies arose, and finally the power of the barons was put down by various ways, and the power of the chief became paramount; to maintain that power, as well at home as abroad, standing armies became necessary; and, although but little at the beginning, they have increased greatly in Europe, and at this time are deemed necessary to keep in subjection the unarmed million, and to support power over those called subjects, and to perpetuate their subjection. Between Governments east of the Atlantic, and that of the United States of America, there is no similitude—east of the Atlantic the people are subjects, not sovereign, and receive the law; in the United States of America the people are the sovereign, and give the law, that is, they ordain and make constitutions and enact laws for their government, and when ordained and enacted, they are the constitutions and laws of freemen.

We are told frequently, and politicians repeat and repeat, “that, to preserve peace, we must be prepared for war;” so many talks have been made, within two or three days past, about preparing for war, that I have been, said Mr. R., almost persuaded that we are about to be immediately at war with some Power. We are told that, to preserve peace, we must be prepared for war. If so, then, when will war be, and with whom? What is, or shall be, the necessary measure of preparation? With any of the nations of Europe there is no probability that the United States will soon be at war. The nations and Powers of Europe have business of their own to attend to, and to keep them engaged in preserving their European relations. The differences existing between Russia and Turkey, and the mighty efforts and exertions of the Greeks to liberate themselves from Ottoman despotism, engage the attention of the other Powers of Europe. An invasion by an army of any European Power the United States need not be apprehensive of. The days of such invasion are past. In respect to being prepared for war, as relates to this bill, the proposition argues nothing; the present Military Establishment consists of about six thousand men—they are scattered in positions over the United States from east to west, from north to south, extending as far as the territories of this republican empire do extend, and for that reason, to an immediate resistance of invasion, cannot be effectual. It has been said, “let gentlemen of the South look to a servile war.” What an insinuation is this—look to a servile war! From whence, and from whom? The idea of a servile war never ought to be clothed with words. The Constitutional principles of our Government are not better understood than they ought to be. This is not a consolidated Government—it is a Government consisting of twenty-four confederated States, all sovereignties, independent of each other—each one having a distinct constitution for its own internal government; but by the Constitution of their union bound together as one nation, for their general welfare. The citizens of all the States, in their Constitutional union, are the sovereign, and the citizens of each State are the sovereign in that State, for the internal regulations thereof, pursuant to their respective constitutions, not contravening the Constitution of the United States. The defence of this nation is confided to the General Government, but not originally in every case. The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution provides that the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of Government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application, against domestic violence; but each State, in case of invasion, has, in respect to its own safety, a particular duty to perform; a State is prohibited, by the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution, to engage in a war, unless "actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay." The Constitution, in these cases, authorizes a State to engage in war. With what forces shall a State engage in war? Not with the regular troops of the United States, if there be any within its limits. An officer commanding regular troops of the United States might, in the first instance, refuse the orders of a State authority. With whom, and with what description of force, shall a State make war, in case of sudden invasion or imminent danger, that will not admit of delay? With the militia. I repeat, said Mr. R., with the militia, who are the strong bulwark and impregnable defence of this nation; with the militia, who first must meet the storm of invasion; with the militia, from whom is drawn all the materials of a regular army; with the militia, that great body of citizens who work for all, who fight for all, and who ultimately pay all. The Constitution of the United States does not contemplate a regular army, except in time of war; the constitutions of the respective States declare standing armies dangerous in time of peace; that principle ought not to be contradicted. Admit the contrary to prevail, and the liberties of the people will ultimately be prostrated. The United States are now a nation of armed citizens. If a great standing army, under any pretence, is established and continued, and the citizens are loaded with taxes of any description to support and maintain that army, they will cease to be a nation of armed freemen, and in the course of a few years will be prostrated from their sovereignty, and become subjects. The United States are now encumbered with a large debt—some of it is the residue of the unpaid debt incurred by the war of the Revolution, and a residue of that incurred in the late war, and for other items of national expenditure. The best policy, in my opinion, said Mr. R., is to adopt such measures as will, without a system of internal revenue, extinguish that debt. The resources of this nation, arising from agriculture and commerce, are great, and will, if not restricted, in a few years, if sufficiently protected, extinguish that debt; the revenue will be relieved from pressure, and may then be applied to any useful purpose. To provide effectually for the extinguishment of the debt of the United States, is the preparation for war. The recollection of the difficulties arising from the scarcity of money, which the United States had to meet during the last war, ought to persuade to the adoption of all such measures as will, without a system of internal revenue, conduce to the speedy extinguishment of the public debt. Let it be remembered that a public debt, never to the people of these United States can be a public blessing.

When Mr. R. had concluded—

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, expressed his sentiments in opposition to the motion; when the question was taken thereon, and negatived—ayes 41, noes 89.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the Committee rose and reported, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 17.

Mr. BATEMAN, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas W. Bacot," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FRANCIS JOHNSON, from the same committee, reported a bill further to regulate the Post Office Department; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROCHESTER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river, so as to open a free communication and direct intercourse for vessels of all descriptions with the internal canal navigation of the State of New York.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, called for the question of consideration; which was decided in the affirmative.

On the question of agreeing to the resolution, Mr. ROCHESTER made a few remarks in support of it, and Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, in opposition; when the resolution was adopted.

Mr. GORHAM submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House a copy of the judicial proceedings in the United States court for the district of Louisiana, in the case of the French slave ship La Pensee, together with a copy of such part as he may not deem inexpedient to disclose of the correspondence of the Executive of the United States with the Government of France in relation thereto.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

A motion was made by Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, that the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to define admiralty jurisdiction," and the bill of this House to authorize the holding of a district court at Louisville, in Kentucky, be discharged from the consideration of the said bills; which motion was disagreed to by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, that the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill confirming claims to lots in the town of Mobile, and to land in the former province of West Florida, which claims have been reported favorably on by the commissioners appointed by the United States, be discharged from the consideration thereof; which motion was disagreed to by the House.

Mr. NEWTON gave notice that he should, on Friday next, move for the consideration of the bill to establish the compensation of the officers of the customs, &c.

Mr. COOK gave notice that he would on to-morrow move for the consideration of the report of the select committee appointed on the subject of the examinations of the western land offices, &c.

The House again proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, communicating their disagreement to the amendment of this House to their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act for paying to the State of Missouri three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands within the same."

The question thereupon was, whether the House would recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate. The recession was advocated by Mr. RANKIN, and opposed by Mr. TAYLOR and Mr. BUTLER, and after a few further remarks by Mr. GILMER and Mr. COOK, the question was taken, and the House refused to recede from their disagreement, and by a subsequent vote agreed to adhere to the amendment they had previously adopted.

A Message received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES yesterday, was read, and is as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th of February last, requesting the President of the United States "to communicate to that House whether any foreign Government has made any claim to any part of the territory of the United States, upon the coast of the Pacific Ocean, north of the 42d degree of latitude, and to what extent; whether any regulations have been made by foreign Powers, affecting the trade on that coast; and how it affects the interest of this republic; and whether any communications have been made to this Government, by foreign Powers, touching the contemplated occupation of Columbia river;" I now transmit a report from the Secretary of State, containing the information embraced by that resolution.

An engrossed joint "resolution providing further security in the transmission of the public mails," was read the third time and passed.

LAND OFFICE AT HUNTSVILLE.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a statement showing the amount of public money for which John Brahan, late receiver of public moneys at the land office at Huntsville, was indebted to the Government at the time he was dismissed from office; the amount of public money in the hands of said receiver, at the end of each quarter of every year, from the 1st of January, 1817, till the time of his dismissal; all information obtained or received by the said Secretary, as to the use the said receiver made of said money; copies of all letters and instructions from the Department to the said receiver within the said period; all correspondence in the possession of the Department, and other information obtained by the Secretary thereof, in relation to any improper conduct, violation of official trusts or omission of duty on the part of said receiver; together with a statement of the time at which the Secretary was first notified or had reason to suspect such improper conduct, violation of official trust, or omission of duty; the measures adopted to recover said money, (if any;) the time when they were commenced; what agent was employed for that purpose; what he accomplished; the compensation allowed him for the same; if any mortgage or deed of trust on land has been given—what land? the price at which it was originally sold by the Government; whether, in the opinion of said Secretary, the valuation of the land has depreciated? and, if so, whether, making all due allowance for such depreciation, the said debt is well secured to the Government; who are the said receiver's securities; in what sum bound; and what proceedings have been instituted against them?

Mr. MOORE said the number of abuses which have taken place under the law, operating upon those who have the custody of public money, and the injury Government has sustained have become so extensive and alarming, that I presume these circumstances will afford a sufficient apology for the call on the Treasury Department for the information embraced by this resolution. This information is necessary, because report varies as to the amount of the injury Government has sustained in this particular case, from $83,000 to $160,000.

This resolution also requires information as to the amount of money in the hands of the Receiver, at the end of each quarter, from 1817, till dismissed from office. This information I have sought, with a view, that if the law, as it exists at present, is so lame as not to require returns to be made by the Receiver to the Secretary of the Treasury, as to the amount of money in his hands until it has amounted to such an enormous sum, and thereby put it in his power to commit such fraud and abuse, I wish to make it the foundation for a modification of the law in this respect.

Again, sir, I wish this information in relation to the amount of money in the hands of the Receiver at the end of each quarter, because it is probable the amount for which this officer has failed to the Government, is precisely the amount he stands indebted to the Government for purchases of public land. And if this should be the case, sir, it will prove the necessity of enacting a law restraining the receivers of public moneys from becoming purchasers of public lands at any sale in which they have an immediate agency.

Mr. Speaker, many of the difficulties and misfortunes which have visited the citizens who have been purchasers of public land in the State which I have the honor to represent, have their origin in this source. Your public officers, sir, and public agents, intrusted to sell your land, become land speculators. They purchase individually, and join large companies formed for the purpose of speculation. They bid on their credit with the Government against the honest man's purse—no money required to be paid by them. The consequence of which is, that the actual improver of the soil, the respectable planter who has placed his affections on a spot with a view of making it a home, by which to raise his family, is driven from your country. Yes, sir, the honest yeomanry of the country, whose intentions were to settle and improve the lands, and in whom it is properly said exist the very bone and sinew of the Government, who protect and defend the country, these are driven away, sir, and foreign speculators claim the land in their place. Sir, one object is to prevent these evils in future, and by restraining these agents from purchasing at their own sales, to give the honest planter, and the settler on public land, a fair opportunity of becoming purchasers, and obtaining the possession of that spot which has been rendered valuable by their own labor. These, Mr. M. said, were some of the prominent reasons which influenced him in the introduction of this resolution.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table one day.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill in addition to the act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment.

The question recurred upon striking out the second section of the bill, which was carried; and on motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the third section was also stricken out.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, also moved to strike out that part of the fourth section which provided to reduce the Quartermaster General to the rank of a colonel; and, after a few remarks by the mover, the question was taken, and the motion was negatived.

Mr. TRACY moved to strike out the subsequent part of the same section, which provides for the abolition of the offices of two quartermasters, and the question being taken thereon, it was carried.

Mr. WOODCOCK, after a number of appropriate remarks, submitted the following amendment, as a second section to the bill:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to cause to be consolidated and arranged the companies and regiments of infantry and artillery, so as to form four regiments of infantry, consisting of ten companies each, and two regiments of artillery, consisting of ten companies each, with the necessary regimental staff to each regiment; and to cause the surplus or supernumerary officers, non-commissioned officers, and musicians, to be dismissed from service, from and after the — day of — next.

A very general discussion ensued upon the amendment, which extended to the general policy of the present Military Establishment of the country; and in which the amendment proposing to reduce and consolidate was supported by Messrs. WOODCOCK, CANNON, GILMER, WRIGHT, and RHEA; and opposed by Messrs. POINSETT, WOOD, McDUFFIE, COOK, TATNALL, and EUSTIS; when the question was taken, and the amendment negatived—ayes 62, noes 95.

Mr. EUSTIS moved to strike out the sixth section of the bill, in relation to medicines, surgical instruments, and other medical and hospital supplies; and the question thereon was taken without debate, and carried without division.

The subsequent sections of the bill, to the 10th inclusive, after having sustained a variety of modifications and amendments in their details, were agreed to.

Mr. POINSETT moved to strike out the 11th section, which provides for discharging the supernumerary officers and enlisted men of the Ordnance department; but the motion was negatived.

The 11th and 12th sections (being the residue of the bill) having been gone through with, and the blanks filled—

Mr. HARDIN submitted, as an additional section, an amendment, the purport of which was to repeal all such acts, orders, rules, and resolutions, as have allowed to the officers, and persons of the Army, or at the Military Academy at West Point, commutation for servants' hire, subsistence, or clothing; and the question thereon being taken, it was carried. The Committee then rose and reported the bill as amended, and the House adjourned.

in the District of Columbia, to drain the low grounds on and near the public reservations, and to improve and ornament certain parts of such reservations," reported the same without amendment, and it was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FLOYD submitted the following resolution, viz :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to this House, if not injurious to the public good, any letter or communication which may have been received from Jonathan Russell, Esquire, one of the Ministers of the United States, who concluded the Treaty of Ghent, after the signature of that treaty, and which was written in conformity to the indications contained in said Minister's letter, dated at Ghent, 25th December, 1814.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table one day.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, to which is committed the bill to render permanent the Naval Peace Establishment of the United States, were discharged from the consideration thereof, and it was recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to abolish the United States trading establishments with the Indian tribes." Whereupon, it was ordered that the bill be committed to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill of this House to regulate the intercourse with the Indian tribes within the United States and the territories thereof.

A motion was made by Mr. HEMPHILL, that the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road, be discharged from the consideration thereof, and that it be committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union; which motion was disagreed to by the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for ascertaining claims and titles to land within the Territory of Florida;" in which bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. GORHAM'S resolution, laid on the table yesterday, calling for information respecting the French ship La Pensée, was taken up, and adopted.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, calling for information respecting certain transactions in the Huntsville Land Office, was also taken up, and after a few remarks by MOORE, the same was adopted.

Mr. RICH submitted the following resolution :

Resolved, That the 69th section of the rules and orders of the House be expunged, and the following substituted in lieu thereof, to wit :

Exclusive of the "Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union," there shall be three committees of the whole House, to wit : One on bills and other subjects of a public or general nature ; one on private or local bills ; and one on subjects of a local or private nature, upon which unfavorable reports shall have been made by a committee ; and when a subject shall have been referred to a Committee of the Whole, it shall be assigned to the appropriate committee by the Speaker ; and unless otherwise specially ordered, shall be entered on the calendar for the next succeeding day.

The House having resolved into either of the said committees, the several subjects referred to it shall be announced by the Chairman, in the order in which they stand upon the calendar ; and any number may, in the discretion of the committee, be considered at the same sitting. But no subject shall be considered, except on the motion of a member, seconded by a majority of the committee : Provided, That the House may specially resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, upon any subject, which a committee shall previously have refused to consider.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table one day.

Mr. VAN WYCK moved to take up the motion to print five thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee of Retrenchment, but the motion was negatived, ayes 59, noes 64.

Pursuant to notice, Mr. COOK moved for the consideration of the report of the special committee appointed on the subject of inspecting the Western Land Offices ; but the House refused to consider the same.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill in relation to the escape of fugitives, slaves, &c. ; but, the question being put, Mr. W.'s motion was negatived.

A bill from the Senate to ascertain claims and titles to land in the Territory of Florida, was twice read and referred.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill in addition to an act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment.

The question recurred upon concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their amendments to the bill ; but, after a few prefatory remarks, Mr. TATNALL moved that the bill, with the amendments, be laid on the table—which was agreed to.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making further appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1822, and for other purposes.

Mr. COCKE moved to strike out the appropriation for Fort Delaware, but, after a few explanatory remarks by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the motion was withdrawn ; and the appropriation for that fort, and for Forts Washington and Monroe, were respectively agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to strike out the appropriation of $50,000 for Fort Calhoun.

This motion gave rise to a discussion which spread into a wide debate, and, after thirty-one speeches had been made thereon by Messrs. CHAMBERS, WALWORTH, FLOYD, F. JOHNSON, TRIMBLE, WARFIELD, COCKE, and COLDEN, in favor of the motion, and by Messrs. BASSETT, MERCER, SMITH, of Maryland, LITTLE, MCCOY, TOD, BRECKENRIDGE, POINSETT, NELSON, of Maryland, WRIGHT, BAYLIES, and SERGEANT, against it, the Committee, before any question was taken thereon, rose and reported progress, and the House adjourned.

Military Appropriations.

APRIL, 1822.

FRIDAY, April 19.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the act granting the right of pre-emption to certain settlers in the State of Louisiana, and for other purposes," reported the same with amendments. The bill and amendments were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Greenbury H. Murphy," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FLOYD's resolution, submitted yesterday, calling for information from the Executive in relation to the correspondence of Jonathan Russell, Esq., Minister of the United States, in concluding the Treaty of Ghent, was taken up and adopted.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives :

I communicate to the House of Representatives copies of sundry papers having relation to the transactions in East and West Florida, which have been received at the Department of State since my Message to the two Houses of Congress, of the 28th of January last, together with copies of two letters from the Secretary of State upon the same subject.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, April 18, 1822.

The Message was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, informing the House that the information called for by the resolution of this House, of the 10th instant, in relation to the sales of public lands in each of the States and Territories, and the price at which the same was sold, cannot be furnished until the next session of Congress; which letter was ordered to lie on the table.

THE VINE AND OLIVE.

The bill from the Senate supplementary to the act to set apart and dispose of part of the public lands to encourage the cultivation of the vine and olive, was read a third time.

Mr. RANKIN presented a variety of considerations in support of the passage of the bill, and replied to inquiries made by Mr. HILL and Mr. WALWORTH.

Mr. GILMER opposed the bill, on the ground that it enabled the purchasers and occupiers of certain parts of the land to hold the same at two dollars per acre, when they were worth forty, and the residue of the lands would be useless to the United States.

Mr. COOK was also opposed to it on the same ground, and he added that the individuals who entered into the association well understood the terms of the contract, and there was no good reason why it should be departed from.

Mr. TAYLOR was in favor of the bill on the ground that it was necessary to carry into effect the object for which the grant was originally made. To encourage the cultivation of the vine and olive was the primary object of the grant, and, without the provision of this bill, he believed that object could not be attained.

Mr. GILMER moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands. On this motion the merits of the bill were incidentally discussed by Messrs. GILMER and ALEXANDER SMYTH, in favor of the recommitment, and by Messrs. RANKIN, WALWORTH, MOORE, of Alabama, MERCER, and RHEA, in opposition to it.

Mr. COOK expressed himself satisfied with the explanation that had been given by the gentleman from Mississippi, (Mr. RANKIN,) and hoped the bill would be adopted in its present shape.

The motion for recommitment was negatived; and the bill was finally passed and returned to the Senate.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill making further appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year 1822.

The question recurred upon striking out the appropriation for the erection of Fort Calhoun, on the Chesapeake.

The debate was opened by Mr. BASSETT in opposition to the motion. He viewed the facts connected with the progress of the work, and replied to the observations made yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. TRIMBLE.) He thought we were not departing from the economy of Jefferson, but on this subject were following with unequal steps the policy which that statesman had recommended. He dwelt upon the calamities that might ensue to the country in the result of an unsuccessful naval conflict with an enemy, if we had not fortifications to shelter a retreat, or to afford protection to our cities, and expatiated at length upon the peculiar importance and expediency of the fort in question.

Mr. COLDEN made a few remarks on the subject, which could not be heard by the reporter.

Mr. BALDWIN did not rise to make any remarks on the subject of the specific appropriation now proposed, but only to reply to observations of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HARDIN,) yesterday, and he explained fully and at length the circumstances in relation to the alleged excess of expenditures over the appropriations of the last year.

After a few queries by Mr. MALLARY, and an explanation by Mr. BASSETT—

Mr. STERLING, of New York, took the floor, and adverted to the charge made yesterday upon the Secretary of War, of transcending the appropriations of last year; and upon the First Clerk, of participating in the contract for the works at the Rip Raps, and of injuring the public interest thereby. Mr. S. went into a particular examination of the subject, and referred to documents, by which he contended it was fully shown, that, instead of transcending the appropriation, the Secretary of War had kept within it by more than fifteen thousand dollars. And in respect to the Chief Clerk, Mr. S. remarked that the gentleman (Mr. COCKE) who made the statement was appointed in 1819 chairman of a committee to investigate the subject, and had shrunk from the task of reporting upon it. Mr. S. contended that the contract was fairly made; that the Government tested the expense by experiments; that the owners of the quarries were notified and consulted; that there were five bidders for the contract; that the lowest terms were accepted; and that the contractor afterwards refused to extend the contract on similar terms.

Mr. COCKE said, that the statement made by the gentleman from New York, that the committee had shrunk from an investigation of the case of Mix's contract, &c., on a former occasion, was not founded on fact as regarded himself, (Mr. C.) He never had shrunk from any duty that he had to perform, and he never would do so. The committee which had been alluded to, after two sittings, never could be got together again; which fact, Mr. C. said, he did at the time communicate to the House; and had he known that he could have procured an addition to the committee by a motion to that effect, he certainly would have applied to the House for that purpose. Mr. C. repeated what he had before stated, that the contract in question was made without a previous publication of it; that Christopher Vandeventer was, when the committee made the investigation, from his own acknowledgment, owner of one-half of the contract, for which he gave one hundred dollars; and Mix and Jennings each owned half of the remainder; and (as he understood from gentlemen in this House, from the State of New York) Elijah Mix was not, at the time of making the contract, worth one hundred dollars. And Mr. C. appealed to those gentlemen for a confirmation of the fact. From all the circumstances attending the contract, Mr. C. repeated (as he had before said) he did not believe the Government had had justice done to it.

Mr. HARDIN disclaimed having made any charge or accusation on any department, but contended that the statements he had made were correct, and that the gentleman from New York (Mr. STERLING) had misconceived the propositions he had advanced.

Mr. McDUFFIE replied at length to the remarks made yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HARDIN,) and took a wide range of remark, animadverting upon the report of the Retrenchment Committee, (so called,) which he contended was altogether incorrect, and defending the character and policy of the present Administration, in a speech of nearly an hour.

Mr. HARDIN replied in extenso to the observations of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) and defended the report of the Committee of Retrenchment, by reference to a variety of documents and estimates.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made a few further observations upon the subject of the proposed appropriation, and also pointed out what he deemed to be an error of five hundred and twenty-one thousand dollars in the report of the Committee of Retrenchment.

Mr. WHIPPLE (a member of the committee) explained, and contended that the mistake just pointed out did not exist.

Mr. RHEA expressed his sentiments in favor of the appropriation.

Mr. McDUFFIE rejoined to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HARDIN,) and reviewed the various topics that had been introduced into the discussion.

Mr. HARDIN replied to the observations of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) and also animadverted upon the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE.)

Further remarks were made on the subject by Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, F. JONES, ROSS, and H. NELSON; when the Committee rose, reported progress, and then the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, April 20.

Ordered, That the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the representatives of John Donnelson, Thomas Carr, and others," be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Ordered, That the Message of the President of the United States of the 17th instant, communicating a correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Ministers of Great Britain and Russia, relative to the claims of those Governments, respectively, to certain parts of the north-west coast of America, be referred to the committee appointed on the 10th of December last "to inquire into the expediency of occupying the Columbia river and the territory of the United States adjacent thereto; and of regulating the trade with the Indian tribes."

Mr. RICH gave notice that he should, on Monday next, call for the consideration of a resolution by him heretofore submitted for altering the rules of the House, and he presented the following, which he wished to be subjoined thereto, and which lies, of course, one day on the table:

"With the exception of the three last weeks of a session, bills of a local or private nature, and reports of committees, other than bills, on the like subjects, shall, to the exclusion of other business, (the period for going into committee having been reached,) be considered on Friday and Saturday in each week, and on no other days: Provided, That this rule shall not prevent the third reading of a bill on any other days, nor the consideration of any subject upon which a Committee of the Whole shall have made a report."

Mr. BASSETT, from the select committee, appointed on that subject, reported a bill concerning the disbursements of public money; which was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their disagreement to the amendment proposed by this House to the amendments of the Senate to the bill from this House, entitled "An act to provide for paying to the State of Missouri three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands within the same;" and ask a conference thereon, at which they have appointed managers on their part.

Mr. VAN WYCK renewed his motion to cause five thousand extra copies of the first report of the Committee on Retrenchment to be printed; but the question of consideration being put, it was again negatived—ayes 50, noes 60.

REDUCTION OF PAY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HARDIN, from the select committee heretofore appointed on the subject of retrenchment of the public expenditure, made a further report thereon, accompanied by a bill.

The report is as follows:

The select committee, to which was referred a resolution directing an inquiry to be made whether any part of the public expenditure can be retrenched without detriment to the public service, and whether there be any offices or appointments in the Government of the United States which have become useless and unnecessary, and can be dispensed with, report, in part, that, from the best estimate which they can make as to the average expenses of both Houses of Congress, taking one session with another, and allowing each session to be as long as the session of the Sixteenth Congress, the same will stand thus, or nearly so:

Pay and mileage of the members -	$336,975 00
Salaries of clerks, &c. -	17,100 00
Salaries of Doorkeepers and Sergeant-at-Arms -	9,000 00
	$363,075 00

The committee propose to reduce the pay and mileage of the members to six dollars per day, and six dollars for every twenty miles travel; also the pay of the Clerk of the House of Representatives and Secretary of the Senate to $2,000 each, the principal deputy of each House to $1,500, and the other deputies to $1,200; the Doorkeepers and their Assistants, and the Sergeant-at-Arms of each House, to six dollars a day, during the session of Congress; and to each Doorkeeper, for taking care of that part of the Capitol set apart for the use of Congress, $200 in addition. If the reduction proposed shall be made, it will lessen the expenditure for the Legislative Department about $90,000 annually; and, after the Seventeenth Congress, the reduction will be equal to near $100,000. The committee, in proposing to reduce the expenses of the Legislative Department, are influenced by several considerations. They are decidedly of opinion that nothing can save the nation from a system of internal taxation, but retrenchment in the public expenditures, a return to good old principles, which, for some years past, have been lost sight of. The pay of the members of Congress, from the formation of the Government until a few years ago, was what is now proposed by the committee, and money is worth as much now as it had been at any period within the last twenty or thirty years.

It may be objected, that a reduction of the pay of the members will drive all those who are not wealthy out of Congress. To that it may be answered, that the former experiments of the Government in its operation before the compensation was raised, prove the contrary; for the best talents in America, since the formation of this Government, have been proud and ambitious of a seat in Congress; besides, money cannot be the object of any man in accepting a seat in Congress. An indemnity is all he can, or ought to expect. It has been alleged by some that the pay of the members should be so high as to make them entirely independent of the influence of Executive patronage. If there be any thing in that argument, this answer may be given—that the committee are fearful that eight dollars a day would not answer the desired purpose. Without going further into the discussion of this question, the committee are unanimously of opinion that, in the great, and good work of retrenchment, Congress ought to be the first to set an example to the balance of the nation, and begin with themselves. They, therefore, to effectuate the objects pointed out in this report, submit to the House the accompanying bill.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill making further appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1822.

The question recurred upon striking out the appropriation for the erection of Fort Calhoun, on the Chesapeake, and the same was put and negatived by a large majority.

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, moved to amend the section by adding thereto a clause providing that no part of the appropriation should be applied on the contract made with Elijah Mix, on the 25th July, 1818.

Mr. SAWYER was opposed to the proviso, but the reasons which he offered could not be heard by the reporter.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, also opposed the amendment. He regarded it as going to declare a dissolution of a contract which Congress had repeatedly affirmed.

Mr. BUTLER contended that the contract was made in contravention of the laws of the United States, and that there was such reason to suspect that there was fraud in the case as would justify us in withholding the appropriation.

Mr. ROSS opposed the proviso, not only on the ground assumed by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) but also on the principle that, Congress having recognised the contract, it was now too late to annul it, and he should vote against the amendment, although he had been opposed to the appropriation.

Mr. TOL also made a few observations on the subject, when the question was taken, and the motion negatived by a large majority; and the blank was filled as proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means.

The appropriation for fortifying Mobile Point being under consideration,

Mr. COCKE moved to strike out the section, and to insert in lieu thereof an appropriation for the specific purpose of collecting materials for that fortification. The principle on which he preferred a specific appropriation was, that the money heretofore appropriated for the fortification at Mobile Point had not been applied to that object, but had been transferred to Colonel Gratiot, at Norfolk, and he referred to documents on the subject.

Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON contended that the money had been applied to the great object for which it was appropriated, and he examined with minuteness the particular circumstances of the case in question. Mr. J. also adverted to the topics that had been drawn into discussion yesterday, and contended that the question, whether the Secretary had assumed an undue responsibility upon himself or not, ought not to be brought to bear upon the subject.

Mr. COCKE replied, and expressed his dissent to the justification of the Secretary of War which had been urged by the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. JOHNSTON,) and again reviewed the positions he had taken on the question.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, explained the facts in relation to the origin and changes of the contract for building the fortifications at Mobile Point, and made a general exposition of the subject of fortifications, with an historical sketch of the policy that had been pursued for a series of years, in their erection and extent. He also expressed his acquiescence in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. COCKE,) and intimated an opinion that it would be expedient for the United States to abandon the system of erecting their fortifications by contract.

Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH thought the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. COCKE,) was mistaken in the facts, and that he had been misled by the similarity of sums to suppose that a transfer had been made of the appropriation for Mobile Point. Mr. S. contended that it was incorrect policy to make specific appropriations to fortifications by name. A sum should be designated by Congress for the general object, and the distribution of it should be left to the Executive Department, and on that department the responsibility should rest, for its correct and faithful disbursement and application. In reference to the alleged transfer, he remarked that the Secretary of War was absent at the time the fiscal arrangement was entered into—that it was done by the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Chief of the Engineer department. The Secretary of War, said he, probably approved of it subsequently, but the responsibility, whatever it was, seemed to rest upon the President; but the money he believed was fairly expended in the public service, and in pursuance of the act of Congress.

Mr. TRACY was in favor of the amendment, on the ground that it was equivalent to an expression of the intention of the House to discontinue the contract for building the fortification at Mobile Point; from which contract he contended the United States was fairly absolved, for the work was to have been completed in 1821 by the terms of it. He also adverted to the items of the contract, which he thought fully proved that the contract was disadvantageous to the Government, and he was unwilling to continue it further than a legal liability imposed an obligation.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, rose to correct what he thought was an error of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) in relation to the agency of the Secretary of the Treasury in the transaction alluded to, and which he said was limited to the transfer of the money from De Russe to Colonel Gratiot.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, had no expectation that the contract would be fulfilled by the sureties of Colonel Hawkins, and he thought it most expedient to apply the appropriation to the procurement of materials, which was, in his opinion, the only mode in which the great object was most likely to be accomplished. Mr. J. was unwilling to enter into the expediency of the terms of the contract, because that was a point which should be left to those to whom it was by law confided. The dangers of climate, and the dearness of provision, rendered labor higher at Mobile than in the State of New York. The power of appropriation, he contended, was the great moral power of this House, and he differed entirely from the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SMYTH) in respect to the expediency of making appropriations specific. He also contended it was expedient to prevent the competition of the various parts of the Union, which would bring odium and charge of partiality upon the Executive officers.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, replied, and contended that it was improper for the Government to refuse to fulfil the contract, for if the contractors had violated the contract by non-fulfilment on the one hand, the Government had equally violated it by withholding the stipulated payments on the other. He also animadverted upon the other topics connected with the discussion. He expressed his willingness even to borrow money for fortifications, if necessity required it. For institutions of a perishable nature, he was not willing to make a charge upon posterity; but for imperishable fortifications, built of granite, and calculated to last for eternity, he did not feel that it would be unjust to tax posterity, as they, as well as the present generation, were to participate in the benefits and security they may afford.

The subject was further discussed by Messrs. TRACY, F. JOHNSON, WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and HARDIN, and opposed by Messrs. H. NELSON, and COOK, when the question was taken, and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, moved to fill the blank with the sum of $30,000 instead of $50,000, which motion was supported by the mover and Mr. COCKE, and opposed by Messrs. MOORE, of Alabama, JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, and SMITH, of Maryland, when the question was taken thereon, and carried without a division.

After the appropriation for fortifications at the Rigolets, and Chef Menteur, had been carried, Mr. SERGEANT moved to insert a clause to make an appropriation of $19,000, to complete the Arsenal at Frankfort, Pennsylvania.

The motion was supported by the mover, and opposed by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, but before any question was taken thereon, the Committee rose and reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The House adjourned.

Proceedings.

APRIL, 1822.

MONDAY, April 22.

Mr. F. JOHNSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to establish certain post roads, and to discontinue others; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill relating to Treasury notes; which was twice read, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

[This bill provides: "That, from and after the passing of this act, no Treasury note shall be received in payment on account of the United States, or paid or funded, except at the Treasury of the United States."]

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill from the Senate to enable the holders of incomplete French and Spanish titles to lands in Missouri to institute proceedings to try the validity of their titles, &c., reported the same with sundry amendments; and the bill and amendments were referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARDIN, from the select committee, on the subject of retrenchment, reported, in part, a bill, the object of which is to reduce the Revolutionary pensions, for all grades of rank, from and after a given day in the year 1824, to four dollars per month.

The bill, which, Mr. H. computed, would, if passed, effect a saving of $900,000 for the first year it got into operation, and proportionably thereafter, was twice read, and committed—Mr. H. giving notice of his intention to call up this bill, and the one previously reported by the same committee, on Wednesday next.

The House proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations to carry into effect a treaty made at Chicago, and a treaty made at Edwardsville. Whereupon, it was ordered that the bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BUCHANAN communicated to the House a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, requesting, for the reasons therein stated, that the fines imposed on the militia of that State, for non-compliance with certain requisitions of the President of the United States, in the late war with Great Britain, may be transferred to the said State, with power to collect the same; which resolution was referred to the select committee appointed by this House upon the subject of said fines.

On motion of Mr. WARFIELD, a committee was appointed to report the best mode, in their opinion, of giving to the public a full and correct statement of the debates and proceedings of this House; and Messrs. WARFIELD, MERCER, SERGEANT, JONES of Tennessee, and GORHAM, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. SCOTT submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House whether any, and, if any, how much revenue has accrued to the United States from the leases of lead mines in Missouri; whether any lease, promise, or agreement, is now in force for any lead mine in Missouri, and the copies thereof, if in writing, and the substance thereof, if verbal, with all the terms, conditions, and stipulations, written or verbal, as well on the part of the United States, as on the part of the lessee, the quantity of land leased, promised, or engaged, to each person, their names and places of residence, together with the names and places of residence of their securities, if any; whether the said leases, promises, agreements, or engagements, if any, are in force, if not now in force, when will they be completed or put in force; whether such leases, promises, or engagements, have been made with or without public notice, and by whom on the part of the United States, and with whom on the part of the lessees, and their securities, if any. And also a copy of the regulations and instructions, if any have been made, for carrying into effect any law authorizing the leasing of lead mines.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table one day.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE endeavored to obtain a hearing of the bill for removing the district court of Kentucky to Louisville, by moving to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of it, in order to bring it directly before the House. But the motion was opposed by Mr. J. T. JOHNSON, on the ground that that bill involved something like an affirmation of the propriety of giving to the courts of the United States jurisdiction over interior waters, navigable by boats only. Mr. B. denied that this question was at all embraced in it; but Mr. J. persisted in his opposition—and finally moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the bill from the Senate respecting admiralty jurisdiction, as well as that moved by Mr. BRECKENRIDGE. And the question being put in that shape, was decided in the negative. So the House refused to enter into the consideration of either of said bills.

Mr. RICH called for the consideration of a resolution by him submitted on a former day, proposing to alter the rules of the House; but, the question being put, the motion was negatived.

Mr. BURTON called for the consideration of the bill to repeal the existing law for the encouragement of vaccination, and the motion to take it up was agreed to.

Mr. BATEMAN moved to commit the bill to a Committee of the Whole, which motion was opposed by Mr. BURTON, and negatived; when the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. WOODCOCK called for the consideration of the bill to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia; which was agreed to be taken up—ayes 81.

The bill, on motion of Mr. WOODCOCK, was then recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with directions to report a bill thereon, pursuant to an amendment that had been adopted by the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Department of State, transmitting the annual statement respecting passenger ships and vessels; which, on motion of Mr. TOMLINSON, was ordered to be laid on the table.

The House again proceeded to consider the message of the Senate, notifying that they insist on their disagreement to the amendment proposed by this House to their amendments to the bill of this House, entitled "An act to provide for paying to the State of Missouri three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands within the same." Whereupon, it was resolved, that this House do agree to the conference asked by the Senate upon the subject-matter thereof, and that managers be appointed to attend said conference on their part; and Messrs. RANKIN, TAYLOR, and BUTLER were appointed the said managers.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1822," with amendments; and they have passed a bill, entitled "An act to provide for the selection of a site on the Western waters, for the establishment of a national armory;" in which amendments and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

MIX'S CONTRACT FOR STONE.

Mr. BUTLER submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the contract between the War Department of the United States and Elijah Mix, of the 25th July, 1818, to report whether the same was made in pursuance of law, and whether the said Mix has performed his covenant; and such other facts as they may deem proper relative to said contract.

In offering this resolution, Mr. BUTLER remarked, that he discovered, on consulting the documents on this subject, that, according to the contract, there was due to the United States the delivery of 150,000 perch of stone on the 1st January last, and that, on that day, there had been actually delivered only 102,437 perches; so that the contract had not been fulfilled on the part of Mr. Mix, and was no longer binding on the United States. Besides, he said, there were, to say the least, suspicious appearances about this contract. No proposals for this contract were publicly invited, by advertisement or otherwise. It was said, too, that Mr. Mix had sold out his contract at a dollar and a half per perch; and Mr. B. said he observed, from the account of contracts laid before the House, that a contract had actually been made by the Government, at Philadelphia, for stone, to be delivered at the Pea Patch, for a dollar and a half per perch, whilst three dollars per perch was paid to Mix. Taking the time, place, and manner of the contract into consideration, and the default of the contractor to fulfil his engagements, he had thought proper to submit this resolution. No appropriation that is made at this session, Mr. B. contended, ought to be expended under that contract.

Mr. McDUFFIE said, he was very glad the gentleman from New Hampshire had introduced this resolution. It was the proper course to pursue in cases of this kind. If there was any thing improper in the conduct of any officer of the Government, it was proper to inquire into it, not incidentally in debate, or by ex parte statements on this floor, but by judicial investigation. While up, Mr.

McD. said he would state, that, on an investigation, the facts of this case would be found very different from what they had been represented to be. He was authorized to say that, if Mr. Mix had not taken this contract, a loss would have been occasioned to the United States of $75,000—the contract having been taken by Mr. Mix at half a dollar per perch less than was just about to be contracted for with another person. A great deal had been said about the extravagance of the price of this stone. At this time such a price would be high, but the contract was made in the year 1818, at which time every article was higher than it now is, in consequence of the depreciation of the national currency; which fact ought to be taken into consideration.

Mr. SAWYER said, he had no objection to this resolution; but as for the abrogation of the contract with Mr. Mix, on account of his failure to deliver a stipulated quantity of stone, it was sufficient to say, that, if the allegation were true, the fault lay not with Mr. Mix, but with this House, which reduced the appropriation for fortifications below the amount required by the Secretary of War to comply with existing contracts. For this Mr. Mix was certainly not to blame.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he hoped the resolution would be adopted. He thought, from the statement which had been made by the gentleman from New York some days since, that the subject required investigation. On one point he begged leave to differ from the gentlemen from South Carolina and North Carolina. He did not think that Government, under any circumstances, ought to have made a contract with Mr. Mix. This opinion was formed from what he had heard from gentlemen on different sides of the House on this subject.

Mr. METCALFE proposed an amendment for giving to the committee power to send for persons and papers. He did not mean to censure the individual who was implicated in this discussion, nor to exonerate him from censure. But he was induced to believe some very satisfactory information might be got on this subject by a resort to oral testimony.

Mr. BUTLER accepted the proposed amendment as part of his motion; and, thus modified, Mr. B.'s motion was agreed to without opposition. And Messrs. BUTLER, METCALFE, and CAMPBELL, of Ohio, were appointed the said committee.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill making further appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year 1822.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. SERGEANT, to amend the bill by inserting a clause to appropriate the sum of $19,000 to complete the arsenal at Frankfort, Pennsylvania.

Mr. SERGEANT enforced the expediency of the proposition he had made, to prevent the arsenal alluded to from falling into ruins, and he reviewed at some length the opinions that had been expressed on Saturday, by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. SMITH, of Maryland.)

Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON replied, in opposition to the amendment, and was particularly adverse to placing the proposition as preliminary to, and in exclusion of, an appropriation to rebuild Fort St. Philip, for the defence of New Orleans, which he observed was the most weak and exposed point in the Union.

The debate was continued with considerable warmth and animation by Messrs. SERGEANT, SMITH, of Maryland, and BALDWIN, when the motion, after some prefatory remarks, by the mover, was withdrawn, with the view of proposing it in the subsequent progress of the bill.

The item for the repairs of the fortifications in the United States being under consideration—

Mr. HILL moved to amend the clause in which it was contained, so as to include about $2,000 for an appropriation for fortifications at Portland, in the State of Maine.

After a few observations from Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON—

Mr. COCKE moved to fill the blank with the sum of $15,000. He believed that sum was adequate to the contingencies for fortifications.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. WALWORTH, respectively, explained the subject, when the question was taken on the largest sum $22,000, and lost; and, after some further remarks by Messrs. J. S. JOHNSTON and COCKE, the question was taken on filling the blank with the sum of $20,000, and carried.

Mr. HILL renewed his motion to make a specific appropriation for the repair of the fortification at Portland, in Maine.

The motion was supported by Mr. HILL, and opposed by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. FLOYD, and lost.

The appropriation for the Ordnance department being under consideration, and an item for the purchase of ammunition being included therein—

Mr. COCKE expressed his surprise at such a proposition, as he had learned from the chief of the Ordnance department that the magazines were already crowded with ammunition, and he adverted to the failure of the Executive to reply to a request contained in a resolution of the House at an early period of the session, for information in respect to loans of powder, &c.

Mr. TOD contended that the Executive had furnished an answer to the inquiry to which the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. COCKE) had alluded.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, remarked that the inquiry to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. TOD) had referred, was not the same resolution to which the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. COCKE) had adverted, but he was informed that the department was now employed in collecting the facts necessary to give an answer to it. But, at all events, he thought it necessary to bring that subject to bear upon the present—and after the word "ammunition," on motion of Mr. SMITH, had been stricken out, the clause, as amended, was adopted.

On the appropriation for the reparation of arms two sums were named, viz: $11,960 by the Committee of Ways and Means, and 27,585 by Mr. TOD.

In support of the latter sum, Mr. TOD observed, that last year, when the fit of economy came on, it discharged itself on this very appropriation, and, when $100,000 was asked for, nothing was given. The consequence was, that between three and four hundred workmen, composing nine-tenths of the whole, were dismissed from employment, and were compelled either to beg, or steal, or starve, or work on the public highways at twelve and an half cents per day. He thought, while we kept so many soldiers doing nothing, and while we had a force in the Pacific, that was more expensive than the profits of all that trade would amount to, it was really too much to dismiss these poor fellows, with their leather aprons, from our service, which the public interest required. If there was to be a reduction, he thought it was much better to discharge the band of musicians that were retained, he knew not for what—for he believed it was much the better to part with our fiddlers, than our laborers.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, presented a detailed view of the causes that had led the committee to recommend the lesser sum. He stated the repeated inquiries that had been made of the Ordnance department the answers that had been given in relation to the establishment at Greenleaf's Point, which were unsatisfactory in giving any thing like a full and clear exposition of the facts, and from which the committee were disposed to withhold a larger appropriation.

Mr. TOD replied, and observed that the armories, &c., which belonged to the public, were managed with as much economy and fidelity as private establishments, and he was unwilling that the full weight of economy should fall upon those only who performed productive labor for the public.

Mr. WOOD observed that the situation of our arsenals and public stores was very little known. He had at an early part of the session presented a resolution to obtain information on the subject, and the committee to whom it was referred had neglected to report. He had no doubt there was disorder and confusion in that department, and he was not prepared to make any appropriation at all until the House was in possession of more information on the subject. The question was then put on the largest sum, as named by Mr. TOD, and lost; and the lesser sum, as recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means, was adopted.

Further appropriations having been agreed to—

Mr. SERGEANT renewed his motion to appropriate $19,000 to complete the arsenal at Frankfort, Pennsylvania; and, after a few remarks in favor of the motion by Mr. SERGEANT, and in opposition to it by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the question was taken thereon and negatived—ayes 46, noes 49.

H. OF R.

Various appropriations having been gone through with—

Mr. COCKE submitted an amendment to the section, the purport of which was, that no extra allowance should be made to any Governor of a Territory, in consideration of his services as ex officio Superintendent of Indian Affairs.

The proviso was advocated at considerable length by Mr. COCKE, Mr. RANKIN, and Mr. FLOYD, and opposed by Mr. SIBLEY.

Mr. WOOD contended that ex officio services ought not to be entitled to extra compensation; but services that were rendered, not ex officio, but by a Governor only, as an individual appointed for a specific purpose, were fairly entitled to compensation. He thought, therefore, the proviso was too broad, and would lead to unjust results; and he was confirmed in the opinion which he had expressed, by a resolution offered some weeks since, and which had been rejected by the House, that the system of Indian Affairs ought to be renovated and placed under a specific head, and subject to a specific responsibility.

Mr. ROSS moved to amend the amendment by providing that the amendment shall operate prospectively only; and he expressed his reasons in support of the proposition.

Mr. GILMER expressed his sentiments in favor of the proviso offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. COCKE,) and opposed to the amendment which had been proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. ROSS.)

Mr. MALLARY was also opposed to the amendment, on the ground that it implied a sanction of the course that had been heretofore taken.

Mr. TRACY considered that the principal amendment, offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. COCKE,) was unequal and unjust in its operation, as it was retroactive in respect to General Cass, and made no effort to cause the Attorney General and other officers in the Government to refund such sums as they had pocketed, and which essentially depended upon the same principle. He was not disposed to look back and punish some, while immunity is granted to others, and he expressed a high regard for the character of Governor Cass, as a man whose name should not be lightly treated by this country. This expenditure, he thought, had received the sanction of the Government for many years, and properly came within the fund created to compensate for contingent services. An extra allowance for similar services had been paid to his predecessor, Governor Hull, and he (Governor Cass) had therefore a fair right to presume it would be extended to him. Mr. T. contended, that it was in its operation an ex post facto law, and ought not to receive the sanction of the House.

Mr. RHEA moved that the Committee rise and report progress, which was agreed to, and in the House the Committee had leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, April 23.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, made a report on the petition of Henry 17th CON. 1st SESS.—52

Lee, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the resolution submitted on yesterday by Mr. SCOTT, concerning the lead mines of Missouri; which was agreed to by the House.

Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH laid on the table the following:

Resolved, That leave be given to bring in a bill allowing to persons not residing within the District of Columbia the benefit of the law for the relief of insolvent debtors, in the like manner as the same is allowed to persons residing within the said District.

[The object of this bill will be to abolish the residence of twelve months now required to entitle a person to the benefit of the insolvent act within the District of Columbia.]

On motion of Mr. F. JONES, the House agreed to consider a bill for the relief of Alzira Dibrel and Sophia Hancock, daughters of Samuel Mitchell, by Molly, a Choctaw woman.

Mr. JONES explained the object of the bill, which was to confirm to these persons the title to a tract of land reserved to them by the Treaty of Mount Dexter, between the United States and the Choctaws, concluded in the year 1805.

After which, without further debate, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A bill from the Senate to authorize the selection of a suitable site for the location of a national armory on the Western waters, was read twice, and committed to the Committee on Military Affairs.

An engrossed bill relating to Treasury notes, was read a third time, and passed, and sent to the Senate.

VACCINATION.

The engrossed bill to repeal the act to encourage vaccination, was also read a third time.

Mr. CONDIOT moved to lay the bill on the table, which motion was negative—ayes 31, noes 64.

The question then recurred upon the passage of the bill, which Mr. TAYLOR required to be taken by yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered.

Mr. WOOD turned to the act of Congress of 1813, which is proposed by this bill to be repealed, which confers no power or authority on the person named by the President as Vaccine Agent, other than of transmitting and receiving letters free of postage, which, he said, appeared on the face of it so harmless, if not beneficial a provision, he should like to hear some explanation of the objections to it.

Mr. BURTON assigned some of the reasons which had influenced the committee to report this bill. They were of opinion, he said, in the first place, that this subject was one strictly of internal policy, not properly within the province of this Government but of the several States, whose duty it was to regulate every thing relating to health and police generally. He had no objection, if Congress should think proper, to extend the privilege of franking so far that it should be allowed to an agent for vaccination for each and every State and Territory; but he was opposed to Congress itself establishing the agencies. In what manner, he asked, had the agency been conducted? In the city of Baltimore, the very seat of it, the small pox, that scourge of the human family, had prevailed to an extent greater than in any part of the United States. Was this not sufficient to convince any man that the institution had not been properly regulated? No man at this day doubted the efficacy of vaccination to prevent the small pox. Why had it not been prevented in that very spot which was the seat of the Vaccine Institution? It was because it was rightfully a subject of State regulation, and could not be properly regulated by the Government of the United States. This very agent, too, had sent the small pox matter into the interior of the country, where in all probability it would not have found its way for forty years, but for this agency. The British army, when it marched through that part of the country forty years ago, last communicated the small pox, and he thought it fair to presume that another foreign army was not likely to march through that country for forty years to come, to introduce it again. We had no wish for the small pox, said Mr. B., but it was sent to us in disguise; and this mistake alone was sufficient reason for the repeal of the law. And, after having done this, the agent came out with an address to the public about some new disease, varioloid he believed he called it, which was calculated to destroy all confidence in the institution, and vaccination itself. Afterwards, finding that this address was not satisfactory, he had come forward and acknowledged that he had sent the small pox matter to North Carolina, and that it was an accident which had never happened before, and in all probability would never happen again. That, Mr. B. said, might readily be. The people who had been killed by it were not killed before, and could not be killed again. The Government of the United States, he added, did not possess the powers which enabled other Governments to legislate efficiently on this subject. In Denmark, for example, the people are compelled to be vaccinated before they can be married, and before their children can be christened they must be vaccinated. But this Government could exercise no such despotic power; all that it could do, constitutionally, in regard to it, and the best thing it could do, was to let the people, who are both able and willing, take care of themselves.

H. OF R.

Vaccination.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said that the act establishing the agency had been in operation for nine years, and he thought ought not to be hastily repealed. It was true, an unfortunate incident had occurred under the agency, which it was difficult to conceive could have arisen but from some negligence on the part of the agent. But would Congress repeal the law because of this one instance of wrong? If the agent has done wrong, said Mr. T., let him be removed. He had heard this agent, however, spoken of as a man of great attention to his charge, who never failed to procure and keep on hand vaccine matter of the greatest purity. The most careful man may, from accident or momentary inadvertence, commit a mistake. If that be sufficient cause for his removal, let him be discharged. But, let there remain some institution, at which there is a reasonable probability of obtaining vaccine matter in its purity. Mr. T. said, he had no acquaintance with the vaccine agent; he knew nothing of him but from his letters for several years, and public report, which had produced an impression on his mind favorable to the Doctor. The gentlemen who lived nearer to him were better able to judge of his qualifications than he (Mr. T.) could. But, never, on this or any other occasion, would he repeal a law to get rid of any individual whatever, unless it was in an extreme case.

Mr. BURTON here stated, that it would perhaps save the gentleman some trouble to say, that the President had fully examined the case of the late occurrence in the Vaccine agency, and, being satisfied of mismanagement on his part, had dismissed the agent. The only question, therefore, now was, as to the abstract policy of the law proposed to be repealed.

Mr. TAYLOR said he had not before been apprized of the fact of the agent being dismissed. With regard to the policy of the law, he said there surely might be found in the United States some individual in whom the necessary confidence might be reposed to discharge the duties of Vaccine agent. It did appear to him to be derogatory to the character of the medical profession to suppose, because Congress could not apply municipal regulations to punish the individual for misconduct, they therefore could not properly exercise the power of establishing an agency for vaccination. This subject had been often before Congress since the year 1813, when the law first passed, and much had been said of it; but, as no considerations had heretofore procured its repeal, he hoped it would not now be repealed without due deliberation, &c.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, was in favor of the bill. What would be the effect of the institution if permitted to exist hereafter, he could only be enabled to judge from what had been its effect heretofore. If the institution was a necessary one, there would be no objection to its continuance. But, Mr. E. said, his own idea was, that it could not be necessary. The advantages of the vaccine matter, he thought, could be disseminated by individuals in different parts of the country, without the expense which had heretofore attended the procuring it from the agency. Why, then, give to an agent the privilege of franking? Mr. E. considered it a safe principle, if not an axiom in politics, to make no depository of any public trust, unless you can enforce the performance and fulfilment of it. This, Congress could not do in the case of this agency. He hoped the law would be repealed, and that hereafter no person would be permitted to be called the National Agent for Vaccination, by which he could obtain an exclusive circulation of matter through the country, to the destruction of that competition which is the life of trade and of professions.

APRIL, 1822.

Vaccination.

H. OF R.

Mr. BURTON made some further remarks. All legislation, he said, went upon this principle: that, by possibility, agents may be dishonest, and it is therefore necessary to have some security against their being so. This security the Government of the United States could not take of the Vaccine agent. It was because this Government cannot, and the State governments can, properly regulate this matter, that he wished this law to be repealed.

Mr. CONDUCT said, he apprehended the House were about to act hastily, in repealing a law that has been in operation since the year 1813, and which was enacted with due deliberation. In Europe, such is the confidence in vaccination, as a prevention of small pox, that the Governments compel their subjects, under severe penalties, to be vaccinated. But, under our free Government, no compulsory measures can be resorted to; and he agreed with the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. BURTON,) that the State governments are the most competent to legislate upon these subjects. We may, however, lend the aid of this Government by the appointment of an agent to furnish an ample supply of vaccine matter, and distribute it to those who may apply through the Post Office Department, free of postage. When the law now proposed to be repealed was first enacted, in 1813, it was the opinion of many respectable members, that the best plan would be to give the agent a salary to compensate him for his services, and cause him to distribute the matter gratuitously to every applicant. Others, however, doubted the Constitutional power of Congress to apply the public money in this way, and the law now proposed to be repealed was passed. While he would applaud the deep interest and solicitude of the gentleman from North Carolina, for the health and lives of his neighbors, he would ask of the House to pause and reflect, before they decide, under the excited feelings of a moment, to lessen public confidence in the efficiency of a remedy against the greatest scourge which was ever visited upon the human family. Would it not be a matter worthy of inquiry, whether, instead of repealing the law, and thus subjecting the people to the additional expense of postage, it would not be better policy to modify the law so as to authorize the appointment of an increased number of agents in different parts of the country for the more extensive diffusion of the benefits of vaccination? Would it not be good policy so to regulate the Army and Navy as to compel every new recruit, every cadet in the Academy, and every midshipman and marine in the Navy, to be vaccinated? The President of the United States has already dismissed the agent, in consequence of the violent prejudices against him, growing out of his unfortunate mistake in sending the small-pox virus to North Carolina. Is not this a sufficient punishment for a single error? And who among us claims exemption from error? Who among us does not claim the privilege of being mistaken? Mr. C. said, he would venture to assert that fifty thousand souls at least, and more, probably one hundred thousand, have received from this agent the benefits of vaccination, through the instru-mentality of this law, which you are now about to repeal. He hoped the House would pause and reflect before they decide; and, for the purpose of affording time, he moved that the bill be postponed to the first day of the ensuing session of Congress.

Mr. WHIPPLE, as one of the committee which reported this bill, gave the House his reasons for favoring it. He paid a tribute of respect to the motives of the act of 1813, establishing the Vaccine agency; but did not think that the views of the authors of it had been realized. He stated the actual operation of the act, which had been to tax the people at large for the profit of the agent, who drew it from them by virtue of the monopoly which Congress had thus granted to him. It was in evidence, before the committee, that, under the Vaccine agency, something like forty-five thousand dollars had been drawn, by the agent, from different quarters of the Union. From all the facts, and comparing the benefits received with the cost, &c., Mr. W. said it was doubted by the committee, whether the institution had produced any real benefit to the country. From inquiries made by the committee, it appeared to them that comparatively little good had proceeded from it; and that individual interest would do more on this subject towards the promotion of vaccination, the preservation of matter, &c., if left free to all, than could be done by any legislation by Congress. If the institution were to continue, the committee were of opinion that the law ought to be modified, &c., so as to make the agent more responsible for the performance of the duties understood to be devolved upon him by it.

Mr. WRIGHT adverted to the inconveniences experienced before the discovery and general diffusion of vaccination, to show how important it was to cherish and protect it. He reviewed the evils of the small pox, and the great blessing, comfort, and cheapness, of vaccination, as a preventive. He expressed his doubts, indeed, whether the small pox had been sent to North Carolina by Dr. Smith, who had every motive to prevent his sending it; and thought it more likely to have been introduced by the North Carolina doctors, whose interest it was to have the people as sick as they could be. The nation, he concluded, was bound to diffuse such a blessing as vaccination by every possible means; and he therefore hoped that this bill would not pass, but that another agent would be appointed, &c.

Mr. TOP asked, whether it was not a fact that a question had been raised as to the efficacy of vaccination? Whether there were not some doctors, or quacks, who pretend that vaccination is wholly useless? He knew, he said, that there were people in this country who went about preaching to that effect, and that the old fashioned small pox was the only thing at last. Now, if you repeal this law, said Mr. T., will it not be supposed that the whole Legislature has lost confidence in vaccination? He asked another question—whether vaccination had not, since its introduction among us, saved a great many lives? Whether there did not die of small pox, before the introduction of vaccination, more persons in six months than now die in ten years? If this question was answered in the affirmative, he would ask another—whether the question of the repeal of the act establishing the Vaccine agency be not a very serious one? He knew that Congress could not compel an agent to perform the duties, by punishment for failure, &c., but, he asked, if the accident had not happened in North Carolina, should we have ever heard of the repeal of that law? If so, ought the House, from a momentary irritation, to repeal the law? If we are to legislate on this principle, said Mr. T., it is very well we have not authority to regulate steamboats; for, not long ago a steamboat burst her boiler on the Mississippi or the Ohio, and killed or wounded sixteen persons. A horrible accident! And if this House had had the power to regulate steamboats, and any member from the West had moved, in consequence of this accident to his constituents, to prohibit their use altogether, Mr. T. contended it would have been just as reasonable as to pass this bill, &c. He repeated the idea that Congress ought not, at this moment, to throw its authority into the scale against vaccination; and he therefore hoped the bill would not pass.

Appropriation Bill.

APRIL, 1822.

Mr. BURTON said, that no one doubted the efficacy of vaccination. It was believed in before the act of 1813 passed, and would be equally confided in after its repeal.

Mr. EUSTIS briefly delivered his sentiments on the subject of the bill. He was opposed to the postponement, because the office of agent being now vacant, the question to abolish it could be decided on the abstract question of its utility, without reference to the individual filling it. The whole subject of vaccination, he said, was always, in his opinion, one of those which are best left to the States, the medical faculty, and the people. The motives of the law, he knew, were benevolent, and he would not say that it might not have had some little beneficial effect. But it constitutes a monopoly, and discourages medical men, who are acquainted with the subject, from exerting themselves in promoting vaccination. The very reason that had been urged for retaining the agency, viz., that this agent would preserve the vaccine matter when others would not, was the very reason why he objected to it. All physicians ought fully to understand the subject; and they will make it their business to do so when it becomes their interest, by the abolition of the present monopoly. If the exclusive care of it be given to one, it will never be generally understood. In the general doctrine of the efficacy of vaccination, all Europe and this country were agreed. There is, however, in man a propensity, when a thing is done to his hand to take it as he finds it; and our physicians, therefore, have not of late sufficiently attended to this important subject. The very debate of to-day shows that this ought never to have been a subject of legislation. It is professional entirely; and it could not be expected that the President should be competent to select for the agency, if suffered to continue, the person best fitted for it by professional acquirements. This Government, Mr. E.

said, was instituted to collect revenue, to provide for the public defence, and pay the public debts. How far it had departed from that limited sphere of action he would not now inquire, but it was certainly at fault when it undertook to regulate any part of the practice of medicine. After some other remarks, Mr. E. said, in conclusion, that it was very important that the medical faculty should be taught to take and preserve this matter, and that they never would do so unless this agency was abolished.

Mr. WOOD professed himself satisfied that the General Government ought never to have undertaken to legislate on this matter, and that the act establishing the agency ought to be repealed.

The question was then taken on postponing the bill to the next session, and decided in the negative.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill, and was decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 57, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Archer, Barber of Connecticut, Bassett, Baylies, Blackledge, Blair, Breckenridge, Brown, Burrows, Burton, Butler, Cambreleng, Campbell of New York, Campbell of Ohio, Cannon, Cassidy, Chambers, Cocke, Conkling, Conner, Crudup, Cushman, Dane, Darlington, Denison, Dwight, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Eustis, Findlay, Floyd, Garnett, Gilmer, Gist, Gross, Hall, Hardin, Harvey, Hill, Hobart, Holcombe, Hooks, Hubbard, F. So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1822," were read, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

APRIL, 1822.

Appropriation Bill.

H. OF R.

[Mr. TRIMBLE made an attempt to get the bill for erecting toll-gates on the Cumberland Road, referred to the same committee, but failed.]

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the aforesaid amendments.

The amendment by the Senate to appropriate $1,000 for the Public Library, was concurred in; and the further amendment to provide for the usual payment to clerks in the Treasurer's department being under consideration, and a letter having been read from the Secretary of the Treasury, decidedly recommending the same, Mr. COCKE opposed the concurrence, on the ground that the number of clerks had increased, whilst the extent of their duties had diminished.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, expressed their sentiments in favor of the concurrence, when the question was taken thereon, and carried—ayes 65, noes 46.

The amendment to appropriate $40,000 for surveying certain public lands in 1821, was disagreed to without discussion.

The amendment proposing an additional appropriation to run the boundary line (to carry into effect the treaty) between this country and the now, or late, dominions of Spain, being under consideration—

Mr. COCKE opposed the concurrence, on the ground that, if this appropriation should be made, a commissioner would doubtless be appointed for that service by our Government, whether he is allowed to go on and perform his duties or not; and he thought it would be inconsistent with our own act, by which we had recognised the independence of Mexico, to make at this time an appropriation to run a line under authority of a treaty with Spain, when, by that act, we have said that she no longer retains any authority over that province.

Mr. WALWORTH was also opposed to a concurrence, and, in addition to the remarks from the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. COCKE,) he thought an appropriation at this time would be altogether unnecessary—and by the next year, should the Mexican Government, having become tranquilized and settled, agree to run the line between this Government and that, it will then be time enough to make the appropriation.

Mr. BURTON advocated the appropriation on the ground that the Government had entered into a solemn obligation with Spain to run the line, and an agent for that purpose had been already appointed by the Government of that kingdom. Should Mexico interfere and prevent the execution of that engagement, it would then become a matter merely between Mexico and us. We have only to perform our engagements, and he hoped, especially under the circumstances of our present relations with the Spanish Government, that no additional or real cause of complaint would be given to that Power.

Mr. FLOYD remarked that he was not in the House at the time this bill was originally passed; but he thought it very singular to appropriate a sum for the recognition of Mexican independence, and at the same time to appropriate another sum to run a line between that country and this, under authority of a treaty with Spain, from which we admit that province has been severed. He thought it would almost render us ridiculous to adopt such a course. He was also opposed to the measure, on the ground that it was an amendment which came from the Senate at a late period of the session; and he referred to a similar case in the last year, in which the very existence of a treaty was unknown to this House, until it was called on, by an amendment from the Senate, to make an appropriation for carrying it into effect. Mr. F. also thought there would be no violation of good faith, on the part of this Government, in withholding the appropriation, inasmuch as Spain had omitted, for a longer time than the treaty stipulated, to appoint the officer to accomplish that object.

Mr. FULLER could see no advantage in making the appropriation, even should Mexico permit us to go on in running the line; but he thought there was danger that, in attempting it, we should come into collision with that Government. It seems to be inviting a controversy which we ought to be most solicitous to avoid.

Mr. A. SMYTH made a few remarks on the subject, in the course of which he expressed the opinion that, whenever the line was run, it should be in conjunction with Mexico, and not with Spain.

Mr. WOOD observed that a great part of the line which was to be run, was between this Government and Texas; that Texas was a distinct province from Mexico—not under its present jurisdiction—and we had no knowledge that it would finally accede to or connect itself with the new form of government which had been adopted in the late provinces.

Mr. POINSETT contended that independent Mexico would be bound by the line that should be run between that province and the United States, under our treaty with Spain; and he thought it was incumbent upon us to preserve inviolate the faith which we had pledged in that treaty.

Mr. COCKE moved to amend the amendment, so as to provide that the commissioner and surveyor should not receive any compensation, until they should have entered on their respective duties. The motion prevailed; and, after further remarks on the amendment of the Senate, as amended, in which Mr. NELSON of Maryland, Mr. FLOYD, Mr. RHEA, Mr. BURTON, and Mr. FARRELLY, participated, the question was taken on agreeing to the same, and decided in the negative—ayes 57, noes 69.

So the House disagreed to the amendment of the Senate, and subsequently to the amendments appropriating compensation to the Commissioner of Public Buildings; increasing that of William Elliot, an assistant employed in ascertaining the longitude of the Capitol; and for repairs to the Cumberland road.

On the latter question a debate of some length arose: in which the concurrence was advocated by Mr. STEWART, and incidentally by Mr. TRIMBLE, and opposed by Mr. STEVENSON and Mr. BALDWIN.

The first amendment of the Senate to the proviso which directs a retention of salaries, &c., from those who are in arrears to the Government, being under consideration—

Mr. H. NELSON rose, he said, to vindicate the character of this House and of the Chief Magistrate of the country from the aspersions which he understood were in circulation out of doors in reference to this subject. It had been rumored that this proviso was introduced for the purpose of preventing the Chief Magistrate from receiving his salary, on the ground of alleged arrears in his account which accrued from his former mission to the Court of France. To repel that imputation, so unworthy of the dignity of the House, he had addressed a letter to the Comptroller of the Treasury for information on the subject; from whom, in reply, he had received a copy of the account current with Mr. Monroe, which he wished might be read to the House, to show that no arrearages were due from the Chief Magistrate.

The letter of the Comptroller was read by the Clerk, and a letter from Mr. Monroe, with a reply, were also presented to be read, when—

Mr. STEVENSON rose, and said, he thought the reading was superfluous. He was satisfied on the subject, and had heard no whisper of such a rumor as his colleague had mentioned.

A number of gentlemen of the House also disclaimed having heard any such rumor.

Mr. COCKE averred, that, when he made the motion, he had no reference to any individual of the whole human family. He was led to it from examining the published list of unsettled balances.

Mr. NELSON said that he was far from imputing the origin of the rumor to any member of the House; and it was only for the purpose of vindicating the character of the House from such an imputation that he had addressed the Committee on the subject. Mr. N. insisted upon the reading of the letters, on which a question of order arose, and the reading was decided to be not in order.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the amendment of the Senate, and lost.

A subsequent amendment of the Senate to the same proviso, stipulating that it should not extend to such defaulters as became so by the depreciation of Treasury notes, was agreed to.

The Committee then rose, and reported their proceedings.

In the House, the respective amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole were agreed to; and the disagreements to the amendments of the Senate, which the Committee of the Whole had reported, were also confirmed.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill making further appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1822.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. ROSS to the amendment of Mr. COCKE, limiting allowances to the Governors of Territories for extra services as Superintendents of Indian Affairs, to future operation, without reference to the past.

Mr. LINCOLN opposed the amendment, on the ground that, if such allowance should be refused, it would create the necessity of a special local agency, at great expense, to do those duties which the Governor now performs. Mr. L. took an extended view of the subject, in the course of which he was called to order by the Chairman of the Committee, as wandering from the point under consideration.

Mr. LINCOLN appealed from the decision of the Chair, and the decision of the Chair was overruled by the Committee. Mr. L. then pursued his remarks, and continued the debate for nearly an hour, in support of the character and services of Governor Cass, and of the inexpediency of adopting the present motion.

Mr. GILMER replied to the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. LINCOLN,) in an animated speech of considerable length, and adverted with historical minuteness to the expenditures referred to. He pointed out the abuses in the Indian department, which, in his opinion, required correction; disclaimed any personal reference to Governor Cass, but directed his observations to the system under which he acted.

Mr. FLOYD was in favor of the motion, and submitted a variety of observations on the general policy of the Indian department, as it had been hitherto conducted. In the course of his remarks, he said that all the Indians east of the Rocky Mountains, did not exceed, (according to the Missionary accounts,) 260,000. A vast proportion of these, the United States had no intercourse with. Of the residue, Major O'Fallon, on whose activity, fidelity, intelligence, and zeal, he thought as much reliance could be placed, as on those of any other Indian agent, had charge of no less than 42,000 at the Council Bluffs. Yet this Government was charged with the expense of supporting a vast number of agencies, where the number of Indians superintended was comparatively very small. Mr. F. also adverted to the nature of the claim now made on the House. Formerly, he observed, the House of Representatives were inquired of, Whether, if a treaty should be formed, they would make appropriations to carry it into effect. Now, the language of the Senate was—we have made a treaty, and you must appropriate the sums which we have rendered necessary to comply with it. Mr. F. utterly disclaimed any personal reference to Governor Cass.

Mr. VANCE made a spirited reply to the observations that had been made with respect to the Governor of Michigan. He adverted to the Cherokee agency, (Mr. Crowell's,) where $1,800 was given to the agent, which was within $200 of the whole sum that Government was willing to allow to Governor Cass for exercising the duties, not only of Indian superintendent, but of Governor of the Territory of Michigan. He also alluded to the dearth of living at Detroit, which he said was as expensive as at Florida, or any other point of the Union. He took an extensive and comparative view of the Southern and Northern Indian agencies, and thought the latter were as little chargeable with extravagance as the former.

On motion of Mr. BALDWIN, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, April 24.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to provide for annuities to the Ottowas, Pottawatamies, Kickapoos, Choctaws, Kaskaskias, to Mushalutubbee, and to carry into effect the treaty of Saginaw; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the building of lighthouses therein mentioned, and for other purposes," reported the same with amendments; which were committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARDIN, from the committee appointed on the 18th of February last, to inquire what retrenchment can be made in the expenditures of the Government, further reported, in part, a bill to reduce the annual compensation of certain officers of Government; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALEX. SMYTH, pursuant to notice, asked leave to introduce a bill to allow persons not residing within the District of Columbia, and against whom judgments shall have been obtained therein, the benefit of the law for the relief of insolvent debtors, in like manner as the same is allowed to persons residing within the same District.

Leave was given, and a committee of three was appointed thereon.

Mr. KENT moved for the consideration of the bill from the Senate, to authorize the corporation of the city of Washington to drain the low grounds, and to ornament the public reservations in the said city.

The House agreed to consider the same.

Mr. MALLARY rose, and made an exposition of difficulties which, in his view, stood in the way of this bill. The first was, that the bill contemplated an important change in the plan of the city, which might have a material effect on the public property; and the other was, that it went to affect the contract between the United States and the original proprietors of the ground on which the city stands—one of the conditions of which was, that the ground which it is proposed by this bill to sell out for building lots, should be reserved for public purposes, or remain forever vacant; and that to devote it to other purposes, would give them a claim to indemnity, &c. These considerations, he argued, ought to induce the House to hesitate in deciding on it. He therefore moved to postpone the bill to the first day of the next session of Congress.

A motion was made, which superseded Mr.

MALLARY's motion, viz: to lay the bill on the table; and the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from the third, sixth, seventh, and eleventh of their amendments to the bill of this House, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1822;" and insist on the fourth, fifth, and ninth of their amendments to the said bill. The Senate have passed bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: An act restoring to the ship Diana the privileges of a sea-letter vessel; and, An act making appropriations for the public buildings, with amendment. They have also passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the better organization of the District Court of the United States, within the State of Louisiana; An act for the relief of Clarence Mulford; An act for the benefit of Thomas Pendergrass; An act for the relief of John Baptist Belfort and others; and, An act for the relief of Daniel Cooper; in which amendments and five bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

COMPENSATION BILLS.

Mr. HARDIN then moved, according to notice, to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the three bills reported by the Committee on Retrenchment, so as to bring them, and particularly the Congress-pay bill, immediately before the House.

Mr. LONG hoped the Committee of the Whole would not be discharged from the further consideration of the bill. For, said he, if it should now be taken up, he thought it would be disposed of in about the same way that most of the bills have been that have been reported, and been before us this session, acted upon in part, and left with the unfinished business. He presumed it was the object of the committee that reported that bill, to go into a general retrenchment. It was also the object of this House, he believed, and not to stop at merely reducing the pay of the members, clerks, and doorkeepers, of this House. He hoped we should have the whole plan of retrenchment in view, when it should be taken up, so that we may adopt a just and equitable system of retrenchment. If this bill should now be taken up, he believed that we should neither finally act upon it, nor any other, this session. He therefore hoped that the few remaining days of this session would be occupied in acting upon some of the bills that have been for so long the orders of the day for "to-morrow," and that we should not be quite all the session preparing business, and finally acting upon none.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, said, the subject of their own pay ought not to engage the House in a very long discussion. It was a subject on which he presumed every man had made up his mind. He submitted to the House but this one observation: if the House was disposed to reduce the pay of members of Congress, it would be much more becoming in the members of this House to undertake that task for themselves, than to pass a law at the next session, to operate upon their successors.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland submitted to the gentleman from Kentucky, whether it would not be better to progress with the unfinished business before the House, and get through with that before they undertook any other. He was much afraid, if a different course was pursued, the House would not get through with the appropriation bill this session. Notwithstanding his friend from North Carolina supposed there would be no discussion on the compensation bill, Mr. S. said he would find that this would give rise to a great deal of discussion, and that amendment after amendment would be proposed to the bill. It was but fair to the Committee of Ways and Means to go on and finish their bill first.

Mr. CAMBRELENG was in favor of taking up these bills, and discussing them and he was in favor of passing the bill for reducing the pay of the members of Congress, which had been particularly referred to. When the pay was raised, five or six years ago, scarcely any reason was assigned for it, or could be; and he was in favor of restoring the practice of the Government for twenty or thirty years preceding.

Mr. WRIGHT denied that the pay of members had been raised without reason, and made a number of remarks against taking up this subject now. If gentlemen thought their services were not worth eight dollars, let them give place to others, or display their philanthropy by bestowing on charitable objects what they received beyond their merits. The gentleman from New York could see no reason for the late increase of the pay of members; but, Mr. W. said, he could give him twenty reasons for it. Do the people now ask Congress to reduce their own compensation? Why disturb the nation at this moment on this subject? How ridiculous was it for the members to say their services are not worth eight dollars per day, at the same time that compensation at the rate of twenty or thirty dollars per day was given to our judges. The efforts, or pretended efforts, to diminish the expenses of the Government, Mr. W. said, all had an eye to popularity. [For this remark Mr. W. was called to order.] He said he had done nothing more than state conclusions, which naturally flowed from the premises. For himself, he said he lost a fortune by becoming a member of Congress, being at the time he was first elected engaged in a practice worth two thousand pounds per year. He briefly reviewed his public life, the former compensation law, the clamor against it, and the manner in which he had met it, by quoting the pay of the judges, who performed duties much less laborious, and much less momentous than those of a member of Congress. Mr. W. concluded by saying, that those who were for reducing their own pay, must follow very literally the scriptural injunction, to humble themselves that they may be exalted.

Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, considered the subject now proposed to be acted upon, to be of such importance that it ought not to be acted upon out of the usual course of things, which was to discuss it in Committee of the Whole. In a matter of so much solemnity, he said, he was opposed to acting with precipitation.

The question was then taken on discharging the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of the retrenchment bills, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 105, nays 38.

The three bills being thus before the House, On motion of Mr. HARDIN, that for reducing the compensation of Senators and Representatives in Congress was first read.

[This bill provides that the daily pay of the members of the Senate, from and after the present session of Congress, shall be six dollars, and the like allowance shall be made for every twenty miles travel to and from Congress. The bill contains like provisions as to the members of the House of Representatives; and also proposes considerably to reduce the compensation of the officers of both Houses.]

Mr. MCCOY moved to lay these bills on the table, in order to take up the bill, in the discussion of which the House had been engaged for several days. The motion was negatived.

Mr. McLANE made a motion to amend the bill so as to make it take effect from and after the present session, instead of from and after the passage of this law. But, after some conversation on the amendment, between Messrs. WALWORTH, McLANE, SMITH, of Maryland, and TRACY, Mr. McLANE withdrew his motion for amendment.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, moved to strike out, from the part of the bill which relates to the pay of the Senate, that part which provides that "no daily allowance shall ever be made, in case of inability to attend, except when the Senate shall be in session." This proviso he considered unreasonable and disrespectful to the Senate.

Mr. MALLARY here renewed the motion for the previous question.

The House did not sustain the motion.

Mr. HARDIN then replied to the objections of Mr. EDWARDS to the particular clause of the bill referred to, and stated the object of this proviso to be to prevent members from hanging on here after the end of the session, on the plea of sickness, and claiming and receiving pay therefor. Another proviso in the bill was intended to prevent members remaining at home, and pleading sickness, and receiving daily pay while at home; which he understood had been done in more than one instance.

Mr. EDWARDS said, that he and the gentleman did not in the least differ, it appeared, as to what the bill ought to be, but he thought the phraseology went further than that.

After some further conversation, as to the proper phraseology of the amendment—

Mr. COOK said he was opposed to the amendment in any shape. He could not consent to vote for any proposition avowedly placed on so humiliating a ground as that a man, chosen by the free-men of the country to represent them, would debase himself so far as to remain in this city after the adjournment of Congress, for the purpose of drawing daily pay during his stay, and getting then a certificate from some quack or other, in order to get his account passed. There might be cases of persons taken sick while attending here, and who could not get home. In such cases, Mr. C. contended, reason and justice required that their expenses should be defrayed by the public.

Mr. WRIGHT also opposed the amendment on nearly the same grounds, and because, if any man was mean enough to counterfeit sickness to get pay, he would, after this amendment was adopted, have only to go some thirty or forty miles from the city, and thus appear to be taken sick on the road. But he did not believe that any such cases had occurred as those which the gentleman from Kentucky had alluded to.

Mr. HARDIN replied. If the House was disposed to allow to a man daily pay after a session was ended, whether sick or pretending to be sick, the gentlemen were right, and the bill and amendment were wrong. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois, who would not vote for the amendment because it supposed the possibility of corruption in this House, Mr. H. said the gentleman had altered his language since the first part of this session. Then, we were to act from time to time by wholesale, not by retail, as now proposed, to prevent corruption from getting into the House. Whilst he did not believe that the House was composed of corruptible men, he thought they were much like the rest of mankind; in regard to whom it had been always thought best not to place them in the way of temptation.

Mr. MILNOR was opposed as well to the proviso as to the amendment. It went upon a principle new to our laws, which now recognise the principle that those who are taken sick whilst in the public employ should be supported as though in health. It was hard enough, he said, for a man who is in the service of the country to be taken sick, and suffer the pains of sickness, without being obliged to pay the cost of it out of his private purse. Mr. M. said, that, when formerly in Congress, he had been a member of the Committee of Accounts, before whom all the accounts of the members pass in review. He never had known, during the years he served in that capacity, a single instance of any man demanding pay for any portion of time that he had been confined at home by sickness; and he never heard of such a thing until it was suggested this morning by the gentleman from Kentucky. He could not believe that such a case ever did exist. Sure he was, that, during the time he was a member of the Committee of Accounts, no such thing did occur.

The question on Mr. EDWARDS'S motion was then determined in the affirmative.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to amend the bill so as to reduce the mileage from six dollars for every twenty miles travelling to six dollars for every forty miles; and made a number of observations in support of the motion.

Mr. VAN WYCK again required the previous question, to prevent unnecessary consumption of time; but the House refused to sustain the call.

Mr. FLOYD, after expressing his general views favorable to this bill, as the foundation of a system of retrenchment of expenses, which he sincerely believed to be necessary, objected to the proposed reduction of the mileage. Those who travelled far on horseback could not perform a long journey at the rate of forty miles a day, unless happily blessed with the constitution and vigor of the gentleman from Maryland. For those who had nothing to do but to throw themselves on board a steamboat and go to sleep, to be sure, the proposed allowance might be sufficient, but it was very different in regard to those who travel by hard journeys from the interior.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he always had thought the mileage too high; and proposed to his colleague to move thirty instead of forty miles, as he had proposed, for six dollars.

This modification was accepted by Mr. WRIGHT.

Mr. HARDIN said it was not the object of the Committee of Retrenchment to pull down the established order of things, but to reduce them, in consequence of the straitened finances of the country, to what they were eight or ten years ago. He was therefore opposed to this motion; and he called upon gentlemen not to be led away by the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, who was, as far as he could collect his views, opposed to the whole system of retrenchment. He did verily believe, he said, that nothing could save the nation from direct taxation but a retrenchment of the public expenses, and that the members of the House ought, in setting about it, to begin with themselves. He was therefore opposed to any amendment which might, like this, have a tendency to defeat the bill.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, said that, though the House had refused to sanction the previous question, it seemed that it was to be imposed in effect by the course which he had indicated. No amendment was to be allowed to the bill, and no objection was to be heard to it, because gentlemen were opposed to it in principle. Now, Mr. N. said, to show that he was as friendly to retrenchment as the gentleman from Kentucky, he now gave notice that he should move an amendment to the bill, which he was surprised the gentleman himself had not incorporated in it, to make this bill take effect from the commencement of this Congress.

Mr. BALDWIN wished distinctly to know on what principles the present bill was presented to the House. It was said by the gentleman from Kentucky to be a part of the system of retrenchment called for by the state of the finances of the country, as presented by his committee. Mr. B. wished to know from other gentlemen whether they had any other system of revenue to present, that the House might, by a comparison of different views, know whether this retrenchment was necessary. [The SPEAKER required Mr. B. to confine himself to the amendment.] Mr. B. then asked, further, whether it was the intention of gentlemen to establish, for the first time, a distinction between the mileage and daily pay of the members. Was the mileage predicated upon the actual expenses incurred on the road? Were eight dollars per day now allowed because members were supposed to expend that much? Not so, but on the principle of allowing for time consumed as well as for expenses incurred. Mr. B. compared this allowance with what was made to officers of the Army, &c., to show that it ought not to be reduced as proposed.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said he intended to vote for this bill, because he did not choose to be on one side of any question, respecting which the people were on the other side; and he should vote for the thirty miles being allowed for a day's travel, because he thought it was a pretty fair allowance. His views upon the subject of retrenchment, however, did not exactly square with those of the gentlemen who generally supported this bill, and on a proper occasion he should show in what they differed.

Mr. WRIGHT spoke at some length in support of his amendment. The principal argument he urged in favor of his motion was, that the expense and difficulty of travelling had been lessened in a much greater degree than it was now proposed to reduce the allowance for mileage, and that, as it now stood, members residing at a distance drew a much greater sum of money for their attendance on Congress than any others.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was in favor of this reduction, that the compensation to members might, in some degree, be equalized. Under the present system, the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. HARDIN) got, in a session of ninety days, for his pay and mileage, $400 more, at six dollars per day, than he (Mr. S.) would receive at eight dollars per day.

Mr. SERGEANT assigned the reason why he was opposed to the amendment. He went upon the ground that the original principle, upon which the pay and mileage were fixed at the same rate, was, that the allowance for mileage should bear the same relation to the expenses of travelling that the daily pay did to the expenses of living here. In speaking to this point, Mr. S. said it was one which in no manner concerned him personally; but he wished it to be settled on just principles.

Mr. TRACY declared himself in favor of this bill as a part of a system of retrenchment, in regard to which the House would find its course much more clear and easy after passing this bill. With regard to the particular amendment now proposed, he said he would vote for it, being favorable to it on principle, if he did not believe the adoption of it would defeat the bill. He begged, therefore, of gentlemen who were really favorable to the bill, not to vote for such amendments to it as were calculated to make it obnoxious.

Mr. WOODCOCK could not understand why his colleague should so far distrust the House as to refuse to do what was right lest the House should hereafter do what was wrong. He had never discovered such a perversity of disposition in the House; and he should vote on this proposition with reference to its real merits, as it appeared to him other gentlemen ought also to do.

The question on amending the bill so as to reduce the allowance to members for mileage to six dollars for every thirty miles' travelling, was then taken and decided as follows, in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 74.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLOYD then moved to amend the bill so as to postpone its operation to the first day of July next.

On this motion a desultory debate took place, occasionally verging on the main principle of the bill, and incidentally involving the question whether or not the proposed reduction was a violation of the contract under which the members have attended; in which Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, GORHAM, WRIGHT, WARFIELD, SMYTH, OVERSTREET, WHIPPLE, WOODSON, MITCHELL, of South Carolina, and BALDWIN, took part.

On motion of Mr. BALDWIN, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, moved to amend the amendment so as to provide that the reduction should take effect from the first day of July last.

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered, and the motion was supported by Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, and opposed by Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, Mr. RHEA, Mr. FLOYD, and Mr. WRIGHT, but, before any question was taken thereon—

Mr. BUTLER moved to recommit the bill to the committee that reported it, with instructions to report at the next session of Congress whether

Mr. BUTLER supported his motion at considerable length, and Mr. ROSS opposed it.

Mr. TRACY called for the yeas and nays, which were taken as follows:

The question was then put on agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, and was also decided in the negative—yeas 35, nays 121, as follows:

The original motion to amend by Mr. FLOYD, was next in order, and was taken, without further debate, by yeas and nays, as follows:

So the amendment was agreed, to and the House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 25.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the representatives of John Donnelson, Thomas Carr, and others," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the committee of conference appointed on the part of this House, to attend a conference with the conferees appointed on the part of the Senate upon the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment proposed by this House to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of this House entitled "An act to provide for paying to the State of Missouri three per cent. on the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands within the same," made a report, which was ordered to lie on the table.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act restoring to the ship Diana the privileges of a sea-letter vessel," was read, and concurred in by the House.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Alzira Dibrel and Sophia Hancock was read a third time and passed.

The following bills from the Senate were twice read and referred to their appropriate committees, viz: A bill for the better organization of the district court of the United States within the State of Louisiana; a bill for the relief of Clarence Mulford; a bill for the benefit of Thomas Pendergrass; a bill for the relief of John Baptist Belfort and others; and a bill for the relief of David Cooper.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 29th January last, requesting the President of the United States to cause to be communicated to that House certain information relative to the claim made by Jonathan Carver to certain lands within the United States near the falls of St. Anthony, I now transmit a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which, with the accompanying documents, contain all the information on this subject, in the possession of the Executive.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, April 23, 1822.

The Message and report were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SAWYER gave notice that he should, on tomorrow, move for the consideration of a resolution, heretofore submitted by him, convoking the next Congress on the first Monday of November next.

Mr. A. SMYTH moved a resolution, the object of which was, that, from and after the commencement of the next week, after sitting from ten until ten minutes after four o'clock, there should be a recess of the House, on each day, from four until half past five o'clock; and that a motion to adjourn should not then be in order until seven o'clock.

Mr. HARDIN remarked that, as far as his observation extended, the members were not likely, about the hour designated for reassembling, to be in the best possible condition for doing business.

The previous question of consideration being required, was taken, and decided in the negative by a large majority. So the House refused to consider the resolution.

Mr. COCKE moved to discharge the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions from the further consideration of the several petitions referred to them. That committee, he said, had reported a general bill upon the subject, which passed this House, but has been rejected in the Senate. It was impossible for the committee to act specially upon all the petitions at this session, and it was his object that they should be laid on the table till the next session.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. RHEA, and Mr. CAMPBELL of Ohio, the Committee of Ways and Means, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, and the Committee on Private Land Claims, were respectively discharged, also, from the petitions referred to them.

Mr. HEMPHILL rose and said, that so much of the money of the nation had been expended on the Cumberland road, it would not be prudent or provident to suffer it now to go to decay for want of repairs. He therefore moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill providing for the erection of turnpike gates on the Cumberland road, and that the same be laid on the table, that he might have an opportunity of asking the House to act on it at a future day.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, stating that the information which the President of the United States is requested to furnish by a resolution of the House, adopted on the 8th of January last, cannot be prepared in time to be laid before the House before the next session of Congress; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the select committee, to whom that subject was referred, made a report respecting certain fines imposed on the militia of the State of Pennsylvania, concluding with the following resolution, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the uncollected militia fines due from delinquents in the State of Pennsylvania, which have been assessed by courts martial, and all fines collected by the late or present marshals of Pennsylvania, or their deputies, which have not been paid into the Treasury of the United States, or applied to the payment of expenses of courts martial, be transferred to the State of Pennsylvania, with full power to collect the same.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

A message was received from the Senate, returning the bill which originated in the House of Representatives, making appropriations for the public buildings, with an amendment to add $1,250 to graduate and improve the public grounds around the Capitol.

Mr. COCKE moved that the House disagree to the amendment of the Senate. The motion was supported by Mr. VAN WYCK and the mover, and opposed by Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE remarked, that the sum which had been allowed to the person employed in that business, viz., seven hundred and fifty dollars, would be probably sufficient.

The SPEAKER suggested that it was necessary, by the rule, that this question be discussed in a Committee of the Whole before a decision on it; and, thereupon,

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the aforesaid bill.

Mr. COCKE renewed the motion which he had made in the House to disagree to the said amendment.

Mr. MALLARY moved that the Committee rise. This motion was opposed by Mr. COCKE and Mr. TAYLOR, when it was withdrawn by the mover, who observed that he perceived it was leading to a discussion, which was the very thing he intended to avoid.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to strike out that part of the amendment which related to graduating the public ground, which was agreed to—ayes 79.

Mr. ROCHESTER moved to amend the amendment, by striking out $1,250, and to insert in lieu thereof, the sum of $750. After a discussion of the subject, by Messrs. VAN WYCK, KENT, NELSON of Massachusetts, and RHEA, the question was taken, and negatived.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was then agreed to—ayes 68, noes 34, and the Committee rose, and reported the same.

In the House, the decisions in the Committee of the Whole were affirmed—ayes 74.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The message received from the Senate announcing its adherence to the fourth, fifth, and ninth, amendments, which were made by that body to the general appropriation bill, was taken up.

Mr. WALWORTH moved that this House do adhere to its disagreement to the said amendments of the Senate. The question was divided, and the question on insisting on the disagreement to the amendment proposing a provision for running the boundary line between this Government and the late Spanish provinces, being under consideration—

Mr. WALWORTH moved to insist on the disagreement of this House to the said amendment.

Mr. COCKE rose, he said, to state a fact, which would show the inexpediency of concurring in this amendment of the Senate. The time for appointing commissioners to run this line was limited to one year from the date of ratification; that that period had passed, and that Spain had omitted to fulfil the stipulation on her part within the time limited, so that the United States were exonerated from any further obligation to carry it into effect.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, rose to examine the main objection which had been taken to the appropriation now proposed, viz., that the resolution of this House approving the recognition of the independence of the nations of South America, went to preclude the execution of that article of our late treaty with Spain which relates to boundaries. Suppose, he said—what he did not, however, admit—that there was some inconsistency between our act of recognition and that treaty. In that case, which of these acts is binding on us; which has priority? The first of them is the act by which we plighted our faith to Old Spain. It is a compact founded in valid and adequate consideration. We have received, and are in the actual enjoyment of that consideration. And shall we be told, said he, that it is competent for us to rescind an act of plighted faith? To omit the performance of a contract with a foreign Government—on what ground? On the ground of a subsequent voluntary act of our own? Mr. A. said he had heard of a nation being released from the obligations of a treaty, on the ground of an act performed by another party; but this was the first time it had ever been asserted on this floor, or probably on this earth, that you may abrogate your own faith—release yourself from your own obligations by your own act. Such a doctrine could not be justified either here or any where else. Would it be contended that we owed no good faith to Spain? By the same code of morality we may reclaim the very territory which, by that treaty, we have renounced. Mr. A. said he could not believe that gentlemen had taken this view of the subject, or that they would sustain such doctrine.

He had argued thus, he said, on the supposition that there is really something in the act of recognition inconsistent with our treaty obligations with Spain; and even in this case the inference would not be warranted that we had a right to disregard an express stipulation of the treaty. But, he said, that supposition was not a fair and sound one. There was, he contended, no collision between the effect of one act, and the obligation imposed by the other on this Government. No one, Mr. A. said, had more heartily concurred in the vote of recognition than he, and none would more determinately support it in all its consequences. But he could not see that we have by that act brought ourselves into the strange predicament that gentlemen had supposed. If it had been necessary, in order to vote that act of recognition, that we should break the faith of this nation, anxious as he was to witness that recognition—far as he would go, even to war with all Europe in support of it—he, for one, would not have concurred in that act. He would have jeopardized the interests of his country—he would have hazarded war, in order that we might take that stand; but there was one thing he would not have done—he would not have paid for the pleasure of that recognition the faith and honor of this Government. But, as he had before observed, no such consequences were involved in it.

What do we do, said Mr. A., if we agree to this appropriation? Do we undertake to decide between the conflicting rights of Old Spain and Mexico? No; we only say, here runs the line which marks the property of the United States; within this we claim. We run our own boundary. We give up all beyond it as not belonging to the United States, though we have heretofore asserted our title to it. Does this preclude the rights of the Government of Mexico? Our act of recognition binds us to a great deal, but surely never to the extent to which some gentlemen conceive. In making the proposed appropriation, we do not undertake to decide between the rival pretensions of governments, but to do what every individual has a right to do in regard to his own property—that is, to ascertain and mark the bounds of it.

One other consideration connected with this subject appeared to him to be very important, to which he would call the attention of the House. What is the rule of interpretation of treaties, as recognised by all writers on the laws of nations, and by all civilized nations? That every part of a treaty shall respond to the other parts of it; that the failure to perform one part produces a forfeiture of the other. Well, without any act on the part of Spain, we refuse to comply with a positive stipulation which has been made on our part. It was very true, Mr. A. said, that we are in possession and enjoyment of Florida; it was very true, that it was not within the competency of Old Spain to wrench from us this consideration. But he did assert, that if we took the course of refusing to execute our part of the treaty, Spain would stand justified in wresting Florida from our hands, if she had the power to do so. We now refuse to give to her the very ground of consideration on which she made the cession. We get all that we were to have; we establish a military force around the territory; we place in it civil and military authorities, and then we refuse to Spain the consideration on which she concedes it to us—and why? Because she has done any thing wrong—because we have any ground of complaint against her? No; because we have done something since, and that a voluntary act on our part, inconsistent with our faith to Spain! This was the strongest side of the argument against the appropriation. It was impossible, it appeared to him, in any view of it, that the House could oppose the appropriation proposed by the Senate.

Mr. HARDIN, of Kentucky, said he understood the object of those who were for disagreeing to this amendment was to postpone the subject to the next session, in order to ascertain with certainty whether Texas forms a part of the Government of Mexico, and whether this arrangement of boundary should not be made with the new government, and not with the Government of Spain. The argument of the gentleman from Virginia was very correct, if his first position had been so; but, like Archimedes, who could have moved the earth had he but a place to stand on, the gentleman from Virginia could not move the earth because he had not a place to stand on. Now, Mr. H. said, if our contract with Spain, by the treaty, had been to pay her a sum of money, however Spain might afterwards have been cut up, that part of the nation over which her sovereignty remains is the part to which the stipulation must be performed. But the contract for the boundary line was a contract to operate in rem. It was a contract entirely of a local character, and not an executory one, such as a payment of money. The proposition of the gentleman from New York Mr. H. considered a very correct one. We all recognise the right of a people to establish what government they please —to dissolve their government, or to make half a dozen governments in the place of one. I understand, said he, that we have specially recognised the Government of Mexico. With what government, then, are we to adjust the boundary between us and Mexico? I agree we cannot dissolve a contract with Spain; but the part of a contract which is of a local character, must, Spain being cut up into several governments, be performed to the government where the land lies. Mexico is an independent government, and Texas is a part of it. With whom, then, are we to adjust the boundary line? With Old Spain? No; with the Government of Mexico. The proposition of the gentleman from New York is to postpone a decision on this subject; to wait to see whether the Government of Mexico is organized, and, if so, to adjust the boundary with the new government, and not with the old. Will an adjustment of the line with Old Spain be obligatory on the Empire of Mexico? No; it will not.

Mr. H. agreed with the gentleman from Virginia in his positions; but, he said, they would not apply to the present question. A solemn vote of this House had been passed, with but one dissenting voice, that Mexico is an independent empire, and the contract for boundary must inure to her benefit, she, and not Spain, having now an interest in it.

Mr. WOODSON, of Kentucky, said, that, on the subject of this appropriation, when lately before the House, he had voted, with a great majority of the House, against this appropriation, because he thought there was an inconsistency between it and the vote to recognise the independence of Mexico. But, since that time, he had turned his attention to the best authority upon the subject of national law—he had consulted Vattel, and from what was laid down in that book, he had become perfectly convinced that it was the duty of the House to make the appropriation, and to do every thing on its part to carry the contract into effect. It would not be controverted, that the Government of Mexico was bound to carry into effect our contract with Old Spain, and to carry it into effect literally. But, Mr. W. said, he would suggest this idea, and he was confident it would have its weight with every gentleman in this House: Considering the delicacy of our situation with respect to Spain, although he was disposed to meet with firmness the course which Spain might take in consequence of the recognition of the independence of Mexico, &c., we ought not to give to her any just cause of complaint. The honor of our country, too, is at stake in this matter, requiring a compliance with the treaty. In that treaty there is an express stipulation that we will release all our right in certain boundaries on the side of the province of Texas, in consideration of the release, by Spain, of all her interest in the Floridas. Was it not a proper subject of consideration for us, whether we would violate the contract on our part? Mr. W. asked the gentleman from Kentucky, as a lawyer, what would excuse him, a private individual, from the performance of a contract of this kind? His own voluntary act cannot; and nothing but an act of God, or the force of an enemy, can excuse us. The hindrance to the execution of a treaty must be produced, in the language of the books, by the King's enemies—that is, adapting the language to our condition, by the enemies of this Republic. No such impediment, nor any act of God, now intervenes. We ought to bring the matter to this solemn test. If, by the treaty, we are bound to appoint commissioners for a special purpose, let them proceed to discharge the duty described in that compact. If they are met by actual force in Mexico, then it will be time to stop. By that prevention, and by nothing less, shall we be relieved from our obligation to Spain. By our act of recognition we do not intermeddle in the concerns of Mexico and Spain. Old Spain contends that Mexico still belongs to her. A solemn act of the Cortes declares, that they do not intend, voluntarily, to relinquish their claim upon their American territories. Our declaration is but an expression of our opinion; and, whatever it be, being our own act, cannot release us. According to national law, and the code of principles which govern treaties, the United States are not exonerated from the performance of the conditions of the treaty. Mr. W., therefore, hoped the appropriation would be made, as proposed by the Senate.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, was in favor of the amendment of the Senate, not from any strong impression that it would operate beneficially, or that it would be important either one way or another. But, in the present condition of our affairs, it was a matter of prudence and sound discretion to agree to the proposition of the Senate. As to the effect of a refusal on our part to meet the Commissioner of Spain, he did not believe it would abrogate the treaty; but, as before observed in debate, our affairs with Spain were in a ticklish situation, and it was not worth while to do any thing to excite hostile feelings towards us. On this subject he would remark, that what would be the relation of Mexico to Spain six months hence could not now be foretold. We have declared that Mexico is independent. Suppose it is so, and Spain herself ratifies it, and transfers to Mexico the rights which she possesses by the treaty. Is that impossible? Suppose, on the other hand, that, by an arrangement with Mexico, the latter should remain a province of Spain, and that Spain calling on us to run the boundary line, we should not be ready. Will it not be giving Spain an advantage over us? No injury could possibly result from making this appropriation, though it might from withholding it. Mr. M. had no idea that the President would appoint a commissioner, merely to go on the line and say, we are here; but, when a disposition should be manifested on the part of Spain to go on, the President would appoint the commissioner. In short, to prevent the possibility of the Spanish nation placing us in the wrong, Mr. M. was for giving this power to the Executive.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said that the ratifications of the treaty between the United States and Spain were exchanged on the 22d day of February, 1821. That treaty provides that within one year a commissioner and surveyors shall be appointed by the two Governments to run the boundary line. Congress, in performance of this treaty, did, at the close of the last session, pass a law, in which they granted to the President the power to appoint a commissioner and surveyors to carry into effect the stipulations of the fourth article of the treaty. Congress, therefore, promptly, on its part, did all that it was competent to do, to enable the Executive of the United States to carry into effect the fourth article of the treaty with Spain. If the Spanish Government had appointed a commissioner, the President would have exercised the power on his part. The fault of the treaty not being executed within the time stipulated, was not in this country, but in Spain, for not having appointed a commissioner and surveyors. It would, therefore, be a sufficient answer for our Government to make to Spain, should her commissioner and surveyors appear, that we were ready, at the proper time, to have executed the treaty. And, in the meantime, Mr. T. said, changes have taken place. It might be contended, with propriety, indeed, that we are not bound, in the new attitude of the nation near us, to proceed in the execution of the treaty. But, on the other hand, Mr. T. said he could imagine a case in which it would become the duty of the President to make the appointment. If the Spanish Commissioner should appear, although the time has expired, the subject having not been concluded—and if the Mexican Government should also call on us to execute the treaty, it might become the duty of the President to make the appointment. It was quite probable, that the running of the boundary might be claimed by Mexico as a right to which she succeeds as the proprietor and sovereign of that country. The conclusion, therefore, to which Mr. T. had come was this: that, although we might make a captious objection to appointing a commissioner, &c., the year having expired, it does not become us to interpose such an objection. Considering that Congress has authorized the President to make the appointments and fix the compensation of the officers under that treaty, and that a state of things may present itself making it the interest of the United States and the duty of the President to make the appointment; and, considering the disposition shown by the President to avoid unnecessary expenditure in not having made the appointment heretofore, the House ought not now to agree to the appropriation, &c.

Mr. ARCHER spoke again in favor of the amendment of the Senate, and in explanation of his former observations. He justified the ground which he had taken, and replied to Mr. HARDIN's remarks, which amounted to no more than this—that he would give up the argument but keep the land, reversing what had been said of the conduct of the House in regard to the adjustment of the Yazoo claim.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, argued, that, inasmuch as this treaty was intended to vest in the Government of Spain certain territory which was heretofore understood to belong to the United States, the actual transfer of that sovereignty did not take place on the ratification of the treaty, but the land did and does yet remain within the jurisdiction and subject to the United States, and will so remain until the line shall have been run conformably to the stipulations of the treaty itself. Nothing had taken place, he said, which could have the least effect to exonerate and discharge the Government of the United States from its obligation by this treaty to Spain. If this were a correct view of the subject, every difficulty which embarrasses this question was laid out of the case. The argument that it was a contract in rem did not apply, because the territory is within the jurisdiction of the United States. Spain has a right to the execution of the treaty in her favor, because Mexico has not succeeded to the rights of Spain in regard to it, those rights not having taken effect because of the non-execution of that provision of the treaty.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, said, in reply to Mr. ALLEN's argument, that it was not a line that was to be fixed by the Commissioners, that being done by the description of it in the treaty; but it was a line to be marked. The national boundaries are specified in the treaty; and all that the Commissioners can have to do is to mark the line which is thus specifically defined. The gentleman from Kentucky was perfectly correct, Mr. B. said, when he contended that the Mexican Government would be bound to run the line, as by its succession to the rights of Old Spain, it had also succeeded to her duties. What then would be the proper mode of proceeding? Mr. B. objected, he said, to the appointment of a Commissioner to meet the Commissioner of Spain; and when he did that, he was as much in favor of observing the obligations of the treaty as any gentleman. Do we wish to violate this contract with Spain when we say we will not run this line in conjunction with her? No; we say, that Mexico has succeeded to the rights of Spain, and having done so, we are bound to carry the treaty into effect with the former, and not with the latter. We made our contract with Spain—how? As the sovereign over those territories. What has happened since? Why, it appears that the sceptre has passed from the hands of Spain, and not she but another Power possesses the sovereignty. Mr. B. said he would just put one question, by way of illustration. Suppose, after this country was declared sovereign and independent during the Revolutionary war, a stipulation had been made between Great Britain and Spain to run our boundary line, would we have suffered our sovereignty to be violated with impunity? Or has any nation now a right to go into Texas or Mexico and run the boundary line? Surely not. This, Mr. B. said, was his view of the matter, and he believed it to be correct. He would, therefore, withhold the proposed appropriation; not that he would violate our engagement with Spain, but that he would perform it to the proper sovereign. There was so palpable an inconsistency between this appropriation and the recognition of the independence of Mexico, that he could not vote for it.

Mr. EUSTIS, of Massachusetts, said that the Mexican Empire covers a certain tract of territory and embraces a certain population. What is that country? What is that population? These points are not yet distinctly ascertained. The Mexican Government itself does not know, and never will know until this line is run. It was not proposed to enter the Mexican territory, as supposed by the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; we can run the line on our own land. It depends on an event yet to take place, (the running of our line,) how far the Mexican Empire extends itself. It is desirable that that question should be settled, and the sooner it is settled the better. It would be found, on examination, that we are bound in good faith to Spain to run this line. Could any member on this floor assign a reason why Old Spain made this the condition in the treaty other than the relinquishment of Florida? All the objections to the appropriation on the ground of its proposing a violation of the rights of Mexico he considered to be unfounded, there being no reason to doubt that the Mexican Government would be satisfied with the line to be run between this country and Old Spain. Suppose Mexico should hereafter become ambitious, and extend her claims so as to cover ten or fifteen degrees of our Western territory. If no line had been run, it might become a matter of difficulty; at the present moment the line might be ascertained without any difficulty at all. With regard to the treaty, Mr. E. said it ought undeniably to be carried into effect on our part. If we are prevented from carrying it into effect by the Government of Mexico, we shall at least have done our duty.

Mr. DWIGHT, of Massachusetts, said he hoped the House would adhere to their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, by which they now proposed to appropriate nine thousand dollars to carry into effect a stipulation with Spain, which Spain, on her part, had been, since the making of the treaty, rendered incapable of carrying into effect. With the gentleman from Virginia, he thought the faith of the Government was the dearest and the most exalted attribute of national character, and he would ask his friend from Virginia if he were not about to peril that faith upon the measure which he advocated? What, sir, has this House done, and what are the obligations which their act imposes? Sir, you have, with but one dissentient voice, recognised the freedom and the sovereignty of the late provinces of Spain in America. You have appropriated $100,000 to carry that recognition into effect. The faith and the honor of this House is pledged to do no act inconsistent with the recognition of these sovereignties, and yet what does the amendment of the Senate call upon you to do? Why, sir, to appropriate $15,000 to run a line, in conjunction with Old Spain, through a territory which, ten days since, you most solemnly declared was under the sovereignty of the people of Mexico. In other words, sir, you are now recognising the sovereignty of Spain to a territory over which, but yesterday, you said, the people of Mexico were sovereign. Sir, it is not with nations as with individuals. The running of a line of this sort implies a recognised sovereignty in each nation so running it, to the territory on one side of the line to be run. It is, then, inconsistent with your former act to make this appropriation. What, sir, will be the effect of the measure? The new Republics of Spanish America have hailed, or will soon hail with enthusiasm and gratitude, the noble act by which, as it regards us, we gave them an existence in the list of nations, and will you so soon blight that feeling and that existence by the measure now proposed to be adopted? Sir, said he, let us bring this question home to the feelings of this nation. Suppose France, immediately after her generous recognition of our independence, had run a line with England, by which Georgia had been determined to belong to her province of Louisiana, instead of being, as France herself had said, a Territory and independent State—would not the act have been void? Yes, sir, worse than void, it would have been faithless.

APRIL, 1822.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said, that he trusted there was no member of the House who was less disposed than himself to do any thing that should conflict with our recognition of the independence of Mexico. He was in favor of that measure when there was more merit in it than at present, because there was more danger—and those who were members of the last Congress knew that he had, last year, not only voted, but had raised his humble voice in favor of it. He said he should also be very unwilling to take any step which should be construed into disrespect to the new Mexican Government, and yet he was in favor of making the appropriation. He said that Mexico was bound by the treaty we had made with Spain, and was entitled to all the benefit of that treaty. If the Mexican Government should call upon us to carry this article of the treaty into execution, he wished to put it into the power of the Executive to do so. He could state on the authority of the gentleman who had been appointed Consul to Mexico, and whose communications respecting that country had been recently laid before this House by the Executive, that the Mexican Minister, who had been lately appointed to the United States, was to have left Mexico the 20th of last month, and consequently might be expected here in a few weeks. Should he, on his arrival, call upon the United States to run this boundary line, it would be placing this country in an awkward situation for the Executive to be obliged to say, it was ready on its part to execute the treaty, but that Congress had refused to furnish the means. He admitted that the Executive ought not to run this line without the sanction of the Mexican Government. But the execution of this article of the treaty was a mere Executive measure, and that branch of the Government might be safely left, on its own responsibility, to execute it with the proper parties. He was therefore, clearly in favor of concurring with the amendment from the Senate.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, said, that that portion of the empire with whom remained the territory was always bound to perform the stipulations of a treaty of boundaries. Did gentlemen intend, he asked, to commence a new negotiation with Mexico on this subject? Was not the faith of this nation already pledged for designating a line? If that pledge was not redeemed, the people of Mexico might come and claim the Floridas from us. He was astonished, he said, at some of the observations which had been made on this subject; and he hoped the House would agree to the amendment of the Senate. Did gentlemen want to throw every thing in the wind again? Did they wish to give up the country which bounds on the Pacific? Let the treaty, he said, be carried into effect entirely, unless it was meant to make it entirely void.

Mr. RUGGLES, of New York, said, he understood the object of the appropriation to be, to provide for a Commissioner under the 4th article of the Treaty with Spain, for the purpose of running the boundary line between the United States and the country which lately constituted the Viceroyalty of Mexico. To him the measure appeared to be inconsistent with the recent acknowledgment of Mexican independence. The province of Texas and the whole of the country through which the line was to pass, constituted, at the time of making the treaty, a part of the Viceroyalty of New Spain. The Government of the Viceroyalty extended over and included the whole territory until it met that of the United States. But the sovereignty of Spain over that country has now ceased. Mexico has taken her rank among the nations of the earth, and her independence has been formally acknowledged by this Government. From the Message of the Executive and the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations on that subject, it is obvious that the authority of the Mexican Government is co-extensive with that of the former Viceroyalty.

It makes no difference whether Mexico has achieved her independence by the power of her arms, or obtained it by cession from the parent country. When once established in her rank as a nation, and in the exercise of uncontrolled sovereignty, though she may have obtained it and may still hold it by the sword, her rights are the same as if that sovereignty had been granted by the consent of Spain. Mexico becomes, therefore, entitled to the benefit, and is bound by the obligations of the treaty, so far as it relates to the settlement of her limits or affects her national domain. The duties which the Government of the United States owes to Mexico do not arise from our act of acknowledgment. They are consequent upon the actual existence of her independence and sovereignty. But our recognition has placed us in a situation in which we cannot deny the obligations which arise from her having dissolved the connexion between herself and her parent country.

It is said that the treaty contains a stipulation by which the United States are bound to appoint a Commissioner to act with a similar officer to be appointed by the Government of Spain, and that in good faith we are obliged to do so. Doubtless, if the sovereignty of Spain over the Viceroyalty had continued, a refusal to appoint a Commissioner would have been a violation of the faith of the treaty. But the Government of Spain has lost its power to give effect to its own stipulations in regard to the boundary in question. In consequence of the loss of her authority over her provinces, Spain has become incompetent to perform on her part. The acts of a Spanish Commissioner would be as inoperative upon the rights of Mexico as upon the rights of any other sovereign and independent State. Spain, therefore, is the failing party in the fulfilment of the treaty, and the United States are absolved, by that failure, from the obligations which arose out of that instrument in this respect. This Government is now compelled to look to Mexico as the only Power who can peaceably and permanently settle the question of territorial limits.

But it is said that Mexico will consent to the settlement of the line by a commissioner holding his authority from the King of Spain. The necessity of such consent is of itself conclusive to show that Spain is incompetent to fulfil the treaty. But the expectation that Mexico will consent to the settlement of her boundary by the interference of a Spanish agent, is most extraordinary. The power to fix and establish her territorial limits is part of the sovereignty and independence which Mexico has but just declared and acquired. She utterly disclaims the control and authority of Spain, and, jealous as she must be of her mother country, the expectation that she will consent to a measure which admits the authority of Spain over her territory, and is absolutely incompatible with her sovereignty, is surely without any foundation in probability. If this appropriation were to be made in general terms, so as to authorize the Executive to fix and ascertain the boundary by concurrence with such Power as may from subsequent events appear to have the authority, it might not be objectionable. But as the object of the appropriation was to settle the line in concurrence with Spain, whose authority over the territory in question has ceased, Mr. R. said, he felt himself bound to vote against it on the ground that it was useless and inoperative in itself, a violation of the sovereignty of Mexico, and incompatible with the solemn acknowledgment of the independence of that country lately made in this House.

Mr. REID, of Georgia, said he hoped the House would not make provision for the pay and support of a commissioner to run the line between this country and Mexico, conjointly with a Spanish officer, and under the treaty lately negotiated with Spain. He hoped so because he did not perceive that the treaty itself, if properly construed, imposed the obligation of which gentlemen spoke. If it be true that good faith requires us to perform that part of the Spanish treaty which relates to boundary, he was sure that no member would be opposed to any measure whose object was to carry the stipulation into effect. But really, said Mr. R., I cannot look upon the matter in so serious a point of view. By the treaty with Spain, there is an agreement to mark out a certain boundary—and why? Because the territories of the United States and Spain were contiguous, and it became proper, as well as convenient to the parties, to establish the limits of both. But, suppose the treaty with Spain about to be concluded at this moment, and that the United States were asked to accept an article by the terms of which the two nations would be bound, within a certain time, to establish and run out the boundary between the United States and Mexico, would not such a proposition be immediately rejected as unreasonable? Would it not be insisted, upon our part, that we had recognised the independence of the Spanish American Provinces; that Spain, therefore, possessed no lands on our borders; that, if it were proper to negotiate upon the subject of boundary, the negotiation should be with Mexico only? It appears to me that such objections would be conclusive, and that they should be no less valid to prevent a compliance with the requisitions of the treaty already ratified, so far as these have relation to the boundaries of the United States and of the late Spanish Viceroyalty of Mexico. The truth is, that the facts and reasons which served as the basis of the stipulation for the settlement of limits, have ceased to exist. When the treaty was framed, Spain possessed Mexico, and Mexico was bounded by the territories of the United States. It became a matter of importance, then, to both Governments, to ascertain the extent of their several jurisdictions. Time, however, has wrought serious changes. Mexico is no longer a province of Spain; she is an independent nation. Spain has, consequently, no portion of her empire in our neighborhood, and it follows that there can be no necessity for the establishment of land-marks between Spain and the United States. It is a good rule that, the reason of the law ceasing, the law also ceases. It is a rule as well applicable to treaties as to municipal law, because it is deeply founded in propriety.

I have heard it said, indeed, that we cannot treat with Mexico upon this subject, because her dominion does not extend to the line designated by the treaty. This is an opinion which, so far as I know, has been expressed only in this House. It is generally understood that the confines of the late Spanish province of Mexico or New Spain press upon the territories of the United States to the north and northeast; and we have not learned that the new Government has relinquished its ancient limits. Taking it for granted, then, that if you run any line in that direction, it must be the line between you and Mexico, in what language will this newly-born empire speak to the Commissioners engaged in the performance of this duty? Will she not say to them that they are trespassers, and that the United States are attempting to do that, in connexion with Spain, which can only be done by obtaining the consent and co-operation of Mexico? If it be urged that Mexico is bound by the stipulations of the treaty, because she was not, at the time of its execution, independent of Spain, will she not reply, that if it be true that there is an obligation resting upon her, she will of herself, now that she is independent, perform the duties imposed by the treaty, and that she will not trust them to other hands, especially to the agent of a Government whose interests are at variance with her own? It seems to me perfectly evident that Spain has nothing to do with the establishment of this boundary: and she might with equal propriety interfere in the settlement of limits between the United States and Canada.

We are told, however, that it is incumbent upon us to perform every jot and tittle of the treaty, lest we offend Spain. We may be perfectly easy on this head; for, if Spain be not already offended by your recognition of Spanish American independence, it is not probable she will be made angry by your refusal to make this appropriation; the more especially as the last is but the consequence of the first.

I regret to hear it averred that we have taken advantage of the weakness of Spain to offer her insult and injury. The allusion cannot be to the attitude we have assumed in relation to the Spanish colonies; for the measure recently adopted by this House has grown out of public opinion and the recommendation of the Executive, and is alike due to justice and to liberality. If, however, the remark be intended to apply to the diplomatic correspondence which preceded the late treaty, I can only say, that, if the letters of our Minister at Madrid be impartially examined, it will be found that we were not the offending party; that instead of offering we only repelled an indignity—an indignity which, by a large portion of our people, was thought to be a just cause for war. Sir, Spain is at this moment possessed of the esteem of this nation, in a larger degree than any other transatlantic Power; and long may she continue, by the cultivation of free institutions, to merit our good wishes.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said it seemed to him gentlemen were begging the question. What right had Mexico to Texas at all? The rights of Mexico extend to no part of our territory. The lines of Mexico are well defined. The line of Texas is totally different from the boundary of Mexico. In no one part of the line between us and the province of Texas, as established by the treaty, does it touch the Kingdom of Mexico. He asked gentlemen, for a moment, suppose the King of Spain offers to sell Texas, and we were to buy it; or suppose we were to accept it as a gift—would the Government of Mexico have any right to complain? We are arguing a matter as affecting Mexico, said Mr. S., in which Mexico has no interest at all.

Mr. COCKE said, in reply to this last argument of Mr. SMITH, that the Government of Mexico had in fact been extended to Texas, and deputies had been elected from that province to the Cortes about to sit in Mexico.

Mr. WALWORTH, of New York, inquired if there was any evidence furnished by the Senate, to show that Mexico has asked for the execution of the treaty? He had opposed this appropriation, he said, not so much on account of the unnecessary expenditure of the sum of $15,000, as from the important principle which it involved. He asked, if it was not perfectly apparent that this sum was asked for the purpose of running the line with a Spanish Commissioner, and not with the actual sovereigns of the country which joined us on the South, whose independence we had but a few days since acknowledged? He was not for doing things by the halves. If Mexico was really a free and independent Government, as the Executive and this House had solemnly declared, what right, he asked, had we to run this boundary with the King of Spain? It had been said by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. ARCHER) that we were bound to Spain by the treaty to run the line with her, and that our Government could not, by its own act, annul that obligation. But, said Mr. W., what made Mexico independent? Was it our recognition, or was it the neglect or inability of the Spanish Government to preserve her sovereignty over that province, which made our Southern neighbors a free people, and prevented the execution of that part of the treaty with Spain? We had done every thing which could be done on our part. The appointment of a Commissioner had been provided for a few days after the ratification of the treaty, and it was now said the appointment had been actually made. Our recognition was nothing more than the official declaration of a fact, which fact, and not our announcement of it, rendered it impossible for us to run the boundary with the Spanish Government. It was, therefore, the inability of Spain to execute the treaty with us, according to its spirit and intent, and not the fault of our Government, which had prevented its being carried into effect. It was said that a Spanish Commissioner had been appointed, and was now in this city, and therefore we must make this appropriation, or Spain would be dissatisfied. Mr. W. said he had understood that such a Commissioner had arrived, but he had also heard that the Spanish Commissioner declined going on to run the line, unless a sufficient military force was sent to protect them while running it. In this Mr. W. thought he had acted wisely, as it was not to be presumed Mexico would look peaceably on, and permit him to run the line with our Government; neither would she consider such a violation of her independence and sovereignty by us as a very friendly act on the part of the United States. She did not deserve to be independent if she would submit to such an aggression. But, said Mr. W., the gentleman from Virginia over the way, (Mr. TUCKER,) has said it was for the Executive, and not for this House, to decide with whom the line was to be run. If, said Mr. W., the Executive had not asked this House to acknowledge the independence of the late Spanish provinces, I would have been satisfied to leave the subject to that branch of the Government, and contented myself with a bare expression of opinion. But the House, as the Representatives of the people of the United States, had been called upon to sanction the recognition of their independence, and to appropriate money to open a diplomatic intercourse with them. This branch of the Government had done so with an unanimity which was unexampled in this country, and it was now too late to ask this House to vote for an appropriation wholly inconsistent with that act. Mr. W. said, if any of those who wish for this appropriation would offer an amendment so as to limit it to running the line with the Mexican Government, he would vote for it, although he thought it would be the means of giving a salary to a Commissioner and Surveyor, and creating a useless expenditure, when nothing could be done this year. He had no objection that the Power with which alone we had now the right to act, in relation to this business, should distinctly understand that we were ready to execute the treaty in its fullest extent. He therefore hoped the House would not consent to the amendment in its present shape, but would insist on their disagreement.

Mr. WOODSON made a few further remarks in support of the position which he had before taken.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Pennsylvania, did not think that the situation of the Province of Texas had any thing to do with this question. The simple question was, whether the House would do an act which it was in its power to do—that is, whether it will provide to pay the officers whom we are bound to appoint. Whether those officers, when appointed, can mark the line, has nothing to do with this question. It is not a question now, whether Mexico will agree to the treaty, but whether we will agree to it ourselves. To make this appropriation does not pledge us to force the running of the line against the consent of Mexico. By doing it we violate no engagement, neither do we injure any one. We are called upon to do a thing which we can do, and which, if we do not do, we violate the treaty. If we do not this thing, we undertake to say the treaty is not binding on Mexico, and therefore we will not carry it into effect with Spain. It was no reason for refusing to do an act which we are bound to do—which we have promised to do, that ulterior measures may be necessary satisfactorily to complete the running of the line which the treaty provides for.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said, he believed it was not only competent to this House to inquire whether or not they would make the proposed appropriation, but that it was their duty. But he would not now debate that question. He rose to say that it was not indeed begging the question, to say that Mexico had no control over the province of Texas, or that its boundary is well understood and well defined. He had believed that New Spain, Guanare, and all the provinces subjected to the Viceroyalty of Spain, formed a part of Mexico; and he had it from good authority, that the Government of Mexico had actually ceded land in the very province of Texas. Would that Government have ceded lands in a province to which it claimed no title? A gentleman over the way asks by what unheard of morality we could refuse this appropriation, and says, Spain would have a right to take Florida from us by arms were we to refuse it. Have we not, said Mr. F., given to Spain more than adequate compensation for Florida? Was not Spain put into the enjoyment of Texas, and did she not subsequently lose it by the revolution in Mexico? Would the United States, after the Revolution, have permitted Great Britain to undertake to change their boundaries to the West, as established by the treaties between Great Britain, and France, and Spain? The authority of the Viceroy, Mr. F. said, had always extended over the province of Texas. Santa Fe and Rio del Norte were in the province of Mexico, and that was only on the other side of the river from our territory of Arkansas. Was it not there that General Pike got into the Spanish territory? and within a very few years past citizens of the United States have been brought from Mexico, where they had been prisoners for twenty years, for having been found trading on that very territory. If Spain were still in possession of that country, Mr. F. said, he should be for this appropriation; and if those who now hold the sovereignty should wish the line to be run, he should be in favor of appropriating money for the purpose.

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, said, he should vote for the treaty, for a reason somewhat different from the reasons assigned by any other gentleman. The treaty being made, we are bound to carry it into effect. But there is nothing in the bill which requires the President to carry it into effect immediately. It seemed to be admitted that it was not likely to be carried into effect during the existence of hostilities between Mexico and Old Spain. It would not be carried into effect probably until peace was restored, and the right of Old Spain re-established, or the independence of Mexico recognised by her. The Executive, then, having a discretion allowed to him, will do what circumstances require, either with the Government of Spain or that of Mexico. He should, therefore, vote for this appropriation, to put it in the power of the Executive to run the line, either with one or the other Power.

Mr. NELSON, of Maryland, remarked, that previous to the treaty with Spain, the United States had always laid claim to the territory of Texas as belonging to the United States. Upon what ground? On the ground that it was a part of the province of Mexico? No; but that it was a part of the province of Louisiana. If we now take the ground that Texas was a part of Mexico, then we never had a right to any part of Texas. I put to the members of the House this one question, said Mr. N., which I ask them to answer: Suppose this treaty with Spain had never been made, and Mexico had declared herself independent, would we have consented that she should have extended her authority and sovereignty over Texas? If not, can Mexico rightfully do it now? On what principle can it be said that it is inconsistent to carry the treaty of boundary into effect now, because we have recognised the independence of Mexico? Texas is not, and never was a province of Mexico, and that ground has always been taken by the United States. Unless the House is prepared to say, that the independence of Mexico would have extended itself to Texas before our treaty with Spain, it cannot now refuse the appropriation which is necessary to carry that treaty into effect.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said, with the gentleman from Maryland, that Texas never was a part of Mexico; and for that reason he now opposed the appropriation. The Government of the United States had a clear title to Texas, but it had not to East Florida, and gave to the King of Spain that very province for Florida. The sovereignty over Texas had been in the hands of Spain, who laid claim to it, and this treaty finally settled it there. But during the time of Spain claiming this territory, and since it was ceded to her, too, she had a Governor in Texas, whose functions were put an end to by the revolution there, and that Governor was amenable to the Viceroyalty of Mexico. Such was the condition of Texas when the treaty was made. Making the treaty, we yielded up all the claim we had. Texas was a province, subject to the Government of Mexico, and must go with it and share its destiny.

The question was then taken on insisting on the disagreement to the appropriation proposed by the Senate, and decided in the negative; and, on motion of Mr. ARCHER, the House agreed to the said appropriation.

The remaining amendment, on which the Senate had insisted, was that which proposed to appropriate $9,000 for the repairs of the Cumberland road.

Mr. ARCHER moved that this House insist on its disagreement to the said amendment, and ask a conference with the Senate on the subject.

Mr. MALLARY opposed the motion. He hoped the amendment of the Senate would be agreed to. Some gentlemen, he understood, when this question was on a former occasion before the House, voted against it on Constitutional grounds, but he believed a large majority of the House entertained a different opinion. The great objection, however, was, that this provision was contained in an appropriation bill, when it ought to be done by a special act. It was then known that a bill was in progress to erect toll gates on the road; but he would submit to the House whether it could be expected, or he might say possible, judging from the course of business for some days past, that any bill for the erection of toll gates upon it can pass the House at the present session. It must inevitably be laid over to the next, and in the meantime the road is going fast to ruin and decay. If, indeed, it is the intention of Congress to abandon the road, it may be worth while to refuse a concurrence. But, if such was not their intention, it was very apparent that something must be done, either by passing the law alluded to, or by making this appropriation, and as the former could not be done, he hoped the latter would not be refused.

Mr. WOOD remarked, that yesterday economy seemed to be the order of the day, and he was now surprised to see gentlemen advocating an appropriation for an object which, in his opinion, was clearly unconstitutional. If, when the framers of the Constitution of the United States had adjourned, the question had been asked them whether they had made provision for making, repairing, and overseeing roads, what must have been their answer? Can any man doubt that they would have replied in the negative? Mr. W. had expressed his sentiments upon this subject on a former day, and he would not renew the discussion of the Constitutional question now. But he did object to the manner in which it was brought forward, in an appropriation bill. Such bills were only to provide for carrying into effect existing laws. They combine so many interests as always to insure their passage, and it was therefore wholly wrong to permit any clause of an original character to be attached to them. Mr. W. would rather see this appropriation bill sink, than to have such a principle established. He thought the House ought to make a stand against it. And why, he asked, had not gentlemen brought forward before this, the law for the erection of toll gates? It had been suffered to lie dormant, and ought not now to be brought forward as an argument to press on this appropriation. Besides, this, he contended, was a new principle. He had examined the alleged contract with the States beyond the Ohio, and was fully satisfied that it did not extend to such an appropriation as this. That was a contract only to make, not to repair the road. The contract was fulfilled. It was done—and we are now called upon to begin a new course—a course of repairs, and the next session we shall hear of another mountain having fallen into the road. This was not a precedent for an endless expenditure, which he hoped the House would not agree to establish.

Mr. FARRELY rose only to make a statement of a single fact, which was, that he had heard by a colleague of his, that he had been informed by a respectable gentleman of Wheeling that the road in question from that place to Cumberland was in good repair.

Mr. COOK remarked that there was no probability that the bill for erecting toll gates could pass at the present session. Many gentlemen, he observed, regarded it as involving an important Constitutional question, and he believed the Speaker was one of the number, and who, on such a question, would probably wish to express his sentiments on the floor of the House. It was therefore utterly hopeless to expect a decision upon it during the few remaining days of the session. The preservation of this road was a matter of deep interest to many sections of the country on both sides of the mountain, and it was evident, as it passed through a rough country of scattered population, that it must be supported, either by the travellers who pass over it, or by this Government—and as the bill for the former cannot pass, it is equally clear that the road must fall to decay, unless the latter alternative is adopted, to the extent of this small sum of nine thousand dollars.

Mr. F. JONES inquired of the Speaker what would be the proper course to be taken with the bill now on the table, to erect toll gates on the Cumberland road. [The SPEAKER was understood to say, that, according to the rules of the House, it would be necessary that the bill should be referred to a Committee of the Whole, either in the course of the docket, or on the state of the Union.] Mr. JONES continued, and observed that there was no bill on the docket of a similar character with the present, and he inferred that it would be impossible to obtain a determination upon it on its merits at the present session. Mr. J. would reply one word to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Woon,) who had said that he would rather this whole bill should sink than make the appropriation. If that gentleman thought it unconstitutional, he was right to express such an opinion. But he admits that a contract was made with the States west of the Ohio, on the faith of which this road was made. Against the fulfilment of that contract he makes no objection. But if it was not unconstitutional to make a road, how can it be unconstitutional to repair it? And where was the clause in the Constitution, which, in terms, authorized the erection of fortifications in New York? It could not be found. It was an inference from the general authority that is granted for "the common defence and general welfare." And is not this road of a similar character? Is not a military road as important to the common defence as a fortification? Mr. J. would not pursue the argument, nor exhaust the patience of the House, but he was fully convinced that, unless the House should concur in this amendment with the Senate, nothing would be granted for that road at the present session.

Mr. WRIGHT expressed his views briefly in favor of a concurrence in the amendment proposed by the Senate. He thought it too late to stir up the old and oft-rejected doubt of the constitutionality of the appropriation. He argued the propriety of the measure upon the ground that it came within the spirit of the original act; for, if the road was so defectively made as to want repairs at this time, it was evident that it did not come up to the contemplation and intent of the Congress that granted it. He also contended that a measure of this sort, coming from a co-ordinate branch of the Government, was entitled to great respect.

Mr. A. SMYTH remarked, that the sum proposed was not large in amount, but he could not consent to grant a single dollar in a case which he deemed to involve a Constitutional right of the people. He alluded to Parliamentary usage, and observed that the House of Lords, in England, had no right to interfere in money bills at all. The analogy of the principle was the doctrine of our Constitution, and a departure could extend no further than the letter of the instrument. The House of Representatives were the guardians of the public purse. And shall we yield, he asked, a single vote on this point to the Senate? He was not willing to do so. They had no right to interfere, except in particular and excepted cases. Mr. S. did not believe that the Congress had power to authorize the erection of toll gates. It was not within the scope of the specified and limited powers that were granted. If it was admissible, it would authorize Congress to assume a power over the police of the country. Mr. S. expressed his determination to oppose any such assumption of authority not warranted by the Constitution. He also took a view of the history and practice of our Government in relation to this subject. The facts, he said, were too recent in memory to authorize such a course, and he referred to the opinions expressed by President Madison, in relation to the powers of Congress on the subject of internal improvements. The advocates of the appropriation, he said, had indicated a willingness to give up this appropriation if the other bill could be passed. But he thought that subject was too important to be decided on, except upon mature and solid investigation. It involved the question whether Congress can appropriate the people's money to execute a power which Congress does not possess. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. JONES,) in relation to fortifications, he observed, that the general power to provide "for the common defence and general welfare" must be executed, by powers that were specifically defined; and he adverted to the terms of the Constitution to show that the subject of fortifications was specifically defined, and therefore within the rule. With respect to the compact with the States west of the Ohio, he contended that it stopped at the building of the road, and by no rule of construction could it be extended further.

Mr. STEWART said he had determined not again to trouble the House with a single word on this subject, but he felt himself constrained to correct the statement made by his colleague, (Mr. FARRELLY,) who had said that the road was not out of repair; and, to prove it, he has stated that one of his colleagues had seen a man who had seen the road, who had told his colleague, who had told him that the road was not out of repair. This kind of evidence was, he contended, too remote, especially when there were many honorable gentlemen in the House who had themselves seen the road, and who, he was persuaded, would concur in stating that the banks had so fallen in, in many places, as to fill the water channels along the side and throw the water to the centre of the road. He stated at considerable length the situation of the road, and the injury it had and would sustain, if nothing were done for its preservation; and, since he was up, he begged the indulgence of the House while he replied to a few of the Constitutional objections of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) who had denied the right of the General Government to legislate on this subject, although it had been a standing subject of legislation for the last twelve or fifteen years, and had received the sanction of three Presidents, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, some of whom also entertained doubts of the power of Congress on this subject. He said he would ask the gentleman from Virginia a question: On this road the great United States mail, between the East and West, runs daily—suppose, a probable case, that one of those steep mountains slip down, and completely block up the road, has the General Government no right to remove this obstruction? Must the mail stop? No; the Government were bound to transport the mail, and it was their duty to remove the obstruction, and this was the purpose of the appropriation. The Constitution had given the power "to establish post offices and post roads," not post routes, as the gentleman would have it; the power was given over roads as contradistinguished from routes, otherwise the word routes would have been introduced by the framers of the Constitution. Besides, the same provision which conferred the power to regulate commerce with foreign Governments, had given it to regulate it between the States, which was the object of this road. But we are told, said he, the General Government must have this power by express terms. Where, he would ask the gentleman, did he find the power granted, by the express terms of the Constitution, to pass a pension law, a law granting medals, or for the benefit of the arts and sciences, agriculture, or manufactures? Not one of these words were found in the Constitution; yet they were the almost daily subjects of legislation. The right was derived incidentally from the general power to promote the general welfare, &c. But, is it a violation of State rights for the General Government to expend its money for the benefit of the States? Those States most complained who did not feel this violation of their rights. It was not an exercise of power, but a surrender of money, which was power, by the General Government, for the benefit of the States, and if Virginia was the recipient of the benefit, she would not thank the gentleman for the objection. But the Constitutional objection, in this case, had long ago been settled, and the only question now presented was, whether the House would abandon the road to destruction, and lose the whole of the money which had been expended. He could not give a name to such policy. He hoped it would not be adopted.

General Appropriation Bill.

Mr. BALDWIN had no disposition, he observed, to discuss the merits of the question, nor should he have risen but to reply to the observations of his colleague (Mr. STEWART) in relation to himself. A few days since he (Mr. B.) saw a gentleman from Wheeling, a merchant of that place, possessed of large property there, and of most respectable character. He (Mr. B.) inquired of him what was the state of the Cumberland road. The gentleman replied that it was very good; and further remarked, in respect to whatever more it wanted, that, as Congress had refused to repair it, they would do it themselves. These, he said, were facts, and if his colleague wished him to name his informant, he would do so. The information had come from him, and he could substantiate it, notwithstanding the sneering manner in which his colleague (Mr. STEWART) had thought proper to treat it. He would add one word respecting this representation which his colleague had made about the poor and sparse population where this road run. So far from being a new country, it was settled as long ago as Braddock's defeat. It was now well settled and rich. The farmers upon it were more wealthy than those in the correspondent parts of the Pennsylvania road, and who, he could assure the gentleman, would not, if Congress had built a road for them at so much expense, come forward like sturdy beggars, and ask them to keep it in repair.

Mr. RHEA opposed the concurrence, but his observations could not be heard by the Reporter with sufficient distinctness to allow him to attempt a report of them.

Mr. WOODSON remarked that he had been hitherto in a great measure indifferent to this appropriation, because he considered it as inadequate to the great purpose for which it was designed. But when it became apparent that nothing further could probably be done at this session to repair it, he felt it his duty to come forward in support of the concurrence. He regarded that road as a proud monument of the policy and power of the country; and so long as he thought the bill for the erection of gates would pass at this session, he had not thought it necessary to press this appropriation. It is now evident that the bill could not be acted upon. The West, he observed, had no peculiar claim on the Government, but he could entertain no doubt that the House was fully disposed to promote the facilities of intercourse, and the great objects for the obtainment of which society was founded. This was the only road that leads from the East to the West. He thought it desirable that the Capitol should be the central point of the Union, from which intelligence should be imparted and received. Mr. W. replied at considerable length to the observations of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) on the Constitutional question he had raised. He adverted to that instrument to show that the Senate, even in revenue bills, had specifically the power of proposing amendments; and he also animadverted upon the various other positions which that gentleman had taken.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, rose to correct an error with respect to the expense of making this road. It had been stated at $1,800,000. But it was greatly exaggerated; for, by a statement from the Treasury Department, he found it had cost only $1,641,774. The sum now asked for was only what had been saved by economy from what had been heretofore appropriated for making the road, being the surplus of the appropriation for the purpose. With respect to the constitutionality of the question, he would observe that, at the first session of the 15th Congress, $10,000 were appropriated for roads, one of which was from Fort Stoddard to Fort Hawkins. Mr. J. was opposed to the policy of making permanent and annual appropriations for repairs, but, as the other bill could not be acted upon at this session, he thought it but an act of just and liberal policy to concur with the Senate in the amendment proposed.

Mr. F. JONES was aware of the anxiety of the House to do the business before it, and of the fact that there were more bills on the docket than could be disposed of at the present session. But there was not, in his opinion, at that time, a question of more vital importance than the present before the House. It was a question, he said, whether you will or will not suffer the Cumberland road to be demolished. He would not trespass long on the attention of the House, but he could not refrain from making a very brief reply to the observations of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH.) He well knew the ability and research of his able and learned friend. And he also knew how natural it was for a man of talents, if unhappily misled himself, to mislead others. That gentleman was unwilling to permit the Senate to interfere with the money bills of this House. I, said Mr. J., have always been an advocate for the rights and privileges of this House. But this is even higher ground than I could presume to take. And if that gentleman finds a power contained in the Constitution which authorizes the Senate in such cases to amend, it was fair to presume that he would support this amendment. Mr. J. then alluded to the clause of the Constitution which he contended was a clear warrant for the limited right they had exercised in this case. And is there nothing, he asked, to be yielded between the two Houses—no deference to be shown by the one to the views of the other? Such a doctrine, he thought, would suit any other assembly better than this. Shall it be said, asked Mr. J., that we will stick to a provision which we have made, right or wrong, merely because the Senate has recommended an amendment to it? Many gentlemen, he said, had heretofore voted against the appropriation, because they believed the bill for erecting toll-gates would come up at this session, and, by its passage, supersede the necessity of such an appropriation. But it was not now even contended that it could be acted upon at the present session. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SMYTH) had alluded to the Presidents of the United States who had expressed opinions adverse to this power of Congress. But it would be remembered that one of these very Presidents signed the law by which the making of the road was authorized, and his successors had signed laws for its continuance. The gentleman, said Mr. J., has found out, it seems, that no right can exist under the Government to expend money, unless it is appropriated by law. He, Mr. J., would have been glad if the gentleman had found it out at an early part of the session, when in a speech of three hours he defended the Secretary of War for having exceeded the appropriations in the Indian department. Mr. J. would add a further remark in respect to the contract between the United States on the one part, and the States west of the Ohio on the other. Suppose they were brought together as individuals to explain the transaction. Is it supposable, when they agreed that the road should be made, that they did not know enough to foresee that it must be kept in repair? And, if so, whose business was it to make the repairs? Certainly as much that of one State as of another—of Georgia, as much as of Ohio, and of Maine as much as either. And in the case alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. JACKSON,) the sum granted for the road in Georgia, was for repairs—so that the question of constitutionality has been already decided. Mr. J. had no personal interest to subserve in the present question, but it was the honest wish of his heart that the appropriation might be made to put the road in repair, so that it might serve as a bond of union between the East and the West, and perpetuate the harmony of the confederated family.

Mr. HEMPHILL was opposed to the appropriation. He was a member of the committee by whom the bill referred to for erecting toll-gates on the Cumberland road was reported, and had moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of it, in order to bring it directly before the House, so that it might be decided upon at the present session. He had examined the subject attentively, and was satisfied that it was proper to pass the bill; and he thought the question might soon be determined. The discussion would not probably occupy more than a day. He considered the Cumberland road a great national object, and felt no hostility to it. But he thought it ought to be repaired at the expense of those who use it.

The question was then taken—Will this House insist on their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate? And it was decided in the affirmative without a division.

FRIDAY, April 26.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill from the Senate to ascertain claims and titles to land within the Territory of Florida, reported the same with sundry amendments; and the bill, &c., was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill from the Senate for the better organization of the district court of the United States in the State of Louisiana, reported the same without amendment; and the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH, from the select committee appointed on the subject of insolvency in the District of Columbia, reported a bill for the relief of certain insolvent debtors. [This bill provides that so much of the act of 1803, as declares that the provisions of that act shall not be construed to extend to any debtor who shall not have resided within the District of Columbia for twelve months preceding the date of his application, be repealed, from and after the passage of this act.]

The bill was read twice, and, without debate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading tomorrow.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved that the House do take into consideration the bill to provide for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road—which was agreed to be taken up, and on further motion of Mr. H. was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SAWYER moved that the House take up the joint resolution for an earlier meeting of the next session of Congress, professing that, if taken up, he proposed to submit it to the vote without debate. But the House, by a large majority, refused to consider the same.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting a report on the petition of Charles Grice; which, on motion of Mr. SAWYER, was ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR submitted the following resolution, accompanying it with remarks, showing the expediency as well as justice of the course proposed by it:

Resolved, That the business now depending before the House, committed to a Committee of the Whole, other than upon the state of the Union, be arranged by the Clerk, under the direction of the Speaker, in the following order.

1. Private bills originating in this House.
2. Private bills originating in the Senate.
3. Public bills and resolutions originating in this House.
4. Public bills and resolutions originating in the Senate.
5. Unfavorable reports.

The resolution was adopted.

The unfinished business of yesterday being announced, (viz: the bill to reduce the compensation of Senators and Representatives in Congress)—

Mr. Ross moved to lay it on the table, his object being to get at the bill for erecting toll-gates on the Cumberland road.

Other gentlemen stated their intention to propose to take up other business than that, if this bill should be laid on the table.

The question to lay the bill on the table, was decided in the affirmative by a vote of 71 to 54.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from their ninth amendment to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1822;" they agree to the amendment of this House to their amendment to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the public buildings;" and they agree to the amendment of this House to their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for paying to the State of Missouri three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands within the same," with the amendments thereto proposed by the committee of conference. The Senate have passed a bill of this House, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1822," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

JUDICIAL COURTS.

Mr. STEVENSON, of Virginia, rose, and remarked that the resolution which he was about to offer to the House, was one of an important and interesting character. It involved, in his opinion, considerations of deep interest to the nation, and was intimately connected with the union and prosperity of the States. He knew very well that the controversies which had lately arisen between the Federal and State Governments, as to their rights and powers, were of extreme delicacy and importance, and ought to be approached with much caution and deliberation. It was, however, due to himself to say, that, in moving in this business at this time, he was influenced by no narrow or local consideration, or party feeling. He had no desire to abridge the powers of the General Government, or extend those of the States. The resolution was offered in a spirit of peace and forbearance, and from a sense of duty to himself and the State which he represented, from the performance of which he did not feel himself at liberty to shrink. It was, moreover, due to those States, in which the subject has been lately so much agitated, as well as to the nation, to have it fairly discussed and deliberately decided; and, if this section of the judicial act was not justified by the Constitution, it was the duty of Congress to repeal it. He would therefore offer the resolution, with a view that it might be laid upon the table until the next session of Congress, and called up at an early day for discussion. He expressed a hope that it would be the pleasure of the House to permit it to take this course, and would submit a motion to that effect. The resolve is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to prepare and report a bill repealing the twenty-fifth section of the act, entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States."

The resolution was received, and ordered to lie on the table, according to the wish of the mover.

ROADS AND CANALS.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, made a general report upon the several resolutions and petitions to them referred at the present session, and upon which they have not heretofore specially reported; which report was read, and ordered to lie on the table. It is as follows:

That, after carefully examining the different resolutions and petitions submitted to them, they have thought it best to make a general report, embracing the several objects of reference.

The committee have already reported that they considered it expedient to have a certain section of the State of Maine explored, for the purpose of ascertaining, by survey, the proper route for a road, and whether it would be useful in a military point of view, from the Penobscot river, at or near Bangor, to some point in the eastern boundary of the State; and, also, in favor of a survey being made to ascertain whether it would be proper for the General Government to aid in the construction of a canal in the town of Gloucester, in Massachusetts, to connect the waters of Boston and Ipswich bay, in order to avoid the tedious and dangerous passage round Cape Ann.

The committee will bring the remaining cases referred to them into the view of the House.

The Legislature of the State of New York have passed the following resolution, which has been transmitted and referred:

"IN ASSEMBLY, April 10, 1822.

Resolved, (if the honorable Senate concur herein,) That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to call the attention of the National Government to the great importance and public utility of improving the navigation of the Hudson, so as to open a free communication and direct intercourse for vessels of all descriptions with the internal canal navigation of the State of New York.

The design of the resolution, as the committee understand, is, to remove sand bars that exist in several places in the Hudson river, and impede its navigation by vessels over a certain size. To improve the navigation of the tide waters of this river would require an expense of about two hundred thousand dollars, and is believed to be practicable, either by the construction of piers and dams, in such places as may be proper to concentrate the current of the river, so as to give it, with the assistance of the engine called a mud turtle, where necessary, power sufficient to remove the bars, and to prevent future deposits; or avoiding them by a lateral canal, or a combination of both.

It appears to the committee to be an object, which, in an eminent degree, is deserving of the aid of the General Government, to perfect the navigation of this river, which exhibits the phenomenon of carrying its tide waters through a mountain, and is destined to communicate with such a range of lakes and fertile countries.

Resolutions of this House have been referred, instructing the committee to inquire whether it is expedient for the United States to give aid to the Delaware and Raritan Canal Company, and to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company.

The advantages to be derived from these contemplated canals, as forming central links in the great line of inland navigation along the Atlantic coast, is apparent; they would afford a cheap transportation for merchandise and munitions of war, free from the dangers of storms and enemies: on this subject several committees have reported in favor of their great importance and public utility.

A resolution has been referred, instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of appointing commissioners to examine and report as to the practicability and probable expense of connecting, by a canal, the Potomac and Youghiogany rivers; and sundry petitions have been referred in pursuance of the same object, which state that these rivers approach each other within the short distance of two miles; and that the springs and rivers which supply them are amply sufficient to furnish water on the summit level; and that the expense would be inconsiderable, compared with its great importance.

Petitions have also been referred, earnestly soliciting the attention of Congress to the navigation of the Potomac river. The petitions state that "this stream presents a direct communication from the Seat of the General Government, and the tides of the ocean, to the gentle and unobstructed waters of the West: the portage across the Allegany mountain is about seventy miles, by the national road now completed. From Cumberland, on the Potomac, the commencement of this road, to the tides at the City of Washington, is the distance of one hundred and eighty-eight miles, by the river; and the total fall is seven hundred and fifteen feet, or near four feet in each mile; this fall, with the scanty supply of water in dry seasons, renders the natural channel impracticable for useful navigation; and, to remedy this defect, a canal and lock navigation must be resorted to for the whole distance. The expense to be incurred in completing this improvement, it can be easily ascertained, would not exceed two and a half millions of dollars, estimated at the ordinary cost of such works, where obstacles of equal or greater magnitude have been overcome."

The committee need not endeavor to enumerate the many and great advantages to be derived from a connexion of the river Potomac with the Western waters; they will only observe, that the project becomes more elevated and interesting, when they consider the practicability of extending this inland navigation to the lakes; which, by means of the New York navigation and the proposed Atlantic canal, would form an island in the heart of the Union.

A memorial from the Legislature of the State of Alabama has been referred, praying aid of the General Government to connect some of their valuable streams. It states that the Alabama river commences, and becomes capable of a water transportation, within eight or eleven miles of a stream equally susceptible of being rendered navigable, and which empties into the Tennessee river; that the latter receives the tribute of several other streams, which take their rise and become navigable in the State of Virginia, passing through some of its most productive lands, and watering in their course the whole eastern section of the State of Tennessee; that the dividing ground separating these waters affords a favorable opportunity of connecting the waters of the Alabama with those of the Tennessee river; and that the distance required for the produce of Tennessee to reach a market on the seaboard would be reduced from nearly two thousand miles, to New Orleans, to six or seven hundred miles, to the Mobile.

The memorial likewise calls the attention of Congress to the communication of the Pensacola bay with that of Mobile.

On the important subject of the internal improvement of the country, the committee have adopted what they consider the only true plan, by reporting a bill to procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, on the subject of roads and canals. This is a measure recommended by the able and valuable report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 4th of April, 1808. The following are abstracts:

"As an important basis of the general system, an immediate authority might also be given to take the surveys and levels of the routes of the most important roads and canals which are contemplated—a work always useful, and by which the practicability and expense of the undertakings would be ascertained with much more correctness than in this report." "A moderate appropriation would be sufficient for those several objects."

The execution of this measure would present to Congress a full view of the subject, and enable them the better to decide on the propriety of engaging in these undertakings. It would lay the foundation of a well-digested and regular system, and it would not require any immediate demand on the Treasury for a large amount. It is believed that fifteen or twenty thousand dollars would be sufficient; and the expenditure of this sum would be divided between three and four years, as it would consume that period to obtain the information.

For many reasons, the committee have supposed that the information could be more satisfactorily obtained by the corps of engineers than from any other source. They are a well-disciplined and organized body, and composed of the most capable of our scientific men; and it belongs peculiarly to the topographical corps to explore the country, and to give accurate knowledge of such parts as may be deemed necessary by actual surveys. In this manner, a similar corps has been employed in France, through which every necessary information, relating to the face of the country, is acquired, and deposited in what is called their military bureau.

APRIL, 1822.

Roads and Canals.

H. OF R.

The corps of engineers, with the assistance of two civil engineers, and the aid of others who can be detailed to do duty in that corps, are believed, by those best acquainted with the subject, to be sufficient. They proceed by a regular system, and report monthly. Young cadets, as they leave the Military Academy, can be employed. It will give them experience, and advance their usefulness to their country. It will render the science appertaining to the Engineer department more perfect and extensive, and obviate the necessity of employing foreign engineers. There are further inducements, as it respects economy; they are already in the employment of the Government, and can have no motive to delay the work. They can be actuated by no other than an honorable ambition to establish their own reputation, and to show that their institution is valuable to their country. It is the practice to allow them but one dollar and fifty cents per diem beyond their usual compensation, which is merely to meet occasional expenses. The difference of expense in obtaining the information by the corps of engineers, or by commissioners and common surveyors, would be exceedingly great. The information, when obtained, would be valuable; for it cannot be otherwise than important to be acquainted with the capacities of the country for internal improvements. It would be useful to the States who have not the same economical means of acquiring it; and this part of the subject cannot be embarrassed by any Constitutional question.

The commencement of internal improvements upon a large scale has generally been attended with difficulties, and improvidently delayed. The people of England, after having experienced their advantages, are astonished that such works had not been undertaken earlier. In the beginning of the reign of George III. the first charter to the Duke of Bridgewater was obtained, and his canal is said to yield eighty thousand pounds sterling per annum. The growth of canals became so rapid, that George III. lived to see a hundred completed during his reign; and it is a matter of surprise, now, that the Government suffered them to be carried on without a participation, which would have produced so much revenue.

In the authority from which the above is derived, it is stated that more than two thousand four hundred miles of canalling have been completed, and that scarcely any district of country is more than fifteen miles from a water communication.

Nothing but the ardency of the most energetic minds could have overcome the opposing obstacles in the State of New York. By some, the project in the beginning was looked upon as romantic; they began without resources, relying upon the credit of the State, and, in the course of six years, will have completed 414 miles of canalling, which averages nearly a quarter of a mile for each working day, including the locks; the expense of the undertakings, it is now ascertained, will fall below the original estimates; the whole will not exceed five millions of dollars. The profits of these works, from what appears to be a reasonable calculation, will, in a few years, extinguish the expense of making the works, and afterwards leave an annual revenue to the State of more than a million of dollars. These works are of high importance to the nation; they show what can be done, and that a Government, with proper management, can execute great undertakings with despatch and economy: they have afforded, moreover, the most valuable experience in the science of engineering.

We must be convinced, from the example of other nations, that the natural advantages of this country will not remain unenjoyed forever; national improvements will at some time be prosecuted and perfected; but why should we be deprived of their eminent advantages by further delay?

It is said that the proper period has not arrived, and that we have neither resources nor Constitutional power.

As to the time, we have opinions from different quarters that are entitled to our best respect.

In 1807 the attention of the Senate was directed to this subject, and it was in pursuance of a resolution of that body that the Secretary of the Treasury made his report. Able reports have been made in the Senate at different times, recommending some system of internal improvements.

In 1817 a bill passed both Houses of the Legislature on this subject, which was rejected by the President upon Constitutional scruples.

The object of the bill was to set apart and pledge a fund for the construction of roads and canals, and improving the navigation of water-courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce among the several States, and to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions necessary for the common defence. For this purpose the dividends from the shares belonging to Government in the Bank of the United States were to be pledged for twenty years during the charter, and the proportion of the moneys to be expended on the objects in each State was to be in the ratio of its representation in the most numerous branch of the National Legislature. Mr. Madison and the present Chief Magistrate both have recommended the subject of internal improvements to the attention of Congress, as an object of sufficient magnitude to produce a change in the Constitution: neither suggested the idea that the subject was prematurely pressed upon the nation.

In 1818 the House of Representatives passed two resolutions, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury and Secretary of War to furnish information respecting internal improvements.

When we reflect on the influence to which such authorities are entitled, and see that the nation has increased to nearly ten millions, we think it ought to be admitted that the time has arrived when the national improvements ought to be commenced.

As to the resources, New York commenced her immense undertakings on the credit of the State; and it is believed that it would not, in a just comparison, be a greater undertaking for the Union to accomplish the most prominent objects of national improvements.

In relation to the resources, it ought to be considered how much the country would be benefitted, and, in the casualty of war, how much would be saved. Had the country been improved by roads and canals during the late war with England, a doubt can hardly be entertained that as much money would have been saved as would be sufficient to complete them. Similar events may occur again, and it would be wise to prepare for them; and especially so when the improvements, independent of this consideration, would be worth infinitely more to the country than the amount of their cost.

In the course of three or four years, which will be consumed in procuring the surveys and estimates under the proposed bill, our finances may be improved. But suppose no favorable change is produced, the improvements must be a work of time; and if it should be necessary to resort to loans, large sums would not be wanted at any one time; and if proper objects are selected in the beginning, a revenue will be coming in long before the whole is completed. A canal along the Atlantic coast, it is probable, would yield more than six per cent. immediately after its completion; the public expenditures would be spread over a period of perhaps twenty years; and if, during that time, the General Government, with the aid to be derived from incorporated companies, would expend twenty millions of dollars, the advantages to the country would be incalculable; and the revenue to be derived from the improvements, if it did not meet the interest of the capital expended, it cannot be expected that it would fall far short of it. In time, there can be no fear but that it would exceed the interest, and become a source of revenue to the Government.

Looking forward to the completion of the works, (say twenty years,) and supposing all the money to be borrowed, if we advert to the usual course of nature, we can perceive that the pension fund might be applied to the extinguishment of the debt. It would be passing the fund from an object of charity to one of permanent utility to the country.

We will suppose the last case, and the one which is most unfavorable. Suppose the debt, together with the improvements, go down to posterity; it would only create an obligation on those who would have the enjoyment of the improvements to pay the debt. There does not seem to be the same pressing obligation on us to pay off such a debt as is in the case of most others.

If we are to wait until the public debt is paid off, the scheme of internal improvements may as well be abandoned at once. We have no good reason to expect a more favorable time to make a beginning.

As to the power, it is not customary in reports to enter into a minute discussion of Constitutional points. The committee will not, therefore, take up the Constitution to examine it. Enough, they think, has been done on the part of Government to preclude this question from further inquiry. Nothing can be more desirable to society than to arrive at a settled construction on the different parts of the Constitution. Versatility on such questions would impair the character of the nation, and be detrimental to its interest. The committee will merely observe, that, in their opinion, Congress can possess no power except that which is derived through the Constitution. Consent or contract cannot confer power; and, if Congress has no power to construct roads and canals, and maintain a control over them, it can have no power to purchase lands, or appropriate money for the purpose of making them; but it has been the constant practice to allow to the new States five per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sales of public lands, to be laid out in the construction of roads and canals. Three-fifths are generally to be expended within the States, and two-fifths are to be expended under the direction of Congress, in the making of roads leading to the States. From forty to fifty thousand dollars are annually expended in this manner.

In 1806 the President was authorized by Congress to open a road from Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, to Natchez. This road passes through a State, without asking consent. In 1809 the President was authorized to cause the canal of Carondelet, leading from Lake Pontchartrain, by way of the Bayou St.

John, to the city of New Orleans, to be extended to the river Mississippi. The Cumberland road has cost one million eight hundred thousand dollars, which exceeds the proceeds arising from the sales of public lands in that State more than one million of dollars. How is it possible to reconcile these acts with the idea that Congress possesses no power to construct roads and canals? If there should ever be a construction of the Constitution dangerous to liberty, there will be an apology for repeated resistance; but when there has been a series of legislation in pursuance of a construction of the Constitution which is calculated to promote the best interests of the country, it is not consistent with wisdom, or the peace and welfare of society, to disturb it.

In what age or nation has the power of improving a country been wilfully abused? Even the unsuccessful attempts at great undertakings have received the admiration of mankind. No power can be more safely placed in the hands of the representatives of the people; and it may be truly said, that, among the objects of a national character, which at intervals engage the patriotism and resources of a nation, none are more beneficial, and none so permanent, as the internal improvements of a country. While others, with the institutions that gave them birth, may be effaced even from remembrance by the flow of time, these will remain as lasting as the rivers they connect, to be enjoyed and admired as long as generations are permitted to exist.

The committee, upon the whole, do not deem it expedient to recommend the immediate prosecution of any work; they think that some well-digested system ought hereafter to be devised by Congress, which can be done with greater propriety when the surveys and estimates shall have been received, by virtue of the proposed bill already alluded to.

They therefore offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient at present to authorize the expenditure of any money on any of the objects referred, except to carry into effect the bill reported, entitled "A bill to procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, on the subject of roads and canals."

SETTLEMENT OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Mr. RICH moved that the House take up for consideration the following bill:

Be it enacted, &c., That, in the settlement of accounts of persons remaining charged on the books of the Third Auditor of the Treasury with public moneys advanced prior to the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, the proper accounting officers be and they are hereby authorized to admit to the credit of such persons, respectively, the amount of any expenditures made by them which were at the time authorized by law or regulations, notwithstanding regular vouchers for the same may not be produced, if the impracticability of producing such vouchers shall be proved, to the satisfaction of the said accounting officers; and if the evidence exhibited in lieu thereof shall be the best the nature of the several cases will admit of, and such as would be received in courts of justice: Provided, nevertheless, That the credits to be allowed shall in no case exceed in amount the sums with which such persons, respectively, shall be charged on the books of the said Third Auditor.

The House agreed to consider the same; when—

Mr. COCKE moved an additional proviso to the bill, in the following words:

"And provided, also, that the said accounting officers shall not receive the evidence of the party, or any one interested."

Mr. ROSS opposed the proviso. He did not perceive any good reason for excluding that testimony in this case which was admitted in ordinary cases. Where, he asked, was the use of admitting into this bill a new mode of proof which shall go to exclude a great proportion of the claims to which the bill refers? It would destroy, he contended, almost wholly, the efficacy of the bill.

Mr. MCCOY remarked that the bill puts the persons to whom it relates on no other footing than they now stand on. The oath of the party was not now relied on to prove a claim, unless it was supported by corroborative testimony.

Mr. COCKE was unwilling that there should be a departure in this case from the ordinary rule of law. The object of the bill was to introduce other testimony than is now required in the settlement of accounts at the Departments. It was true that in the ordinary courts of justice, in case of the loss of a paper, the oath of a party or other inferior evidence was let in as proof. But if this bill should pass without such a proviso, he thought it would open too wide a door, and would lead to consequences which the House ought to guard against.

Mr. STERLING, of New York, said, the gentleman from Tennessee could not have adverted to the language of the law, or he would not have sustained his amendment by the arguments which he had offered. The law says, that no testimony shall be received, except such as would be received in a court of justice. He hoped, therefore, the amendment would not be adopted, as it would go to defeat the whole object of the bill. He did know that there were many officers of the late Army who had suffered extremely in character and property, because of not being able to settle their accounts, in consequence of obstacles of form merely. Such testimony ought to be admitted in the settlement of accounts as is the best the case will admit of.

Mr. WRIGHT also expressed his hope that the amendment would not be agreed to. He thought it would be very hard that a rule should be made for the case of these officers which was not applied to the case of persons in civil life in courts of law. In the courts of Maryland, and of most of the States, any person having a claim against any individual, was allowed to establish it by his own oath, to a certain amount. He did not see why equal justice should not be done to those having claims on the United States, as if against individuals—particularly when claiming to relieve themselves from unjust charges.

Mr. RICH observed that the bill related only to accounts that accrued during the late war, and contained no other provision than is every day admitted by Congress in individual cases. It was even more rigid than laws usually are in such cases, inasmuch as it subjects those who testify falsely to the pains and penalties of perjury. As the law now stands, the oath of the party is required, even if he produces other proof, so that the proviso would rather relax than strengthen the securities of the Government against error or fraud.

The question was then taken on Mr. COCKE's motion, and the proviso was rejected.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The House then, on motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HARDIN moved to take up the bill from the Senate for erecting toll-gates on the Cumberland road; and the Committee decided to take up that bill—ayes 112.

The bill being before the House, Messrs. FARRELLY, BARBOUR, RHEA, and WRIGHT delivered their sentiments against the bill, and Messrs. HARDIN, COOK, and TRIMBLE, in favor of the bill.

After Mr. RHEA had concluded, the question, on the motion of Mr. FARRELLY, for striking out the enacting clause of the bill, was taken, and negatived—ayes 37, noes 75.

Mr. TRIMBLE moved a substitute for the details contained in the nine first sections of this bill, which substitute was laid on the table by him some days ago.

Mr. FARRELLY proposed to amend the amendment, by inserting a provision making it necessary to procure the assent of Pennsylvania before putting up the gates on the road.

The motion was modified, at the suggestion of Mr. BASSETT, so as to include Virginia, and after a few remarks in favor of the motion, by the mover, and against it by Messrs. ROSS, and JONES, of Tennessee, the question was taken thereon, and negatived, by a large majority.

The adoption of the substitute was opposed by Messrs. H. NELSON, and BASSETT, and supported by Mr. TRIMBLE, when the question was taken thereon, and the substitute was adopted.

[The effect of this amendment is not in any manner to change the principle of the bill, but to make its details such that it may be carried into effect without the necessity of further legislation.]

Mr. HEMPHILL moved a further section, to appropriate the sum of $9,000 to repair the said road. The question was taken thereon without debate, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 64, noes 59.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, proposed a further amendment, the purport of which was to confine all the expenditures, under the act, to the moneys collected by tolls on said road. The question was taken thereon, and carried without a division.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill as amended in Committee.

In the House—Mr. TAYLOR moved to amend the bill, by substituting, in lieu of the amendments reported, a provision authorizing the President of the United States to cede to the States of Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania, respectively, all the right and title of the United States in the road which has been made from Cumberland to Wheeling. The motion was supported briefly by the mover, Messrs. RHEA, and ALEXANDER SMYTH, and opposed by Messrs. ROSS, JONES, of Tennessee, and HENDRICKS.

Mr. TAYLOR called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; but, before the question was taken, Mr. T. modified his motion so as to have the cession made upon such terms and conditions as shall insure the preservation of the road, and that no further tolls shall be collected therefrom by the States respectively, than may be necessary to keep the same in repair.

After a few observations by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, Mr. BASSETT, and Mr. FARRELLY, the question was taken on Mr. TAYLOR's amendment, by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 103, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Baldwin, Bassett, Blair, Borland, Brown, Burton, Butler, Cambreleng, Cannon, Conkling, Conner, Crafts, Cuthbert, Edwards of North Carolina, Farrelly, Floyd, Garnett, Gist, Harvey, Hubbard, Keyes, Lathrop, Lincoln, McCoy, Mattocks, Moore, of Virginia, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Overstreet, Poinsett, Reid of Georgia, Rhea, Rich, Ruggles, Russ, Arthur Smith, Alexander Smyth, Stevenson, Taylor, Thompson, Tucker of South Carolina, Tucker of Virginia, Van Wyck, White, Williams of North Carolina, Williams of Virginia, Wilson, Wood, and Woodcock.

The question then recurred upon a concurrence in the amendment proposed by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEWART then moved to amend the amendment, by adding to the first section thereof the following proviso:

"Provided, That if any county through which the road passes shall make the same a county road, and keep the same in good and perfect repair at the expense of such county, that then, and in such case, no tolls shall be collected on such part of said road so kept in repair, during the time it shall be so kept in repair; but on the failure of such county to keep the same in repair, as aforesaid, it shall then be in the power of the President of the United States to cause gates to be erected, and tolls to be collected as on other parts of said road."

The motion was supported by Mr. STEWART, and opposed by Mr. HARDIN, and lost without a division.

Mr. FARRELLY renewed his motion, made in Committee of the Whole, to amend the bill, so as to require the assent of the States of Virginia and Pennsylvania, to the erection of gates, &c.; but the same was negatived, without debate, by a large majority.

The amendments made by the Committee of the Whole were concurred in, with the exception of that which appropriates $9,000 (a balance remaining of the appropriation for making the road) for the repair of the road; on which question Mr. BASSETT called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered.

After a few remarks thereon by Mr. BALDWIN against, and Mr. TAYLOR in favor of this amendment, the question was taken upon agreeing to it, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 71, as follows:

The bill was ordered to be read a third time tomorrow.

MILITARY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making further appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1822.

The question recurred upon Mr. Ross's amendment to Mr. Cocke's proviso, limiting extra allowances to the Governors of Territories, for services as superintendents of Indian affairs, to prospective payments.

The question was taken thereon without debate, and negatived, as was the original proviso of Mr. Cocke, which was also decided in the negative, without a division.

The question of appropriating $762 for the expense incurred in military courts martial in the State of Pennsylvania, being under consideration, Mr. Cocke moved to strike out the section.

The motion was supported by the mover, Mr. McCoy, and opposed by Messrs. Smith, of Maryland, Tod, and McSherry, when the question was taken, and negatived.

Mr. Cocke then moved to amend the section, by providing that the payment be made out of the moneys collected from military fines in Pennsylvania.

Mr. Cocke supported, and Messrs. Milnor and Buchanan opposed the amendment; which was put, and lost.

Other appropriations having been agreed to, Mr. McCoy moved to strike out the appropriation of about $19,000, for expenses incurred by holding courts martial in the State of New York.

The motion was supported by the mover and Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, and opposed by Messrs. Taylor, Stevenson, Jones, of Tennessee, and Colden.

Mr. Edwards, of North Carolina, moved that the Committee rise and report, which was lost—yeas 40, nays 64.

The question was then taken on striking out the section, and lost without a division; and the appropriation, as recommended, was agreed to.

Sundry farther appropriations having been agreed to, Mr. Hill renewed the motion to rise, which was lost without a division; and, after making some further progress in the bill, Mr. Stevenson renewed the motion to rise and report; which was agreed to, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, April 27.

Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred a resolution to allow additional compensation to William Drakeford, a deputy marshal in South Carolina, for his services in taking the Fourth Census, made an unfavorable report thereon; which was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Williams, from the same committee, to whom was referred so much of a resolution of this House, as directs an inquiry into the late decision of the district court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, between the United States and a public agent, made a report thereon; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Graham gave notice that he should, on Tuesday next, move for the consideration of the bill reported by the Committee on the Suppression of the Slave Trade.

On motion of Mr. McSherry, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the further consideration of the bill, explanatory of the act authorizing the settlement of the accounts of Richard O'Brien; and the same was, without debate, ordered to a third reading.

Mr. Plumer, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported unfavorably on the petition of Thomas Eames; which report was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred a bill from the Senate for the relief of Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, and others, reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Newton, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to provide for the appointment of deputy collectors of the customs; which was twice read, and, after a few observations from Mr. N., ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. Eustis, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a bill from the Senate, to repeal the 14th section of an act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment, passed March 2, 1821, reported the same without amendment; and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. Russell, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Jonathan Libby, and others; which was read, and agreed to by the House.

RETRENCHMENT OF EXPENDITURES.

Mr. HARDIN, from the select committee to whom was referred a resolution of the House directing an inquiry to be made whether any part of the public expenditures can be retrenched, without detriment to the public service, and whether there be any offices or appointments in the Government of the United States which have become useless and unnecessary, and can be dispensed with, further reported :

The committee state that, very soon after the commencement of the present session, it was convened for the purpose of taking its duties into consideration; that it was not a little puzzled in coming to a decision upon the question of What are the duties of the committee? The rule of the House, to be sure, presents a very extended field for inquiry; many very important subjects, by classes, are embraced; but subsequent rules provide for the appointment of six standing committees, and prescribe to them duties, severally, which, when taken collectively, may perhaps occupy every ground upon which this committee could move. The committee, however, determined to institute an inquiry into the state of the laws by which the several Executive departments are organized, with the view of ascertaining whether any imperfections existed. To this end, a note was addressed to the several heads of the departments, including the General Post Office, requesting from each an exposition of any existing imperfections tending to the increase of expenditures, or to leave the officers in a less degree accountable than they ought to be. To this request, so respectfully made, no answers were received which are worthy of being reported. In the mean time, great willingness had been displayed by individual members to engage in the examination of many subjects which, perhaps, might fall within the scope of the powers of this, or some other standing committee. This activity on the part of the members, with the more exact information which they seemed to be in possession of, rendered it, in the view of the committee, entirely unnecessary for it to take any further steps. The committee were, therefore, for a considerable time, entirely inactive, believing nothing would be necessary to be reported by it for the consideration of the House; and it was the more inclined to this course, because it is believed that very few, if any, matters had been acted upon heretofore by the Committee on Public Expenditures; but some recent occurrences determined the committee to enter upon the examination of some matters which, it believes, are proper to be presented to the House.

The committee feel it to be, in some degree, its duty to present to the House for consideration the subject of individual claims against the Government. The practice has been to present those claims to Congress by petition; and a great consumption of time, and consequent expenditure of money, has resulted from the legislation, and the attempts to legislate, upon such matters: the rejection of a claim at one session is no bar to its presentation at another; so that it may, in truth, be affirmed that legislative inquiries touching such matters are interminable. The committee cannot but consider the consumption of time and money in legislating upon such matters, connected with the matters which it has stated, as a serious evil in our policy, demanding the application of a proper remedy, if one may be devised. The greater part of the claims which would warrant legislative relief must be based upon laws previously existing, but rejected at the departments because of the informality of documentary evidence, or the loss of evidence, or the informal mode of performing the service; or upon some expenditure of money, loss of money, or performance of service, which would, under all circumstances, place the nation under an obligation to compensate, or refund, or relieve, under well-settled principles of equity. All the cases properly falling within either of the above, as two great classes, it seems to the committee might be referred to the judiciary department of the Government for examination and decision by a general law. Without intending to give offence to members of Congress now in service, or those which have been in service, or may hereafter be in service, but merely to speak of human nature as it is found to exist, the committee feel authorized to say that there is some cause to fear that some members may have, and that others may hereafter feel too great a solicitude to favor the applications of individuals, making a merit of doing injustice to the nation for the benefit of individuals; and that others may have, or hereafter may feel too strongly inclined to reject such applications, making a merit of economy founded upon injustice. In like manner, it feels authorized to say that there is some cause to fear that such applications have been, and may hereafter be decided upon, without that severe scrutiny which affairs of justice require. The judicial mode of examination and decision, then, in the view of the committee, presents, upon a comparison with the legislative, these advantages: 1st. A great saving of time, consequently a great saving of money. 2dly. A conclusive determination of matters which may be urged before the Legislature without end. 3dly. A decision by men not so directly subjected to motives for doing injustice. 4thly. A decision by men whose habits and prescribed modes of examining questions are more favorable to a right decision of mere questions of law or equity. 5thly. The withdrawal of such subjects from the consideration of Congress would enable the members to bestow more time upon the examination of those matters which cannot be considered and decided upon by any other department of the Government.

The committee have deemed it proper to call the attention of the House to the subject of forts, and other permanent, stationary, or fixed defences of the military kind. Upon these subjects the committee will urge nothing with any high degree of confidence, not professing to be learned or skilful in relation to such matters; but some considerations will, with diffidence, be suggested. The mode of erecting forts, &c., by contracts, is liable to the objection that the undertakers are ever interested in performing the work in a manner less substantial and durable than their contracts require; and this may be effected in some degree, notwithstanding a very strict scrutiny; and it is liable to the further objection of being extremely expensive. The committee are strongly inclined to believe that this mode of performing such service ought to be abolished, and that the performance of it ought to be committed to the military, with the aid of such mechanics as cannot be found among the soldiery, under the superintendence of proper officers of corps of engineers. This would afford employment to the soldiers, and guard them against the evils of idleness; and even if it should be thought that justice required that some compensation should be made them for such labor, in addition to their monthly pay, still the change of mode might be productive of a considerable pecuniary saving. In this mode, no person may be supposed interested in using improper materials, or in performing labor in a slovenly or unskilful manner, because it may be conducted in such a manner as to give no person any advantage from such improper use, or from such improper workmanship. Again: the officers of the Engineer department, it is fair to suppose, ought to superintend the construction of such works; and if the change should have the effect of requiring their attention more strictly, it would thereby be productive of beneficial results. The committee believe that examples of high authority may be adduced in support of the change of policy proposed. It was the policy of Rome, as the committee believe, throughout her long course of successful warfare with the various nations of the earth.

The committee state further, that, not long since, certain publications were inserted in some of the gazettes of the country, charging many acts of favoritism, fraud, and defalcation in the management of the fiscal concerns of the nation, and of the misapplication and unauthorized application of public money and of public property. The committee would never believe vague, declamatory charges of corruption, or of the wasting of public money, worthy of notice, whether made in newspapers or elsewhere; but when they are made in a precise, definite, and tangible form, they are calculated to disquiet the minds of the people, and demand from their Representatives a proper scrutiny. Such, in the view of the committee, is the character of the publications above referred to. The committee, then, believing they deserved examination, determined to investigate the whole of the said charges thoroughly, and present to the House a full view of the evidence to be procured from the several branches of the Executive department of the Government, hoping thereby to aid in exculpating innocence, in presenting the guilty, if any, in their proper colors, and in ascertaining the defects in the system of laws which relate to the management of the finances of the country. The inquiry has been prosecuted with great diligence, and much evidence has been obtained; but the committee now believe it will not be practicable to present to the House, during the present session, a full and digested view of the various charges to which reference has been made. The committee will, however, in general terms, state that many of the charges are not well founded; that some of the accounts mentioned in the gazettes have been recently closed; and that some of the balances stated as standing against individuals will be found, upon a final statement, to be much below the sums now appearing. On the other hand, the committee feel compelled to say that there has been, in some of the cases, a degree of negligence on the part of the officers engaged in the settlement and collection of public moneys, for which no good reason can be assigned, and that considerable losses will result therefrom.

The committee have thought that the several subjects above mentioned were worthy of being brought distinctly to the consideration of the House; and, with this view, the following resolutions are submitted:

1. Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary do inquire into the expediency of prescribing by law a mode by which all persons having claims against the United States, on account of money or property, may have the same brought before, examined, and decided upon, in the judicial way, embracing therein all cases where, upon a like state of facts between individual and individual, an action at law, or bill in equity, would be sustained.

2. Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs do inquire into the expediency of repealing all laws authorizing the building of forts, and erecting certain other military defences, by contracts made with persons not of the Army; and of providing, in lieu thereof, the most advantageous mode of having such services performed by the labor of the regular soldiers, aided by proper mechanics, under the superintendence of the proper officers of the Army.

3. Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means do inquire into the expediency of changing the existing laws in relation to the time of reporting balances to Congress, as being due from individuals to the United States, so as to require such report within one year after the account ought, by law, to be closed; and that the said committee do also inquire into the expediency of prescribing by law a more effectual mode of taking sureties from the officers concerned in the collection and disbursement of public moneys, embracing a mode of renewing the obligations of such officers periodically; and that the said committee do also inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the forfeiture of offices in relation to the collection of the revenue, and the disbursement thereof, on account of certain specified omissions and malpractices.

Mr. HARDIN, from the Committee on Retrenchment, reported the following bill:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to make such disposition of the public money, due by the banks which have suspended payment, and usually denominated special deposit, as may be deemed most advantageous to the public interest: Provided, That no disposition shall be made, which shall not be calculated to insure the payment into the Treasury of the principal sums at this time due by the Bank of Kentucky and its branches, the Bank of Vincennes, the Bank of Missouri, the Bank of Edwardsville, the German Bank of Wooster, the Bank of Muskingum, the Miami Exporting Company, the Bank of Cincinnati, the Farmers, Mechanics, and Manufacturers' Bank of Chillicothe, the Farmers' Bank of Canton, the Lebanon Miami Banking Company, the Union Bank of Pennsylvania, the Bedford Bank of Pennsylvania, the Centre Bank of Pennsylvania, the Huntingdon Bank of Pennsylvania, and the Elkton Bank of Maryland.

The bill having been twice read,

Mr. HARDIN said that, on ascertaining the amount of unavailable funds, inquiry had been made whether the Secretary of the Treasury felt himself at liberty to make these funds available on the best terms on which they could be disposed of. That officer was apprehensive that he had no such power. The committee then requested him to prepare a bill which should be sufficient to answer the purpose; and the bill now reported by the committee had been prepared accordingly. That bill, Mr. H. said, did not embrace all the unavailable funds in the Treasury. There were deposits in several banks, the Brandywine Bank, the Huntsville Bank, &c., which were not embraced in this bill. The reason why they were not embraced in it was, that the Secretary of the Treasury informed the House that he believed, in the ordinary course of things, the money due from them could be realized without any special provision on the subject. As he supposed the bill would not be objected to, he moved that it be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. RANKIN said that the subject of this bill had been before a committee, of which he was a member, who, having investigated it, thought it would be inexpedient at this time to act upon it. It was a matter well known, that some of the banks were getting much better than they were, and that it would be disadvantageous to the United States to dispose of their paper, &c., at this time. Many of the banks whose paper was held by the Treasury, were known to be broken beyond the possibility of recovery. He therefore thought it was better not to make any disposition whatever of this paper. He was not, however, tenacious of his opinion; but he hoped the gentleman would not press the bill, but let it lie on the table for the present; and Mr. R. made a motion for that purpose, which he subsequently withdrew.

Mr. Cook expressed his surprise at the committee's reporting this bill. The subject, he said, did not come within the powers of that committee. It had no right to make such a report. The objects for which it was appointed were specific—to inquire what offices in the Government were unnecessary, and what expenses could be retrenched. No power beyond this was given to them. Why, then, did they report this bill? The subject of this report had been specially referred to the Committee on the Public Lands; and the gentleman's committee must have great anxiety to report bills to take a subject from the committee that is specially authorized to act upon it. Mr. C. said he was not only surprised at the report on that account, but he was surprised that the bill should have been reported at all for the reason assigned, that the Secretary of the Treasury had requested it, because he had not already the necessary power. For, Mr. C. said, he had already exercised the power. He had papers in his hand, both printed and manuscript, showing that he had received from the Bank of Vincennes $40,000 in bonds of individuals assigned to the United States in discharge of moneys due from it. When he expressed his surprise at this report, it was with the qualification that the Secretary of the Treasury had, in a report to the House, expressed the same opinion as that which he had given to the committee. The question embraced by this bill, he considered very important, as involving not only a large amount of money, but also the character of the Government. It ought, therefore, to be deliberately considered, and for that purpose he moved that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARDIN said, he would correct the gentleman in one particular. He did not state that the Secretary of the Treasury had requested the bill to be reported, but that the committee had requested the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare it. There was, Mr. H. said, something like seven or eight thousand dollars of this depreciated money or unavailable funds. Some of it was depreciated 70 per cent. In the Edwardsville Bank there was about $40,000, which, according to information derived from the gentleman from Illinois himself, was depreciated 34 per cent. It was indispensable, he thought, that the House should act upon the subject; and he wished that it might be acted upon before the paper was depreciated so low that nothing at all could be got for it. Mr. H. then moved to lay the bill on the table, with the intimation that, on Monday or Tuesday next, he would move to call it up. Carried.

PRESIDENTIAL DISTRICTS PROPOSED.

Mr. MONTGOMERY submitted the following joint resolution for consideration:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following propositions shall be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the National Constitution, which, if ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall immediately thereafter be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution.

1. The United States shall be divided into four sections, to be styled Presidential Sections, in the following manner, viz: Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, and New York, shall constitute one; New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, shall constitute another; North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Tennessee, shall constitute another; and Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, shall constitute another.

2. That, immediately after the next election of a President of the United States, the said sections shall be designated by numbers in the following manner, viz: The residence of the person recently elected as President, shall be determined by the joint vote of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and the section within which he resides as a citizen, shall be styled the First Presidential section; and the number of each of the other sections shall be determined by a lottery drawn by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the presence of the members of the two Houses, in the Hall of Representatives; and thereafter each section shall be designated by its number so drawn.

3. That forever, after the sections are so designated, a President of the United States shall be elected from the sections, respectively, in rotation, the first being a citizen of the second section; the second election to be of a citizen of the third, and so on as to the highest number; and then of the first, and so on, as before mentioned, in regular rotation.

4. That any State hereafter admitted into the Union, shall be considered as a part of that section on which it binds by the greatest extent of its boundary.

5. That, whenever it is ascertained by the census of the United States that any section contains double the represented numbers of the section containing the lowest represented numbers, such section shall be divided by Congress, and the numbers of each determined by lottery, as before directed, the one section taking the former number, and the other a higher number.

This resolution having been read—

Mr. M. said he did not expect to call up this proposition for consideration until the next session of Congress. He submitted it now to bring it to the view of the House and of the nation; and, however laughable it might appear to some gentlemen, he considered it a very serious matter. He did not say how he should himself vote upon it; but he considered it an affair of great moment, well worthy of being considered, as well by the members of this House as by the people generally—and, unless an entire change should be made in his views of the subject, he should call it up at the next session.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table accordingly.

COMPENSATION BILL.

Mr. HARDIN called for the consideration of the bill reducing the compensation of Senators and Representatives in Congress, &c.

Mr. WALWORTH called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were taken accordingly, and resulted as follows: Yeas 123, nays 31.

So the House agreed to consider the same; and the first section of the bill being under consideration,

Mr. BALDWIN moved so to amend the bill as to reduce the daily compensation of the members of Congress from six to four dollars.

On this question the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BALDWIN said, he did not make this motion to destroy the bill. He never had acted, and never would act, in that way. But he made the motion from a strong conviction of the propriety of the amendment. The House had decided to reduce the mileage one half. From the beginning of the Government it had been thought that twenty miles of travelling was equal to one day's attendance, and ought to be equally compensated. He himself knew, from experience, that more money could be made by members from their daily pay than from the mileage. Having reduced the one, he would reduce the other; not that he thought six dollars per day too high a compensation. On the contrary, he thought it too low. But, in the decisions of the House upon the subject, there ought to be something like consistency and propriety.

Mr. WRIGHT justified the change which had been made in the allowance for mileage, as necessary to equalize, in some degree, the compensation of those who live at a distance and those who reside nearer to the Seat of Government. He regretted that the subject of their own compensation had been in any way brought into discussion, when the people do not require it. But what reason was there, that, on the plea of mileage, the seat of one member should be so much more profitable than another? He hoped the House would not agree to this proposition, either on its own merits, or on the demerits of the amendment which had already been made respecting mileage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, said he should not have spoken on this subject, were it not that the vote he should give on this motion might appear to be inconsistent with his general course in relation to this bill. With his friend from Maryland, he was very sorry that this question had been again brought before the nation. For one, he would say that, however low the finances might be, if the people did not require the reduction of the pay of the members, he was sure the good of the country did not require it. He should vote, however, for the amendment now before the House for two reasons: First, because of the reduction which had taken place in the mileage. As it now stood, unless the roads in Tennessee were much better than usual, he should make one dollar and a half per day whilst travelling. It was a fact very well known, too, that in proportion to the distance which a man lives from the city, is the sacrifice he has to make in coming here. We, said he, who come from a distance of seven or eight hundred miles, have to surrender every thing at home. The mileage, therefore, ought not to have been reduced as it had been, unless the pay was to be reduced in the same proportion. Mr. J. said he should vote for Mr. BALDWIN's amendment for another reason. If, indeed, said he, the principle is to be established, that we shall receive for our compensation no more than is just enough to support us here, and bring and carry us back, let us come down to the sum. I can live here upon four dollars per day, and I, perhaps, live as extravagantly as any other member. If we are to receive more than four dollars per day, let us go to something that is decent. He was opposed to the reduction at all, and would state in his place what he would desire his constituents to hear: that if the finances of the country would permit it, he would vote at this moment, and with as much pleasure as he ever gave a vote in this House, to raise the pay of the members higher than it now is. It was the wish of his heart to see this Congress continue to be independent—that it should never be filled with a moneyed aristocracy, by stockholders, &c. Suppose the fact of the occurrence of another war. And suppose the fact, also, that we should not get out of it as soon as we got out of the last, but it should continue for as long a time as the war of the Revolution did. What, then, would be the amount of the public debt, or stock? Who would hold it? Those who fought your battles? No; a very different class of people! Who, then, would come to Congress? This House would be half filled with stockholders. We shall hear as much noise about republicanism and patriotism as now; but it will be an empty name—a shadow only of the reality. If the finances of this country would permit him, he repeated, he would vote to raise the pay. Suppose that the pay of Congress should be reduced to precisely what you now pay the hireling, who does daily labor for you. What would be the consequence? What is even now the fact? No man, unless he be a man of fortune, can maintain a seat in this House. I am very glad, said he, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made this motion. I maintain that I, extravagant as my notions are, can live upon four dollars a day, and it is only just to those members who have to travel far to get here, to equalize the pay somewhat to the allowance for travelling. With that allowance, Mr. J. said, he should be able to get home—though he might have for the purpose to draw on other resources than those of the public, &c.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York, was in favor of the amendment, but not for the reasons which had been assigned by the mover. For, Mr. P. said, he was averse to legislating on his own pay. He had some doubts whether he had any right to vote upon the subject; because, by a rule of the House, no member has a right to vote upon any question in which he is personally interested. He was averse to the principles of this bill from beginning to end. He had no idea of coming here to value himself. It was a matter heretofore settled for him by others, and he was willing it should remain so. If it was to be disturbed at all, he was willing to reduce the pay to the lowest possible amount for which a member can pay his expenses here. He was willing to come here for nothing; for it was an honorable office to represent thirty-five thousand free men. But, if he was to receive pay, he expected such as would be an honorable and respectable compensation. If his constituents were dissatisfied with his receiving such a compensation, they were not worthy of an independent representative on this floor. But he believed the people of this country were not of that grade of character, that they were either unwilling or afraid to pay their representatives for their services. He was in favor of the amendment because, if the compensation was to be reduced, he would go at once to the point of bare competency for subsistence.

Mr. FLOYD was opposed to the amendment. He did not think that, because there was an impropriety in one part of the bill, another incorrect feature ought to be given to it. He did not think, to be sure, that those gentlemen who travel here with so much ease by means of steamboats and stages, were very good judges of what ought to be allowed to those who journey laboriously over the rugged roads of the interior. He was particularly surprised that the reduction of the mileage should have had the countenance of the gentleman from Maryland, who so eloquently declaimed on the munificence of the allowance to the judges of his State, &c. As to the independence of this House, which had been spoken of, Mr. F. said it was his belief that this House never would be more independent than it was at present; and, if it retained the same degree of independence, it would get along pretty well. Eight dollars per day had not secured to this House more independence than six dollars had formerly done. He would not say that the Executive had influence here; every gentleman doubtless felt himself independent: but that the Executive has influence, Mr. F. said, was certain. If you go into public places, you may see it written on the foreheads of men—I want—I will accept—give to me. If we want really to get back to first principles, said Mr. F., to an honest administration of the concerns of the country, let us get as near to it as we can without overreaching our object. If, however, the amendment now under consideration should be adopted, it would be no reason why he should vote against the bill. If he could not get the whole system, as reported by the committee, he would yet not be deterred from voting for the bill by these amendments.

Mr. HARDIN rose to explain the course and objects of the Committee on Retrenchment. When that committee was first organized, which was in February, it was not expected, nor did the committee believe that they could get the necessary measures of retrenchment before Congress in time to act upon them at the present session. After examining the finances of the nation, in the most impartial manner, the committee were of opinion that, to enable the Government to apply to the public debt a sinking fund of eight millions of dollars, it was necessary to increase the revenue from customs, and to retrench the expenditure of the Government. The object of the committee was not to cut down any of the necessary expenses of the Government, nor to carry the retrenchment further than a reduction of salaries, &c., to what they were seven, eight, or ten years ago—to what they were before they were increased in consequence of the depreciation of money. After the committee had reported, they felt themselves so situated that, from personal respect to themselves, they were obliged to bring this subject now before the House, although it had been no part of their original plan. Those members, Mr. H. said, who were in favor of returning to old principles, ought not to go below them. If they did, they would disorganize the whole system of retrenchment. If, however, the compensation were voted down to one dollar per day, he pledged his honor and reputation that he would vote for it. But, as far as the House might be disposed to return to old principles, he trusted it would resist every attempt to go below the report of the committee. In relation to the question of mileage, he had voted against the reduction of it, as he should do against the present motion, because both amendments have a tendency to bring down the retrenchment below the reason of the measure. Mr. H. said he knew that what would be saved by the passage of this bill was but a drop in the ocean of expenditure, as it would amount only to some eighty or ninety thousand dollars annually. But it was necessary that this House should set the example by beginning with its own compensation—not that eight dollars per day was too much, for he had told his constituents over and over again that he did not think even the $1,500 per annum was too high a compensation for members of Congress. This bill had been reported, not that the committee believed the compensation of the members was now too high, or that it would be an item of saving of any great importance to the Treasury, but that it was evidently necessary to begin with themselves this holy war upon compensations. But, because he was in favor of the bill, he was opposed to this amendment. If you lose one arm, said he, will you therefore cut off the other? Mr. H. said he intended himself, if nobody else did, to move to recommit the bill, with instructions to the committee to restore the mileage to what it was reported at, viz: six dollars for every twenty miles travel. If this bill were presented to the House as a measure per se, without any other, he would vote against it himself; for he did verily believe, and always had believed, that the members of Congress were the worst paid officers in this Government for the labor, sacrifices, and privations, they had to undergo.

Mr. MONTGOMERY could not perceive what great good effect the system of retrenchment would have. The policy of the country, he would admit, should be bounded by its means. But has the Government found it necessary to abandon any part of its essential establishments for want of those means? By looking at the state of the duties upon imports and tonnage in the years 1815, 1816, and 1817, he observed that he believed that it might be satisfactorily proved that the people paid little if any portion of the revenue upon those subjects; that the importations in those years have been exorbitant; that the importers had secured and paid the revenue to the Government; had sold the merchandise at a loss, even beyond the amount of the revenue; and that the people had greatly injured themselves by buying good bargains. And now we are called upon to do injustice to the officers of the Government, in order to favor the revenue. Mr. M. did not perceive that that course was necessary. To raise two or three millions by taxation was not very oppressive, and that, with the imposts and tonnage, and sales of the public lands, would be sufficient, in his opinion, to reduce the public debt, without doing injustice to any body. But gentlemen seem determined to make their system of retrenchment square with the revenue. Mr. M. said, his policy would be to bring up the revenue to the necessary expenses of the Government. He did not know that any of the officers of the Government received too much. It was very evident that they do not grow rich on their salaries. The question on the bill before the House, he said, was not of that dignified character that he could wish to see. It looked too much like the play of little boys, who strike each others' knuckles to see which can stand it the longest. But, in regard to this point of honor, he would not be behindhand. He would vote for the four dollars. If the mere honor of being members, and compensation equal to the ordinary expenses were alone to be considered, four dollars might be enough; but such a policy would commit the legislation of the country to the nabobs of the land—men who would be pleased to come here to show their carriages, with their riders before and riders behind, &c.; and a great portion of the most skilful business men of the country would not come, because they must do it at a great sacrifice. Others might be willing to come, because they could not do better at home. If, indeed, men were worth any thing at home, it was very evident that they would not come here for less than eight dollars. There might be some deputy sheriffs, constables, &c. who could work even for one dollar per day at home, and probably they would be willing to come here for a reduced compensation. But as it was part of a system, and a point of honor to begin with this House, he should vote for the reduction proposed.

Mr. COLDEN did not rise to enter into a discussion of the subject, but only to explain his reasons for the vote he should give. He would vote for the four dollars. It seemed to be admitted that no man ought to lose money by coming to Congress; but it was very certain that no man could bring with him any part of his family, and live decently, for a less compensation than eight dollars. If a member is a bachelor, and has nobody to support but himself, he can doubtless live on less than eight dollars; but a man who has a family, and contemplates bringing such part of it as may be necessary to his comfort, will be able to save nothing from the present allowance. But, as four dollars was enough for the support of bachelors, or those who live like bachelors, and six dollars was not enough for the expenses of those who desired to bring their families, he should give his vote in favor of that sum, although he should vote against the original bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, thought it was correct legislation to adapt our expenses to our circumstances, as much in public as in private life; and, if a man's situation was such as required a reduction in his style of living, it became an imperious duty upon him to reduce it. Instead of four horses, he should drive but two, &c. Mr. C. was disposed to reduce rather than to tax. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. MONTGOMERY) had taken the strong ground that it may be expedient to resort to taxation to defray the expenses of Government in a time of peace. To this doctrine he (Mr. C.) could not assent. He would make every effort to retrench before he would appeal to this last resort. And, until that has been done, the people would not consent to be taxed. They would not be able nor willing to pay direct or internal taxes during peace, especially as they know the immense proportion of it which is absorbed in the expense of collecting it. Mr. C. had voted heretofore against raising salaries, because he knew how difficult it was afterwards to reduce them, and he contended that a person could live even in this extravagant city on the sum proposed; and perhaps they would spend all they could get even if their compensation was raised; so it was no conclusive argument that salaries were not too high, as the gentleman (Mr. MONTGOMERY) seemed to suppose, even that those who enjoyed them did not become rich. Mr. C. was not disposed to reduce the salaries so low as to expel the incumbents from office. But he was in favor of a moderate reduction. If 20 per cent. is taken from a clerk, he may say he cannot live on his salary. If this be true, what is the consequence? He will resign; and to-morrow there are one hundred applicants for the reduced office, and who in a short time will perform its duties equally well. Last Winter, when a bill of a similar character with the present was before the House, he (Mr. C.) had advocated its passage; and he was then charged by the gentleman (Mr. HARDIN) who originated this bill, with doing so for the purpose of accomplishing a certain object, not explicitly named, but fully understood. Mr. C. would not now retort upon that gentleman by imputing to him any such object now as he had imputed to others then. He would presume that he was convinced of his error, and that this bill was the fruit of that conviction. Mr. C. believed that retrenchment was indispensable to the payment of the national debt and to the safety of the Government. He alluded to the events that preceded the French revolution, which was to be ascribed, in a great measure, to the deep debt in which that Government was involved, and from which not even the abilities of a Necker could extricate it. That Minister had proposed to borrow, but so low was the credit of the Government that nobody would lend. To avoid similar results, we must prevent the cause. We must retrench as much as we can in every department. Mr. C. was in favor of reducing to six dollars, but against four dollars. He would come down to the good old standard, which experience had sanctioned, and with which the people were satisfied.

Mr. WALKER observed that they were about to touch a tender string, in which every gentleman had an individual interest, very inconsiderable in its effect as to the rights of members, but very important as it respects a system of retrenchment, in which we all seem to be ardently desirous, and which has been in the mouths, and, he hoped, in the hearts of gentlemen; for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth will speak. Sir, we are about to change the system of our expenditures, and bring them within the circle of our revenue. I have been uniformly, and am now sentimentally, disposed to effect a system of retrenchment so far as is consistent with the good and safety of the nation and the rights of individuals. Sir, we are about to pull down one house and build another, and, as no edifice can flourish only in proportion to the strength of its foundation, we must lay the first stone in the building in cutting off our own wages, and then we can with a good face reduce others. He thought that we ought not to hold a premium in the wages of members, to buy the talents of the nation; nor make the compensation so low as to prevent men of talents from serving as members of Congress. They ought to receive so much as to indemnify them for their attendance and labors as members of Congress. Let their condition be no worse abroad than at home; for we all live, and we cannot live like the lilies of the field, which neither toil nor spin. We ought to have such wages as will enable us to live like gentlemen, when on our duty in Congress, and leave a small sum to carry home. This, Mr. W. believed, six dollars per day would afford. He therefore should vote for that sum.

Mr. SAWYER moved to amend the instructions for the recommitment of the bill, by adding thereto a proviso, the effect of which, if adopted, would be, that this bill should not take effect if it shall be shown by the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the next session, that there is one million of dollars beyond the amount necessary to meet all the demands of the Treasury for the year. If this balance should be in the Treasury, Mr. S. said it would not be necessary to take the step proposed by this bill, since all the gentlemen who had spoken admitted that the pay was not too high. If it should be otherwise, however, then he would go as far as any gentleman in support of a system of reduction of expenses.

Mr. TAYLOR moved for the previous question, on the ground that so short a portion of the present session remained, and that no new light could be shed on the subject by prolonged debate.

The call for the previous question failed, not being supported by a majority of the members.

Mr. WILLIAMSON did not rise to discuss the question generally, but to reply to what had been said on the subject of taxes. The object of retrenchment he understood to have a reference to the situation of our finances. It was said, by the gentleman from Ohio, that the people would complain if they were to pay taxes. Who, he asked, do now pay the taxes? How much is paid by Ohio and Kentucky? Let the books of the Treasury furnish the answer. And yet they complain of taxes. Look to the State of Maine—and what does she put annually into your Treasury? More than three hundred thousand dollars—and yet she does not send her representatives here charged with the errand of representing that they cannot pay their taxes. Is there any soundness in that argument? Is there any foundation for it? If they do not pay the taxes, why should they complain? When our finances were in a worse condition than now—when they were borne down with the events of the war—with two hundred miles of exposed seaboard—and part of their territory actually under the yoke of the enemy—the people of Maine did not complain of taxes, although they did complain of not being protected. It was not the States beyond the mountains, he said, that bore the burdens of the Government. He did not wish that they should. Nor, on the other hand, did he feel disposed to yield to the great and mighty system that is coming upon us, with this bill as the butt end of it. Our constituents, it seems, are alarmed with the evils that are hastening, and threaten, unless we reduce our pay, that the places that now know us shall know us no more forever. Mr. W. entertained no apprehensions of that sort. He represented a noble and liberal people. They lived remote, but they were not dissatisfied with the present compensation of the members. He would injure them, were he not to bear witness to their liberality. But it was said that we must go back to old times. A sacrifice must be made, and the amount of the language is, we must first apply circumcision to ourselves, and then say to others, we will take you in hand and circumcise you. After placing ourselves on the altar, we are next to proceed with the clerks. And was this just? They went into office under an implied pledge of the faith of the Government, and he was not disposed to deviate from it. Mr. W. was apprehensive that there was a deeper principle in this system than had been hitherto brought to light. Peradventure there may be some man who wishes for the loaves and fishes, which he cannot obtain without displacing those who now enjoy them. Mr. W. would not enlarge on the subject—but he should feel that he was doing himself injustice were he to vote for the four dollars. He was frank to avow that his property was small—nor did he regard it, so long as he was supported by an approving conscience. But he would not consent to a measure that would operate hardly and unjustly, not only upon himself but upon others—a measure that may send away the widow with a tear and the orphan with a sigh.

Mr. SANDERS then moved to recommit the bill to the committee who reported it, with instructions “so to amend the bill so as to make the mileage six dollars for every twenty miles, also to make the other section of the bill correspond with the amendments made in the first section.”

And the question being stated thereon—

Mr. WALWORTH opposed it on the ground that the present law was unjust, because it was giving to the distant members an unfair proportion beyond the others. Mr. W. had made a calculation on the subject, and he found that he should receive $33 per day while travelling, and should, on the whole, clear $400 in the mileage of coming to, and returning from, Washington. His colleague (Mr. TRACY) would also receive $27 50 per day, and the chairman of the Retrenchment Committee (Mr. HARDIN) $456—or $10 50 per day over his expenses. Mr. W. thought it was neither just nor right to impose on those living in the vicinity this disproportionate remuneration for equal services. Under the old system, some members will make $20 clear profit per day while travelling, and those who live near, during their attendance in the House, can only make three dollars. To adhere to the thirty miles as an equivalent to a day's attendance would be less unjust, although even that would operate in favor of those who reside at a distance. Mr. W. was therefore opposed to this motion, although he should vote against the reduction of the wages to four dollars.

Mr. BURTON expressed briefly his views in favor of the motion. He considered the question of mileage as involving a consideration of deep national interest. If any thing was to be saved by members from their compensation, it was from the mileage, and, if that was reduced, it would naturally weaken the inducements to Representatives from the Western and other more distant States to come to Washington, and ultimately assist the tendency to a disposition to set up for themselves. Mr. B. wished to strengthen, not to relax, the bands of the Union—and although he would not object to reducing the per diem allowance to four dollars, yet he would be very willing to increase the mileage to ten or twelve dollars for every twenty miles, on the principle he had suggested.

Mr. SAWYER's motion was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. HILL, of Maine, moved further to amend the instructions, so as to add a proviso that no member should receive pay for any day during which he has been absent from the service of the House, unless detained from it by sickness. He was glad to see the gentleman from New York so disinterested, in arguing that the reduction of pay would operate injuriously on those who live in this vicinity. He asked the gentleman, however, whether, if gentlemen who live in the vicinity leave their seats and attend the courts, being absent for a week or fortnight at a time, they do not receive just as much pay as if they were in their seats? Mr. H. said, he had been here now three terms, and he never had been one day absent from his seat; and those who had lived nearer the city certainly had in this respect an advantage over those who were more remote. It appeared to him wholly improper to reduce the allowance for travel; he was as much in favor of a reasonable reduction as any man, but he was also in favor of equal justice, and therefore moved this amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT said, if the remarks of the gentleman from Maine were founded in fact, they were entitled to great weight. But he believed the gentleman must be mistaken as to the facts. For himself, he said, he had always given credit to the Government for every day on which he had been absent from the House. If a different practice prevailed, it was a wrong which ought to be redressed.

Mr. HILL said, he had understood it to be the universal practice, where gentlemen had been absent for a day or two only, to receive for those days as though they had been present. His honorable friend who reported this bill was a member of the bar, and attended the Supreme Court during its sessions. Mr. H. asked, whether he did not receive pay for the time as if attending the House, in addition to his fees of fifty, a hundred or a thousand dollars for his causes in court? If that was the case, he might well afford to come to Congress, though the merchant or farmer could not.

Mr. ALEXANDER, of Virginia, rose merely to say, as the charge of the gentleman from Maine was general in its character, which stated it to be usual to settle the accounts of members from the commencement to the end of the session, without regard to their absence, that so far as it respected himself, and those with whom he was associated, he understood the practice to be different, and a deduction was generally made, as required by the law.

Mr. RHEA said, he had never been a day absent from the House since he had been a member of it; but he would vote against this proposition. Every gentleman, if absent only for a day, ought to give credit for that day in his account. But he was opposed to the amendment, because it assumed the idea of conduct which was improper in any gentleman, and which he would not admit had ever taken place.

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, said it would be impossible, it was now evident, to get through this bill before the day fixed for the adjournment of Congress. The House had been already two days engaged in the discussion of a single section of the bill. If we go on with it at the same rate, said he, we shall neither pass this bill nor any other. Other bills of far greater importance are depending, which will save to the nation more money than this bill, but which this bill prevents us from acting upon. Is it expected by any gentleman that we can go through the system of retrenchment at this session? It cannot be. As at the next session, the House could have a fuller, fairer, and better view of the subject—and taking all the circumstances into consideration, he moved to postpone the bill to the first Monday in December next. He made this motion, not to get rid of the bill, but from a conviction that the House, by persisting in the discussion of it, would effect nothing. He was a friend to retrenchment, but the system now presented, as a whole, was one which he could not approve.

H. OF R.

Compensation Bill.

APRIL, 1822.

Mr. NELSON, of Maryland, in reference to what had fallen from Mr. HILL, thought it proper to state, as he was one of those who had been called from his attendance on this House for a few days during this session, that it would be found, on examination, that, for the time during which he had been absent, he had not received either pay or rations.

Mr. VAN WYCK considered the motion for the postponement as virtually a motion to reject the bill, whatever were the motives which led to it. To prevent that motion, and all others aside from the main question, and to save time, Mr. VAN WYCK again required the previous question.

The call was not sustained by a majority of the members present.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, was wholly opposed to the postponement. It would defeat the bill, if agreed to. This session, said he, we are told we have not time; the next session it will be out of season. Many members will not be re-elected, and they will argue, that it is improper to legislate for their successors, &c. If we are to act upon the subject at all, it must be now, before the occurrence of another election. The gentleman from Maine had asked, what revenue did the people of the State of Ohio pay? Why, Mr. C. said, if they wear fine coats, they pay duties on them, and for every article of foreign growth or manufacture which they consume. On the doctrines of theology, he would not undertake to contend with a gentleman who seemed to be so thoroughly accomplished in them.

The SPEAKER here repressed the range of the debate, as being too wide for a question so limited as that of postponement.

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, finding his motion for postponement had not the effect to put an end to the debate, which was his object, withdrew his motion.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, understood the proposition of Mr. HILL as a general intimation that it was the practice of members of this House to receive pay during occasional absence from it. His object in rising was, to disclaim and deny, for the delegation from Virginia, the existence of any practice of that sort, and to assert that there was no member of that delegation who was capable of claiming such an allowance.

Mr. LONG renewed the motion withdrawn by Mr. MITCHELL. In doing so he wished to be distinctly understood, to be decidedly in favor of the system of retrenchment, and wished to have a full view of the subject to enable us to act understandingly, and adopt an equal system of retrenchment that would bear equally upon all; but it was evident that, if we now took it up, the time was too short, and that, by so doing, we should do nothing more this session. This bill was not intended to have any bearing on the present session; it was, therefore, not essentially necessary to act upon it just now, to the evident delay of all other business.

Mr. CANNON said he should vote for the postponement to avoid a further consumption of the time of the House in vain, as had happened upon a similar question at the last session of Congress. He was, he said, most decidedly opposed to any reduction of the pay or emolument of any member of Congress. He did not believe it to be the deliberate opinion of many members on this floor that the pay of the members is now too high, or that it ought to be reduced. The situation of the finances had been referred to as a reason why this little pitiful saving should be made. He did not believe, for himself, that the finances of the nation were such as to require the House to go into this sort of retrenchment. If retrenchment was to be made, it ought to be in a different way. If we undertake retrenchment, said he, how ought it to be begun? In the first place, get rid of those officers and persons for whom you have no occasion whatever. He regretted that the committee had thought proper to begin their plan of retrenchment where, even in their own opinion, it was not necessary. He had always been an advocate of retrenchment where it could be made in a proper way; but the situation of members of this House, in a pecuniary point of view, was worse than that of any other officers of the Government. [The SPEAKER here again checked the range of the debate.] Mr. C. said he should vote for the postponement of this bill upon a thorough conviction, that, if a majority was for it, it was yet impossible it should be carried into effect at the present session. There were very few who were of opinion that the members of Congress could, in justice to themselves, agree to the system of retrenchment in the shape in which the committee had presented it to the House.

Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH was of opinion that it was not now necessary to occupy any more of the attention of the House with the measure before it, but to put it off to the next session. He was in favor of the principle, recommended by the Committee, of reducing equally the expenses which the nation is put to in paying salaries to members of Congress, to the various officers of the Government, Heads of Departments, &c. But it was now obvious that this object could not be accomplished during the present session. The Committee of Retrenchment has acknowledged that the system which they have reported is deficient; that it is not in that perfect shape that could be wished. He thought it manifest, considering how short a time of the session remained, that it was inexpedient the House should be any longer delayed by a consideration of this bill. As then it was not, if passed, to operate till the next session; as the whole system is not matured, and cannot be without sacrificing all the remainder of the session, and perhaps not then, he should vote for the proposed postponement of this bill.

Compensation Bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, concurred in the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH.) Were it not for the bill now before the House, the bills concerning the Army and Navy might be passed, which would save $300,000 annually to the country, whereas the present bill only proposed a saving of seventy or eighty thousand dollars, and that from the pay of the members. Mr. S. was not indisposed to reduce the pay of the members, but he was opposed to the contemplated reduction of the salaries of the clerks, &c. This bill, he said, was only a small proportion of a great system of reduction, and now this was to be pressed upon the House, and the other parts of the system to be laid over—for it would not be pretended that it was practicable to go through with all the system at the present session. If those bills to which he had alluded (the Army and Navy bills) were passed, the House would derive some credit from them. Something worth while would be retrenched. One great reason, he observed, that was urged in favor of the bill, was the state of the finances. The Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. S. said, had not yet reported on the subject. A report had been made upon it, indeed, by the Committee on Retrenchment, but it was a report in which he could not concur. He should state in his place, that, after all the appropriations of the year were paid, and after all the unavailable funds were deducted, there would remain, upon the present estimate of the expenditures, &c., a balance of $721,000 in the Treasury at the expiration of the year 1822. There was nothing in the situation of our finances, then, he said, that required the immediate passage of the bill. Mr. S. further went on to state that, at the end of the year 1823, presuming the expenses to remain as at present, and the receipts to be as contemplated by the Secretary of the Treasury, there would be in the Treasury a balance of one million nine hundred thousand and odd dollars. The idea of taxation thrown out by the gentleman from Ohio, therefore, ought not to operate on the minds of members. There is no danger of taxation, said Mr. S. Provided you go into no new expenditures, there will be no occasion for it. With regard to the operation of the present system of revenue, which had been referred to, Mr. S. said, it certainly did not bear so hard on Ohio as on the Atlantic States, because there they pay no tax on salt or sugar, nor on spirits; and those three items form a very considerable portion, indeed, of all the revenue from customs. Therefore the gentleman from Ohio had no right to complain. The sugar tax is a million and a half of dollars—Do the people of Ohio pay any part of that? The tax on salt imported is $80,000. Do they pay any part of that? Mr. SMITH concluded by moving to lay this bill on the table, to take up the Military Appropriation bill.

Mr. TRACY having required the yeas and nays on this motion—

Mr. SMITH withdrew it, his object being to save time, and not spend it.

Mr. TRACY was opposed to the postponement of the bill, as he was to every other motion, of whatever description, calculated to defeat or delay its passage. He said that, although he was a member of the committee which reported the bill, he had not been very anxious to introduce it to the House, because he doubted the temper of the House on this subject, and was unwilling to incur even the suspicion of hunting popularity; but, as the bill had been introduced, and was now fairly before the House, he would be the last man to desert it, or to adopt any course to impede its progress. Mr. T. said he could not discover the force of the arguments which had been urged by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) or by the gentleman from Maryland, in favor of the postponement. The first objection which had been made to the present decision of the subject was, that the Committee of Retrenchment had not yet matured and presented their whole system, and that we ought not to act on a part until we had a view of the whole ground. This objection, Mr. T. said, was founded on a mistake. The committee had brought before the House all the measures which they proposed to do at the present session. It was true that there was one subject which the committee had not acted upon, but it was impossible that it should do so before the adjournment of Congress. But admitting, said Mr. T., that they have yet behind important propositions to submit, does it follow that the House ought not to act on those which were now before it? He thought not. First dispose of these, and he would assure the House, if there was time, the committee would not be neglectful of its duties. He thought it an insufficient reason to do nothing, because we could not do all that was desired. It was also objected by the gentleman from Virginia that there was not time at this session to go through the measures recommended by the committee. Mr. T. thought there was a great sufficiency of time, if there was in reality that disposition which had been so frequently and loudly professed of retrenching the expenditures of the Government. All the measures which had been submitted by the committee were plain and simple in their provisions; and members, if they were disposed, could determine at once whether they would vote for or against them. They afforded very little ground for debate. But, said Mr. T., suppose that we cannot accomplish them all, shall we not effect as much as we can? It has again been objected, that, although we may pass all the bills, the Senate will only pass the one reducing our compensation, and postpone the rest. Mr. T. could not believe this would be the case; but, if it should be, the responsibility is on them, and not upon us. Let us do right, and trust that they will; and at the worst we shall only be reduced one year before the other officers of Government are; which, although it might be wrong, would not be productive of serious mischief. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) had urged, in favor of the postponement of the bill, that the state of the Treasury did not require this retrenchment, and had pledged himself that there would be a balance in the Treasury at the end of the year of 721,000 dollars. Mr. T. said, that, however much he might respect the authority of the gentleman, he could not subscribe to this opinion. The committee to which he (Mr. T.) belonged had made a most diligent and laborious investigation of the subject, and had come to a result very different from this—a result which the committee was ready to sustain, by the most official documents that could be required. But, said Mr. T., all these arguments, if they are good for any thing, can be most appropriately urged against the passage of the bill. If gentlemen seriously think that we have not time to go through all the measures reported by the committee, and that therefore we ought not to pass any of them; or if they think the condition of the Treasury does not indicate the necessity of this retrenchment; then they can be at no loss to vote against the bill on its passage. Gentlemen who for any of these reasons shall vote against the bill, would in his opinion stand on high and honorable ground; but he begged them to meet the question fairly, and hoped that none would shrink from the responsibility of deciding the present bill on its merits. Gentlemen had seemed to regard this bill as originating from a spirit of innovation on the part of the committee. This was not the case. The committee had not been disposed to make innovations, but to resist them. The present compensation of public officers was the result of innovation on the good old republican system. It was that we might come back to this system, and because the finances of the country imperiously demanded we should, that the committee had reported this and the other bills. Mr. T. also endeavored to show that the embarrassment of acting on this subject would be much greater at the next than at the present session.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he was sorry to see that, whenever retrenchment was mentioned in this House, there was a disposition to take the most favorable views of our revenue; and, whenever the question of taxation occurred, to take most gloomy views of it. When the question of taxation was before the House at an earlier period of the session, said Mr. C., I was sanguine as to revenue. At that time the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means told us that he wanted a million of dollars—[Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, across the House, that he had no recollection of having said so.] The gentleman himself told me so, said Mr. C.—Mr. SMITH begged that the gentleman would confine himself to what had been said on this floor, without referring to private conversations.] Mr. C. said he had said no more than what had been stated to him when the question of taxation was under consideration. Now, it was a question of retrenchment, and the case was different. Mr. C. said he fully believed that the statement of the gentleman, made to-day, was correct. But, admitting that to be the fact, it was not sufficient to meet the purposes of this Government. We have, said he, not only to pay the expenses of the Government, but to provide for the extinguishment of a public debt of ninety-three millions, and, whatever gentlemen may tell us, it never will be extinguished by new taxation. There never was a national debt extinguished but by retrenchment. It never will be paid in any other way. All history shows us, that an uniform system of retrenchment is the only practicable way to reduce a public debt. In saying this, he did not pledge himself that he would adopt the opinion or system of this or that committee, or of this or that man. He would consent to reduce the salary of no public officer who deserved his pay. The reason why he was opposed to the postponement of this bill, was, that it ought to be fairly met. The nation expected it of Congress when they began to retrench the compensation of public officers, that they would fairly meet the question as to themselves first. Mr. C. said he considered all the laws, raising the salaries of the officers of this Government, passed in the year 1815, to have been, taking into view their continued existence, a fraud upon the nation. Depreciation of currency was the plea for them. Is it not now appreciated; and are they repealed? Is not that fact alone a reason for going back? It is. I say, begin here; how far we are afterwards to go, let every gentleman judge for himself. As to taking up the whole system of retrenchment at this session, no one could dream of it. We must go on by degrees, and do one thing at once, until we get through the whole.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, this was the first time, during this session at least, that he had heard members indulge themselves in stating, in debate, private conversations they may have had with other members. Was that a proper course? He apprehended not; because it tended to bring gentlemen into conflict on matters not properly belonging to the business of the House. Gentlemen ask me questions, said Mr. S. I answer them. They misunderstand both the answers and the questions. That is not my fault, but theirs. Mr. S. called upon the House to remember, that he had never been so sanguine, in regard to the revenue, as the gentleman from New York. It was the gentleman himself who said that the customs would produce one million more than the estimate. It is very likely, said Mr. S., that the honorable gentleman might have heard me say, for I have said so to many members, that there was a necessity for more revenue—not for the present year, not for the next year, but whenever it should become necessary for the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to pay off a quantity of the public debt, redeemable in the year 1825. Then there will be occasion for more revenue. If the gentleman could charge his memory with the particulars, he would find that the conversation, which took place between us, was to that point. The sum total of conversation on his part, Mr. S.

said, must have been, that more revenue would be wanted in the year 1825.

Mr. WRIGHT said, he was very sorry that the gentleman from New York had used the language, that a fraud was practised on this nation, when the pay of the members was fixed at eight dollars per day. There was, indeed, Mr. W. said, at the time of that act, an attempt to produce an excitement upon the subject in the public mind. But it failed; in Maryland it fully failed. Why, asked Mr. W., should not a member of this House, who represents 35,000 freemen, be decently compensated? I told my constituents, when the law passed, that it did not increase their burdens, or lessen their enjoyments, as much as a single glass of gin each per year. Is there any man who comes here, whose attention to his domestic concerns, had he remained at home, would have been of no consequence? The people know whom they elect, and they select for their representatives those who, when at home, best manage their own concerns. He protested against the assumption, that there was a fraud practised on the people in raising the pay of Congress—and he considered this effort now to be, if it was in order he would say, a mere pretence—a mere electioneering scheme. But he would not violate order by saying what it was: if facts proved it to be so, he could not help it. Mr. W. then went on to examine the grounds on which the pay of the members had been raised to eight dollars, and how he had reconciled his constituents to it, by showing them that the judges, who stay in comfort at home with their families, received twenty-five dollars per day for their services, whilst he, removed from his family, and living upon expenses here, received but eight dollars per day, &c. The compensation of every other officer of Government, said Mr. W., had been raised once or twice before we raised our own; and, when we did it, we were denounced for it—by whom? By popularity hunters; and they got their reward. There was one or two of them, Mr. W. said, in his country, to whom he had had the honor of giving a pretty genteel dressing. He wished he had the portraits of some of the men to whom his remarks were addressed. And now we are told we commit a fraud upon the people. [Mr. CAMBRELENG disclaimed any design of imputing fraudulent intention to those who passed the law raising the pay of members. The SPEAKER requested Mr. W. to confine himself to the question.] Mr. W. said, he was replying to the remarks of the gentleman from New York. [Mr. CAMBRELENG said, the gentleman imputed to him what he did not say.] Mr. W. said, the gentleman did say, in the hearing of the whole House, that a fraud had been committed. [The SPEAKER insisted on the debate being confined to the question—that of postponement.] Mr. W. said he hoped the bill would be postponed; and if he could fix the day of postponement, it would be doomsday. Eight dollars per day, in specie, Mr. W. went on to say, was allowed by the State of Maryland to her Representatives in Congress during the whole of the Revolutionary war—and was it fraudulent now to pay them the same? If the bill was postponed to the next session, Mr. W. said, it would, he believed, have very few friends indeed then, for the elections would have passed before that time. If any change was intended to be made, it certainly ought to be made now. There were gentlemen here who required all their pay, and more too, to support them—and the whole of it was not more than enough for any man who comes here in the capacity of a Representative. If a man is not fit for something at home, he is not fit to come here. What State had asked for this measure; what part of the people have petitioned for it? None. Mr. W. denied that the compensation was now too great, or even sufficient. Let any man, said he, who has got a young wife bring her here, and keep her here during the session, and see whether he will make any profit by it. And even with regard to those who have no wives, it cannot be said that, when they calculate the variety of expenses incidental to human frailty, their compensation is too great.

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, said he was opposed to the postponement of the bill under consideration to the next session. He had long been satisfied that the state of the finances of the nation required retrenchment, and he was disposed to commence the work of economy. As a part of the system of necessary reform contemplated, and in part reported by the committee, he was willing to include the members of Congress, though he thought their compensation by no means too much. He said, if Congress reduced their own pay, the salaries and compensation of other officers might be reduced, and many unnecessary offices abolished, without detriment to the public service, and he would therefore agree to the passage of the bill. He could not consent to the postponement of the measure, inasmuch as it had been several days under consideration, and had been taken up this morning by a vote of 123 to 30. He said the House were bound to meet the question and decide it fairly, and could not, after two days' debate upon it, postpone the subject, without being exposed to a suspicion of a desire to avoid it. Mr. B. said he was pleased with the calculations and argument contained in the report of the committee, but should have preferred to have their entire system of retrenchment before the present bill was discussed. He was aware that there was not time, at this period of the session, to discuss and pass upon the bills which the committee had presented, but he thought the House had proceeded so far in the discussion upon the bill now before it, that it would be deemed trifling now to postpone it. He said, when this bill was first presented, and only a part of the system of retrenchment exhibited, he moved to recommit the bill and report of the committee, that the committee might prepare and complete their system, and present it altogether at the commencement of the next session. He then thought, as there was much other important business before the House, it would be prudent to delay this bill till the whole plan of the committee should be completed, which could not be done before the next session. Then, he said, at that early stage of the discussion, both the gentlemen (Mr. A. SMYTH, of Virginia, and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland) were opposed to a recommitment and postponement of the bill, but now, after two days debate upon it, they were very solicitous for a postponement. He said he had been charged, on account of his motion to recommit the bill, with a disposition to avoid the question; but he would assure gentlemen he was willing to meet it, and hoped it would now be decided, though he said he should regret exceedingly to have the bill reducing the compensation of members only passed, without making a further retrenchment, because he said it would be construed into an electioneering project.

Mr. LITTLE was in favor of the postponement, and replied briefly to the remarks of Mr. BUTLER. He was not afraid of meeting the question, nor was he disposed to trifle with the subject. And it was because he was unwilling to trifle with it, or with the public interest, that he was in favor of the motion, for it was very evident that, during the time occupied in this discussion, other bills making greater savings might be passed, and which would reflect as much honor on the House as this. This bill was only prospective in its operation, and if the Treasury is now empty, the passage of this bill will not contribute to fill it, since it does not take effect until the next session. There were bills of an important nature on the table, enough to occupy all the little remaining time of the session, and he hoped the time would not be spent in discussing this, which was of less importance, and of which the passage, at best, was doubtful, and which, when passed, could not take effect until the next session.

Mr. BALDWIN was opposed to the postponement, because the question had been pretty well discussed, the minds of members were made up, and it would be better to meet the question directly. The lateness of the period of the session was no argument for him against acting upon it. We have fixed a day for terminating the session, it is true, said Mr. B., but when we did it, I presume it was with an expectation that we could get through all our business within the time proposed. He regretted to see the disposition to hurry off this business. The Committee of Retrenchment had reported to this House that there would be an actual deficiency of revenue, for the present year, of $2,100,000. The Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had asserted, on the other hand, that there would be a surplus of $721,000. If the first statement was true, what was to be done? And if the last were true, a surplus of $700,000 was hardly sufficient to provide for the chapter of accidents. But if it should turn out not to be true, Congress would have to be convened in order to authorize a loan. Of all times in the session, then, this is the time for retrenching expenses. The committee on that subject has come forward with items of their calculations, and the chairman has declared himself ready to support it with documents. And, Mr. B. said, he took it for granted that the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would not have come forward in the solemn manner he did to-day, without being also prepared with documents to support his statement. Upon an examination and due understanding of this point, Mr. B. said, his decision depended. If he was satisfied that the Committee on Retrenchment was right, he should vote to cut down two millions somewhere. If he was satisfied that the gentleman from Maryland was right, he would cut down nothing but abuses—he would lop off nothing but excrescences—nothing but what was useless. Now, the gentlemen being ready with their statements, the contest could be settled in a few hours. A great proportion of this House thinks that retrenchment is necessary. I am prepared to say, (added Mr. B.,) if the revenue falls short of the expenditure, it is the duty of every man to reduce the expenditure. He would not now say what errors had heretofore been made by committees on the subject of the finances; but he would say, that you must not rely on their estimates without seeking their documents. There had been important mistakes heretofore committed in that way—misstatements of millions. He did not mention this reproachfully; for it was difficult to estimate correctly what must necessarily be uncertain. Our expenses are certain, and we ought to be equally sure of the competency of our revenue to meet them. He wanted, he said, to see these documents. As to taking statements from a committee as a matter of faith, to bind him in opposition to a matter of reason, he, for one, would not do it, for the best of all reasons—that the experience of many years shows that they are often grossly inaccurate.

When Mr. B. concluded—

The question was taken upon the proposed postponement to the first Monday in December next—yeas 33, nays 132, as follows:

So the motion was negatived.

Mr. Ton again called for the previous question, but the same not being demanded by a majority of the members present, could not be put.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the instructions, as proposed by Mr. HILL, as above described; and it was determined in the negative.

During the remainder of this day's proceedings, there was further desultory debate, in which the following gentlemen took part, viz: Messrs. RHEA, JONES, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, WALWORTH, F. JONES, ALEX. SMYTH, MERCER, KENT, and ROCHESTER.

The actual proceedings, exclusive of debate, were as follows:

Mr. CONDUCT moved to amend the proposed instructions on recommitment, by expunging therefrom the words "mileage, six dollars for every twenty miles, also to make the;" which motion was disagreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, then moved to amend the said instructions, so as to require the committee to amend the bill in such way as would allow the members four dollars per day for their attendance, and four dollars for every twenty miles of their necessary travel to and from the Seat of Government.

And the question being stated—

Mr. SANDERS then withdrew his motion to recommit the bill, and Mr. JONES's motion fell with it of course.

Whereupon Mr. PATTERSON, of New York, renewed the motion to recommit the bill, with the instructions proposed by Mr. SANDERS, modified in the former part thereof, as proposed in the amendment moved by Mr. JONES. And the question being stated thereon—

Mr. LONG moved to amend the said instructions by striking out four dollars, and in lieu thereof inserting seven dollars.

Mr. BASSETT then moved to amend the said motion to recommit by expunging all the instructions.

The SPEAKER declared this motion not to be in order, it being in effect a call for a division of a question declared by the rules of the House not divisible.

From which decision Mr. BASSETT appealed to the House; and upon the question being taken, Is the decision of the Chair correct? It was decided in the affirmative.

The question then recurred on the amendment proposed by Mr. LONG, and, being taken, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. BASSETT moved to amend the instructions by striking out four dollars and inserting six; and the yeas and nays being ordered on that question, it was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Baldwin, Barber of Ohio, Bassett, Blair, Breckenridge, Burton, Cambreleng, Campbell of Ohio, Chambers, Conkling, Crafts, Crutcher, Cuthbert, Dane, Durfee, Dwight, Edwards of North Carolina, Floyd, Gebhard, Gilmer, Gist, Hardin, Harvey, Hendricks, Herrick, Hobart, Holcombe, Hooks, Hubbard, Jackson, F. NAYS—Messrs. Smith, Sterling of Connecticut, Stevenson, Stewart, Stoddard, Swan, Taylor, Tod, Tomlinson, Tracy, Tucker of Virginia, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Walworth, Warfield, White, Whitman, Williamson, Woodcock, Worman, Wright—92.

So the House refused to strike out four dollars and insert six.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, then moved to recommit the bill to a Committee of the whole House, and make it the order of the day for this day, his object being to restore the bill to its original shape, and the yeas and nays being ordered on that question, it was decided in the negative—yeas 56, nays 105.

Mr. A. SMYTH moved to amend the instructions by striking out all after the word bill, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That, from and after the last day of June next, the pay for travelling and attendance of members of the Senate and House of Representatives; the pay and allowances of their officers and clerks; the salaries of the Secretaries of State, the Treasury, the Navy, and the War Departments, and their clerks; of the Attorney General and his clerk; of the Postmaster General, his assistants and clerks; the Commissioner of the Land Office, and his clerks; of the Commissioners of the Navy Board, and their clerks; of the Treasurer, and his clerks; of the Comptrollers of the Treasury, and their clerks; of the Auditors of the Treasury, and their clerks; and the Register, and his clerks, shall be reduced twenty per cent."

Letter from Mr. Rodney.

APRIL, 1822.

Mr. ROCHESTER moved to add the following to this proposed amendment:

"Excepting such clerks whose annual salary does not amount to more than $1,000; and provided that the reduction of no clerk's salary, which now exceeds $1,000 per annum, shall be reduced below said sum."

But before any question was taken thereon, the House adjourned.

MONDAY, April 29.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the petition of Anthony Dey and James Macdonald, and the petition or remonstrance of David Melville; and also a report of the Committee on Agriculture on the first mentioned petition, made an unfavorable report; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, made a report on the petition of William R. Maddox, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKE moved that the House take into consideration a resolution, heretofore submitted by him, to appoint a committee to investigate the state of the several departments of the Government during the recess of Congress; and the question being taken thereon, the House refused to consider the motion—ayes 57, noes 77.

A message received from the Senate containing the result of the conference between the committees of the two Houses in relation to the bill for granting to the States of Mississippi and Alabama three per cent. upon the sales of public lands within the said States, was read, and Mr. RANKIN moved that the House do so far recede from their amendment to the amendment of the Senate as to comply with the amendment recommended by the committee of conference, which was agreed to. A further message received from the Senate, returning the navy appropriation bill, with sundry amendments, was taken up.

Mr. COOK moved to disagree to the amendment in relation to excepting from the proviso the defaulters who became so in consequence of the depreciation of Treasury notes. Those notes, he said, had long disappeared from circulation, and if any person had been so remiss as to obtain no settlement for so long a time, he thought he ought not to be excepted from the operation of the general proviso.

A few further remarks were made by Mr. WALWORTH against, and by Mr. FULLER in favor of the motion to disagree, when the question was taken thereon, and lost—ayes 54, noes 58. Then the amendment was agreed to.

LETTER FROM MR. RODNEY.

The SPEAKER communicated to the House a letter addressed to him by CÆSAR A. RODNEY, a Senator of the United States from the State of Delaware, explanatory of his transactions with the War Department, as referred to in the report of the select committee to whom was referred the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the subject of the examinations of the land offices in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri; which letter was read and ordered to lie on the table. The letter is as follows:

HON. PHILIP P. BARBOUR,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR: In a report made to the House of Representatives, by the select committee, to whom were referred several communications, from the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to the manner in which the land offices have been examined, it is stated—

"The committee believe it to have been usual in the War Department also to employ members of Congress as counsel in behalf of the United States, and they refer particularly to the instances of Mr. Baldwin, of the House of Representatives, and Mr. Rodney, of Delaware, of the Senate, employed and paid as counsel, under the direction of the present Secretary of War."

With respect to myself, an error has been, unintentionally, committed; as I was not, when employed or paid, a member of Congress, either of the Senate or of the House of Representatives; this will appear from the sequel. On the 6th of March, 1820, I received a letter from Major Babcock, of the corps of engineers, who was stationed at Newcastle, requesting my professional services in the case of an ejectment brought for the Pea Patch, the trial of which was expected to take place at Trenton, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of New Jersey, on the first of April following. Agreeably to this desire I attended the court, but the trial was postponed in consequence of the absence of material witnesses on the part of the defendant. Rules were obtained for the taking their depositions, and also for a special jury, and for a survey of the disputed premises.

In the Summer of 1820, a detailed report of the case was prepared and transmitted to the Department of War. At the October term, in the same year, I attended again at Trenton; and was there on the day of the general election in Delaware, when Representatives to the 17th, or present Congress, were chosen. The result, however, was not known until some days after my return.

In the month of November following, I was paid for the services rendered, and I have not since been at the court.

The Constitutional term of the present House of Representatives commenced on the 4th March, 1821. Until that period arrived, I was not a member of Congress, and might have held any other incompatible office under the Constitution of the United States or of Delaware.

The Legislature of the State of Delaware chose me a Senator of the United States on the 10th of January last, but the certificate of my election was not received in consequence of my absence from severe indisposition, until the 24th of that month, when I took my seat in the Senate.

This simple narrative of facts, given according to the best of my recollection, assisted by the original papers lately received, is respectfully submitted to the consideration of the House of Representatives with a view of correcting any erroneous impressions which may have been made by the unintentional mistake of so respectable a committee. I have, &c.,

Post Office Investigation.

H. OF R.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1822," were read and agreed to by the House.

POST OFFICE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. SANDERS, from the select committee appointed to investigate the Post Office Department, made the following report thereon :

The select committee to whom was referred the investigation of the affairs of the Post Office Department, have had, according to order, the same under consideration, and beg leave to report :

That, as the attention of the committee was directed to no specific object but to the fiscal affairs of the Post Office Department generally, they have endeavored to give to their examination such a direction as they considered most likely to elicit any improper transactions in the Department, if any such existed, and at the same time to exhibit its concerns in such a point of view as would best enable the House to judge of its management and condition.

The investigation, however, which the committee have been enabled to make, has been of too partial a character to prove satisfactory even to themselves. The lateness of the period at which it was commenced, the preliminary calls which they found it necessary to make, added to their other duties on the House, forbid their going into that extensive inquiry into the different contracts, receipts, and expenditures, of the Department, which would have required their exclusive attention for weeks, but from which alone a full, fair, and correct report of its various transactions can ever be made. Partial abuses may be examined and exposed, and thus lead to the correction of others of more consequence, though more difficult to discover. The points of inquiry to which the attention of the committee has been especially directed, and the facts which they have been enabled to collect, may not prove without their use. These points are as follows, viz :

1. Whether duplicates of all contracts and proposals made and entered into with the Department, have been lodged with the Comptroller of the Treasury ?

2. Whether, in any instance, contracts have been improperly given to one person, in preference to another ?

3. Whether the public money has been improperly advanced to contractors, or other persons in the service of the Department, in anticipation of their services ?

4. Whether certain deputy postmasters have made due returns of the expenses incident to their office, and whether they have not been allowed for extravagant expenditures ?

Whether the Postmaster General has taken timely steps for the recovery of the different sums due the Department from deputy postmasters.

I. With respect to the first point of inquiry, the committee called on the Comptroller of the Treasury, to be furnished with the duplicates of certain contracts and the proposals, for the purpose of examining the same, which they were unable to obtain. They then addressed a letter to the Comptroller of the Treasury, for the purpose of knowing on what principle the accounts of the Postmaster General were audited and settled. In reply, they learnt that from the practical construction given to the act for regulating the Post Office Establishment, the receipts, and not the contracts, were taken as the criterion of settlement, and the Post Office accounts audited accordingly. If the duplicates of contracts and the proposals, were merely to be deposited for safe-keeping with the Comptroller, and not as vouchers to direct him in passing upon the different payments made by the Postmaster General, it could be a matter of but little consequence whether the requisites of the law in this particular were complied with or not. The committee now learn that a different mode of settlement is determined on ; and, though it may be attended with some difficulty and delay, it certainly will produce more correctness and responsibility.

II. On the second point of inquiry, the committee learnt, from rumor, that contracts had been improperly obtained from the Department, and sold out to considerable profit. But, from a careful examination of the books in which are entered the different proposals, though they find many instances in which the contract was not given to the lowest bidder, still they have not been enabled to discover any one which particular circumstances might not have justified.

III. On the third point of inquiry, as to moneys advanced contractors, and other persons in the service of the Department, in anticipation of their services, the Committee find that, on the 1st day of January last, there were on the Post Office books unliquidated accounts for moneys and debts thus advanced, the amount of

That, since that time, there has been repaid by services rendered - - - 17,288 75

That, of this sum, there was advanced by the late Postmaster General - - - 13,707 49

The most of these advances may have been properly made in aid of post office contracts, though in some instances no such reason could have existed. That, of this amount, there will probably be lost something short of $10,000.

In connexion with this subject, the attention of the committee has been directed to the transportation of the mail between Philadelphia and New York, and the employment of Chester Bailey as agent and contractor with the Department. They find, so early as 1811, the mail between those cities was carried under the immediate control of the Department, under the superintendence of Chester Bailey, as agent, and with the property of the United States, purchased for that purpose. That, for the year 1814, as will appear from the annexed account of Chester Bailey, the expense of transporting the mail between Philadelphia and Jersey City, to have been $9,154 20. That the Postmaster General then contracted with Chester Bailey, for the transportation of the mail on the same route at six thousand five hundred dollars, giving him the use of the United States' property. That this arrangement continued until 1818, when Chester Bailey agreed to take, at valuation, the United States' property, and continue the carriage of the mail at the same price. That the property was valued to him, by two contractors, at $2,885, much less than the cost, or what must have been its real value. That, since that time, the mail has been carried, by contract, at six thousand five hundred dollars per annum. It further appears, that there has been paid to Chester Bailey, for various services as agent of the Department, $1,042 53. That he receives an annual salary of $800 as agent, besides his travelling expenses, when called on by the Department, in discharge of such duties as may be required of him. Whatever necessity may have existed for his employment, whilst the mail between Philadelphia and New York was carried at the expense of the Department, the committee can perceive no such necessity to exist at present.

The act regulating the Post Office Establishment declares that, in no instance, shall deputy postmasters receive a larger compensation than two thousand dollars, after deducting the expenditures incident to their office. It further provides, that every deputy postmaster, whose receipts shall amount to $1,000, shall make an annual return of the expenses incident to his office. The act does not, in express terms, give to the Postmaster General a control over their expenses, many of which appear highly extravagant, and ought to be curtailed. From the annexed returns, it will be seen that the commissions of forty-one deputy postmasters, and the contingent expenses allowed for their officers, amount to - - - - $112,066 75 to which should be added the extra compensation of the deputy postmaster in Washington, one of the number - - - - 1,000 00

Making - - - - $113,066 75

The last object of inquiry with the committee, was for the purpose of knowing whether the Postmaster General had directed suits in all cases of failure on the part of deputy postmasters within the time prescribed by law, and if not, whether he had charged himself with the amount of their accounts, for failing to do so. This was a fact difficult to ascertain, as well from the multiplicity of deputy postmasters, the number against whom suits had been brought, and the particular time of instituting the same. The committee find from the balances as stated on the books of the Post Office Department, there appears due to the General Post Office, up to the first day of January last $424,462 24½ That of this sum there was due from deputy postmasters in office, and who had gone out of office - - - 370,108 24½ That of this sum there was in suit, as near as could be ascertained - - 100,000 00 But whether these suits were instituted in the time prescribed by law, the committee have not been enabled to ascertain.

In conclusion, the committee will submit a brief comparative view of the receipts and expenditures of the department, between a former and the last year.

The receipts of the Post Office Department for the year 1816, were - - $961,782 00

For transportation of the mail - - - - $521,970 00
Compensation and incidental expenses - - 282,452 00
804,422 00

Balance in favor of the department - $157,360 00

The receipts for the year 1821, were $1,029,102 00

For transportation of the mail - - - - $814,998 06
Compensation and incidental expenses - - 365,003 00
1,180,061 00

Against the department - - - $150,959 06

On the 31st of December last, there were six hundred and ninety-three contracts, for the carriage of the mail, on one thousand and forty-eight post routes.

But whether these increased objects of expenditure, or the want of a proper management in the Post Office concerns, has produced this large difference, the committee will not undertake to decide.

As the investigation of the committee has resulted in what may require legislative enactments, and as they have no power to report by bill, they submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the Post Office Department, be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The report was ordered to be printed, and laid on the table.

PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

Mr. DWIGHT then moved that the House do consider a motion which he this morning laid on the table; and the House agreed to consider it—ayes 69, noes 57; which motion is in the following words:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to examine the decisions of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, with the power to send for persons and papers, and leave to report at the next session.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Ohio, expressed a desire to understand from the mover what was the precise object of his motion.

Mr. DWIGHT said he had been a member of the Committee of Expenditures, which was lately for several weeks investigating the expenditures of the Government, and particularly those which were under the control of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury. The particular object of this resolution was to have an examination into cases decided by that officer, in opposition to the opinions of the Auditors of the Treasury. The law constituting the office of Second Comptroller of the Treasury, it was well known to the House, gave to that officer the power of deciding, finally, on accounts which pass the Second, Third, and Fourth Auditor's Office. A year or two ago, on a settlement of the accounts of John H. Piatt, he was found to be indebted to the United States in a balance of $48,000, which he was totally unable to pay, and, on that account, principally, a law was passed, at the last session, authorizing a settlement of his accounts according to equity, with a proviso, however, that no allowance should be made to his credit which should exceed the sum reported, in settlement, to be due by him to the United States. It is now alleged that, under that law, the Second Comptroller, in opposition to the opinion of the Third Auditor, made to J. H. Piatt allowances which made him a creditor of the Government for $60,000 over and above the sum of $48,000, for which he was previously reported to be indebted. The committee being of opinion that this was a legal question, and not within their province, it appeared to Mr. D. that justice to the individual making the decision, as well as to the Government, required an investigation of the principles on which this decision had been made. There was, at the bottom of this motion, no disposition to injure the individual who fills the office of Second Comptroller, but simply to promote justice in regard to all parties concerned.

Mr. ROSS said he should have made no opposition to the appointment of a committee of a general character; but he had no idea of this House establishing a committee with inquisitorial powers, to make an investigation either favorable or otherwise, of a legal decision. The Second Comptroller of the Treasury is to the Third Auditor what the judge is to the jury. The duty of the Auditors is to judge more of matters of fact than of matters of a legal character. Mr. R. said he thought it his duty, not merely in consequence of the remarks which have been here publicly made, but because of the pamphleteering publications and newspaper paragraphs which had been put forth, calculated, and, for aught he knew, intended to injure the claim of John H. Piatt, to say a few words. That man, said Mr. R., has gone to his long home. I could have wished that his name might have been suffered to have rested in peace. He has rendered to this country services as great as any other man in this Government, I care not whom. He was an honest man, to say the least of him, and say what you will of him. He hoped, he said, that this House would not institute a committee clothed with the powers now proposed, for the purpose of giving their views, either of the matter of fact or of law, to the prejudice of the claim of the representatives of Mr. Piatt when it should come before Congress to be adjudicated by this body in its legal character. If there was to be any inquiry instituted, let it be a general one. If, said he, you are about to seek out persons against whom you are to let loose the dogs of war, bring forward your black list. Do not single out the case of this man because his claim happens to be one of considerable magnitude. Let your inquiry be general. Whatever might be other men's merits, Mr. R. said he had no hesitation in saying, that, when that man's claim came before the House, and the law-makers were not the law-expounders, the House would give that man his claim as reported by the Second Comptroller of the Treasury. Judges ought never to be expounders of the law which they themselves have made. Mr. R. said he should therefore vote against this resolution.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said the power proposed by this resolution to be confided to a committee, was one which the House was constantly in the habit of exercising, and which, as he understood the duties of the House, they ought to exercise. He was sorry that the gentleman from Ohio should have thought it necessary to raise an opposition to this resolution. What did the resolution propose? A mere inquiry into transactions between the friends of a man now deceased, and the accounting officers of the Treasury. Mr. M. said he did not, for his part, understand that any injury to the interest of the representatives of the late friend of the gentleman from Ohio, was to follow this inquiry. Was such a supposition a fair argument against this motion? Mr. M. said he could not consider the Comptrollers of the Treasury in the light of judges. Nor, did Congress consider them as such; for nothing was more common than a re-examination by Congress of the accounts which those officers have refused to admit, &c. If, said he, we are to have accounts investigated judicially, let them be investigated according to the ordinary forms of courts of law, and not carried into a room in the Treasury Department, and there read over and decided upon. Let us have an examination and scrutiny of the accounts according to official and customary forms of courts, and then he would be disposed to yield undisputed assent to the judgments of these officers. But as long as accounts were revised and re-examined by the Comptrollers as they now are, there was a great propriety in examining them over again in Congress. Mr. M. said he could not believe that those Comptrollers were to sit as judges, because they would seem, under that view, to have the double character of executive and judicial officers. Those were powers which ought not to be blended. With these views, Mr. M. said he should certainly vote for this proposition. If the claim of Mr. Piatt's representatives was a just one, the committee would support the decision of the Comptroller. But, if it should be found that the claim was unfounded either in law or equity, the gentleman from Ohio himself must agree, that it ought not to be allowed.

Mr. WRIGHT made a motion to amend this resolution, so as to direct the proposed committee to investigate, not the decisions of the Comptroller, but the outstanding balances due by individuals to the United States. Mr. W. made a variety of remarks on the importance of such an investigation as this, to show what was the real character of the balances reported as due to the United States. A great deal of heart-burning and uneasiness would be saved by a full and fair inquiry into the matter, and an exposition of its merits. Such an inquiry was due to the people, and he knew it would be gratifying to the Executive. He did not believe the money of the nation could be better expended than on such an inquiry, &c.

Mr. MALLARY rose and said he believed that a great part of the House had a real and anxious wish to get to some business which could be concluded at the present session, and, therefore, moved to lay this resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER said the hour allowed for the consideration of original motions had passed, and the resolution would be ordered, of course, to lie on the table; and it was laid on the table accordingly.

MILITARY REGULATIONS.

The bill from the Senate to repeal the fourteenth section of the act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment, (which section establishes General Scott's Regulations for the government of the Army,) was read a third time; and the question being on its passage—

Mr. FLOYD said that this bill ought not to pass without some examination; because the Rules and Regulations which it went to repeal contained some provisions which were not intended to be established by Congress, and were not in the Regulations when they were established by Congress.

The seventy-fifth article of those regulations contained a manifest forgery, which ought to be examined into. He had before him the manuscript Rules, as laid before the Congress previous to their being established. He had also the copy printed from the manuscript for the use of this House, and conforming to it. He had also in his hand the copy promulgated by the War Department. In that copy the seventy-fifth article read as follows: "Article 75. Transfers. 1. The transfer of officers will only be made by the War Department, in order, upon the mutual application of the parties, except in extraordinary cases.—See 63d article of war. Nor shall an officer be transferred into a regiment to the prejudice of the rank of any officer thereof. When officers are transferred at their own request, the order for change of station will specify the fact.—See art. 69, par. 81." In the Rules presented to this House, and by it enacted into law, the words in italic, as above, were not to be found. It was a subsequent interpolation and a palpable forgery. He had other objections to urge. There was no situation, he said, in which officers could be placed, in time of peace, in which they did not get their brevet pay, and other emoluments which Congress did not intend they should have. And rumor (which a gentleman from Virginia said the other day was often malignant) had informed him that, when General Brown was attacked with the malady under which he yet labors, application was made by General Scott for the command of the Army, on the ground that he was the oldest Brevet Major General, though the youngest Brigadier, and this too to the exclusion of a man who had risen from the lowest to the highest ranks of the Army, by merit and with fame.

Mr. A. SMYTH explained what, as he understood them, were the facts in this case. The regulations prepared by General Scott were printed, it was true, for the use of the House. General Scott, then in Philadelphia, received one or more copies of the document after it was printed, and went into an examination and correction of errors therein, as well of the press as of the manuscript, and also made certain alterations in the text. He, (Mr. S.), then chairman of the Military Committee, received a copy from him with a few alterations; and, afterwards, through the War Department, another copy, containing considerable alterations. When he came to draw up the bill, which passed into an act, establishing the regulations compiled by Major General Scott for the government of the Army, it was his intention that the last copy received from General Scott, having the advantage of his full corrections, should be the one established. For that purpose, he deposited that copy with the Clerk of the House. He was perfectly convinced that all the corrections to be found in the promulgated order were made anterior to the passage of the act establishing the regulations; and that they were then intended by Congress to be what they have been published by the War Department. He was confident his colleague was mistaken in supposing there had been any subsequent interpolation of them.

Mr. COCKE said that he was one of the Military Committee to whose inspection and consideration was submitted the Regulations compiled by Major General Scott. The Committee requested the chairman of that committee to have the document printed and laid on the tables of the different members. They did not, to the best of his recollection, alter it in any manner. On comparing the seventy-fifth article of the regulations, as published for the use of the Army, by whom he knew not, with that which was before this House when the law was passed, there was a manifest difference. The operation of the alteration in that article had been productive of injustice to the officers of the Army. Under it, Colonel Lindsay had been transferred from the 7th Regiment of Infantry to the 3d Regiment of Artillery, manifestly to the injury of all the officers of the Third Regiment of Artillery. Mr. C. then read the seventy-fifth section from each book, showing the discrepancy between the two.

Mr. ARCHER made a few remarks, not distinctly heard by the reporter, the import of which were, that the accusation thus presented to the House was a serious one, and, as going to affect the character or question the conduct of General Scott, it was proper it should not be hastily passed over. He, therefore, proposed that the bill should lie on the table, with the intimation that, General Scott being now in the city, he would undertake to ascertain and state to the House in what manner these alleged alterations have been made.

Mr. TATNALL said, he was under the impression that the repeal of the 14th section of the act of 1821, suggested by this bill from the Senate, would be perhaps proper and necessary. A slight examination would satisfy any one, that there was an essential difference in several material parts of the work which was distributed to the Army of the United States, under the title of "Rules and Regulations," from the manuscript copy which had been presented under that title to the House at the last session, and which, after having been printed, received the legislative sanction of Congress. The consequence was, that the Army had been subjected to rules, which, from their being without legal sanction, ought to have no binding force whatever. This furnished a reason with him for wishing to repeal the 14th section. He had, however, an additional reason for such a wish. The copy which was distributed among the officers of the Army contained a provision which he trusted this House would never sanction—a provision which would enable the Department of War to trample tyrannically upon the rights of officers, and he trusted this House would never lend its aid to produce such an effect. He alluded to that section which authorized the transfer, from one corps to another, of an officer, even to the prejudice of the corps to which he was transferred. He for one would never sanction any such tyranny. The rights of officers had been, under the act of 1821, but little regarded indeed! He felt warmly on this subject, he acknowledged. He had once belonged to the Army, and he was, therefore, perhaps more sensibly alive to the interests of its officers. He, however, thought he might be indulged in speaking warmly on this subject; for it so happened that one of the officers intended to be benefited by the recent nominations to the Senate, was, with the exception of a brother, the nearest relative he had. This consideration, however, would not prevent his saying that the conduct of the Department was tyrannical and oppressive, and that we should disgrace ourselves if we did not, like the Senate, present to it an effectual opposition. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SMYTH) had entered into an explanation, with regard to the mistake. Mr. T. totally acquitted Major General Scott of blame or dishonor in the alteration subsequently made in these "rules and regulations." Mr. T. felt confident that no officer of the United States Army would be guilty of any act unbecoming a gentleman, and particularly the high-minded and gallant officer alluded to. He, however, could not but add that, although he might have felt honored by being the author of the first copy presented to Congress (which did not contain the odious section alluded to) he should not deem it an honor to have been the author of the last, particularly after having attained to rank which would place him above the operation of the section objected to. He hoped the House was prepared to pass the bill.

Mr. STEVENSON said, that, during a few moments' absence from the House, the bill under consideration had been taken up, and some remarks made, which he had not heard, but which he understood might be calculated to inculpate the conduct of General Scott in this business. Mr. S. said, that whatever the nature of the charge might be, he felt assured that nothing improper could be brought home to that gallant and distinguished officer. No accusation or insinuation ever ought to be made without affording an opportunity for explanation. Mr. S. knew him well; he had known him from his youth, and he felt justified in assuring the House that if the bill were laid on the table till to-morrow, a satisfactory explanation, as far as General Scott was concerned, would be given. It was due to the high-minded and gallant officer, whose reputation was dear to the country; it was due to the House to suffer the bill to lie till to-morrow, and he moved it accordingly.

Mr. FLOYD again rose. The alleged alteration of regulations after being sanctioned by law was no mistake, he said, as his colleague seemed to think; for the documents were here to establish the contrary. The book, as promulgated, was not that which the law declares shall be established. The interpolation could not be otherwise regarded than as a gross fraud practised upon the country, to the injury of the rights of brave officers of the Army. Those officers, he said, had suffered the blackest injustice by the reduction of the Army, but not from those who had any agency in passing the law for the reduction. Had the reduction of the Army been left to the friends of the law reducing the Army, it would not have been so executed as it had been; and it was not of them, but of those who executed the law, that the officers who were injured had a right to complain.

Mr. ARCHER then, with the sentiments already avowed, moved to lay the bill on the table.

And the bill was laid on the table.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The engrossed bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road, was read a third time.

Mr. TAYLOR said, he considered this bill as so important in its character, and as being such a violation of the Constitution, that he felt himself impelled to call for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were thereupon ordered.

Mr. REED, of Maryland, moved to recommit the bill, for the purpose of causing to be stricken out of it the section that authorizes the President of the United States to lessen or increase the rates of the tolls. That was an act of legislation, he said, which it was not competent for the President of the United States to exercise. The motion was supported by the mover, and opposed by Messrs. LITTLE, ROSS, TRIMBLE, and STEWART.

Mr. REED, of Maryland, called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered; and the question on commitment being taken, it was decided in the negative, yeas 41, nays 115.

The question was then put, Shall the bill pass? and determined in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 68, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barber of Ohio, Barstow, Baylies, Bayly, Blackledge, Breckenridge, Buchanan, Campbell of New York, Campbell of Ohio, Cassidy, Chambers, Cocke, Condict, Cook, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dane, Dickinson, Durfee, Dwight, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Findlay, Fuller, Hardin, Hemphill, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, Jackson, J. So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS, &c.

An engrossed bill for the relief of certain insolvent debtors was read a third time; and, after a few observations by Mr. MALLARY and Mr. A. SMYTH,

Mr. WOODCOCK moved to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, for the purpose of incorporating into it a proviso, the purport of which should be, that the obtainment of the benefit of the act should have effect upon no debts except such as were contracted in the District of Columbia.

Mr. A. SMYTH remarked, that the object of the bill was to extend the benefit to strangers which is now confined to those citizens of the District who have resided in it twelve months. It was not intended to alter the character of the present law.

Mr. WOODCOCK replied, and said that he was willing to go as far as any man for the relief of an insolvent debtor, but he thought the effect of it, as it now stands, would be to create frauds, &c.

Mr. SMYTH rejoined, and the question of commitment being taken, it was lost, and the bill was passed.

An engrossed bill, in addition to the act for the prompt settlement of the public accounts, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RICH, the title of the bill was altered so as to read, "An act to provide for a prompt settlement of the accounts therein mentioned, and for the punishment of the crime of perjury in certain cases."

An engrossed bill to authorize the appointment of deputy collectors of the customs, was read a third time, and, after a few explanatory observations, by Mr. TOMLINSON, in answer to an inquiry of Mr. WOOD, the bill was passed.

An engrossed bill, explanatory of the act entitled an act authorizing the settlement of the accounts between the United States and Richard O'Brien, late Consul of the United States at Algiers, was read a third time, and passed.

COMPENSATION BILL.

The bill to reduce the compensation of the members, of Congress, &c. was then taken up, and the question recurred upon the amendment offered by Mr. ROCHESTER to the proposition of Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH to recommit the bill with instructions to report the same in such a manner as to reduce the compensation of the officers of the Government twenty per cent.

Mr. TOP called for the previous question, but the call was not sustained by the House.

Mr. BAYLY occupied the floor for some time, and gave notice, in conclusion, that if the present propositions before the House should be rejected, he would move the following:

"That they bring in a bill to allow the representatives of each State in Congress the same per diem, and the same itinerant charges, to which the representatives of the most numerous branch of their State Legislatures are entitled."

Mr. BAYLY observed that every one who had spoken in favor of the bill had called it a link in the chain of retrenchment. Retrenchment! Never, said Mr. B., was there a word so good but that, by being bandied about, it would wear out, and the people would become sick of it. And such, he feared, would be the fate of this famous word retrenchment! But this bill, Mr. B. contended, was no link in the chain. It had no connexion with the chain. It was separate by itself. In the fourteenth Congress a law passed giving fifteen hundred dollars to the members for their wages during each session, besides their itinerant charges. The spirit of the nation was roused—and why? It was not the sum that caused the excitement; but it was the manner of receiving it—a salary. I believe, said Mr. B., that the chairman of the Committee of Retrenchment (Mr. HARDIN) voted for the bill, and I think they turned him out of Congress on account of it. At any rate, I know there was great tomahawking and scalping in Kentucky about the passage of that law. Now, I esteem that gentleman very much, said Mr. B., and should be very sorry if he should now retrench himself out again. It is true, he got back, and as he (Mr. B.) considered him one of the most able and useful members of the House, he should be glad to retain him here. Since the fourteenth Congress we have paid fifty or sixty millions of the national debt. At that time it amounted to about one hundred and fifty millions, and the debt was never greater than when Congress voted the salary compensation. But the people revolt at new principles of any kind. Mr. B. had never heard of any complaint of the existing law, except from Rhode Island. The Legislature of that State, said Mr. B., in the year 1819 or 1820, directed their Senators, and requested their Representatives, to obtain a reduction of the wages to six dollars, or two dollars, I do not recollect which. Accordingly, one of the representatives of that State brought in a bill pursuant to the request; but I dare say it was as much against his will then as it now is against that of the chairman of the Committee of Retrenchment. And what was the consequence? One half of the whole of that delegation died within three weeks after it! Well, then, it was brought forward in the Senate. And what was the consequence there? One half of the Senators from that State died immediately. Now, it would be lamentable, indeed, if half of the Kentucky representation should die off in consequence of this bill. Mr. B. had a great personal regard for them, and he therefore hoped that the bill would not pass. He thought, if the House was determined to act on the subject, it was better to recur to first principles. With this view, should the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SMYTH) be rejected, he should offer one in lieu of it, the purport of which was, that each member should receive for wages and itinerant charges the same allowance which the members of the most numerous branch of their respective Legislatures are entitled to receive.

Under the old confederation each State paid its own representatives, or delegates, as they were then called. The Constitution now provides that they shall be paid out of the public Federal Treasury. Of course the House could not pay the friends of this bill, if it has any, out of their own depreciated paper. The State of Virginia, under the old confederation, paid their delegates eight dollars good money per day. The State of South Carolina paid them what was equivalent to about seventeen dollars per day. If this course was taken, each member might go home with a quiet conscience, and hear no clamor from the members of their State Legislatures—and those who received only two dollars would, perhaps, save half of that.

This is the sort of economy, sir, said Mr. B. that I should like the Committee of Retrenchment for. I heard my friend from Virginia (Mr. MERCER,) the other day—and I will call him my friend, for I have known him long; I don't call him my friend in that sense in which many gentlemen use that word on this floor; they will speak of their friend from such a State, and from such a State, when they never saw or heard of them before this session, and hardly know their names, nor care any thing about them; now, I hope that word will not be so abused any longer in this House, but when I speak of my friend from Virginia, I mean as I say; we have been friends ever since we went to school together in our youthful days; my friend said that the Fourteenth Congress would not suffer by comparison with any Congress that had been held since the war, or that the present House would gain nothing by a comparison with that Congress. What did that Congress do immediately after the war? It voted to themselves $1,500, besides six dollars for every twenty miles' travel, and that at a time when the Government was indebted at least $150,000,000, funded and floating debt. The Fifteenth Congress, in the session which commenced in December, 1817, fixed the compensation of members at eight dollars per day during their attendance; and now the Government owes but $93,000,000. His friend (Mr. MERCER) said he did not wish, by giving a large compensation, to draw able men away from the State Legislatures. His (Mr. B.'s) proposition would avoid any difficulty in that respect; for they may come to this Capitol, or to the State Legislatures, as they please, and for the same compensation. But this is the very thing, said Mr. B. that I want. I wish to draw men of the first talents into the National Legislature, to brace it up against the States. Twenty-four States—all drawing against the Union! Fearful odds! He hoped we should always have the best talents in the country brought into the National Legislature. For his part, he respected State sovereignty. That was the proper term. He considered them as possessing a higher character than another gentleman from Virginia (Mr. STEVENSON) had given them, who considered them as corporations. But he (Mr. MERCER) was at war with himself, when he supposes that men of the greatest talents prefer coming to Congress on account of the greater pay, and at the same time says that there are three or four candidates in each county in Virginia for the State Legislature, where the pay is but three dollars. Some gentlemen make more money in one week after they get home than they save during the whole session.

Money is not the object for which many men come to Congress. They have more noble views—the approbation of their country and constituents; for instance, the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, who is, besides his other great powers, so eminently gifted with that of oratory. Consider the great labor and learning bestowed upon the report on that subject, and say that the paltry eight dollars was his inducement! No, it was not; but he would consider himself amply rewarded if he could succeed in his measures, in hearing his name resounded over pots of beer, amidst the sooty walls of Pittsburg.

I live, said Mr. B. in the country, and shall not be a candidate for the next Congress. But, after pocketing eight dollars for himself, he did not feel disposed to make a law compelling his successors to take six. Let them fix their own compensation.

A gentleman from Maine (Mr. WILLIAMSON) had proposed to circumscribe those who were in favor of the bill. But, from the votes that had been taken on the question, he (Mr. B.) thought that the bill had but few sincere friends, and it would be enough to circumscribe the committee—they would be as much as the gentleman could conveniently handle.

The principle of limiting the clerks, &c., to $1000, as proposed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. ROCHESTER,) was precisely the same in principle with the $1,500 compensation bill; and he did not believe there was scarcely a member of the House who would say in his closet that the present compensation was too much. If indeed, we could eat, drink a glass of grog, smoke a cigar, and sleep, all at the same time, as the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. RHEA) says we who live upon the seaboard can, there would, perhaps, be some reason for reducing the itinerary charges. Our Government, Mr. B. said, was established upon republican principles. It was an example of the practicability of self-government, and he did not believe in the republicanism of any radical system, that consisted only in tearing down. I am in favor of retrenchment, said Mr. B., but we are called upon to strike off $2—and from whom? From ourselves! The President of the United States, Mr. B. contended, was as much the representative of the people as the members of the House of Representatives. If so, why not as well cut down the salary of the President? If gentlemen thought this measure would enhance them in the eyes of their constituents, he believed they would find themselves much mistaken. He believed the people were satisfied as the compensations now stood. The salaries of the clerks were raised when the $1500 law was passed, and when that was repealed those salaries remained untouched. Mr. B. adverted to the remark of the gentleman from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) saying that the former raising of the salaries was a fraud on the Government, and observed, that the Congress which passed that law were honest and honorable men. [He was proceeding at some length, when the SPEAKER expressed an opinion that he was taking too wide a range of debate, on which Mr. B. concluded his remarks.]

Mr. KENT said, it was with reluctance he troubled the House at so late a stage of the debate, but he was decidedly opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, which went to reduce, at one indiscriminate sweep, the salaries of all the officers of Government. A proposition of that kind, involved the most important interests of the country, and could only be arranged and matured properly, after the most deliberate reflection, which could not be given it at this time, and could only be obtained by postponing the gentleman's amendment until the commencement of the next session. But this was not the case in relation to a reduction of our own pay. There was an evident propriety in acting on the bill for that purpose at the present moment. If we did not, and it was postponed to the next session, what would be the situation of the House? Gentlemen would come here entitled to draw their mileage and pay under the present law. The House could pass no law having a retrospective operation; and, if it was determined to pass one at all, it might be bandied about from one committee to another, and from House to House, till the close of the session, and might be made the pretext for not acting on the subject finally.

Mr. K. had never heard the reduction of the per diem mentioned in his district, and neither did he think his constituents regard whether it was six or eight dollars; but whenever a respectable committee of the House had said it was necessary to reduce it, to avoid embarrassment to the Treasury, he should not hesitate to vote for its reduction. He was surprised to hear gentlemen complain of not being able to serve in Congress for six dollars per day. He recognised in the House many gentlemen with whom he had served several long and perplexing sessions, for that sum, and he believed that they had attended as punctually, and discharged their duties to the nation as effectually, as they had done for any subsequent sum at which the per diem had been fixed. If the House ever intended to reduce their per diem, this was the preferable time.

The question then recurred upon Mr. ROCHESTER's proposition, which was so modified by the mover, as to provide that no clerk's salary shall be reduced below $800. After a few remarks by Messrs. TUCKER, of Virginia, and ROCHESTER, the question was taken, and the motion prevailed—yeas 66, nays 61.

Mr. Cook submitted the following addition to the contemplated instructions:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That no member of Congress shall, directly or indirectly, himself, or by any other person whatsoever in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in the whole or in part, any contract, agreement, agency, trust, or employment of any kind whatsoever under the United States, by virtue of any appointment or commission received from, or contract, agreement, engagement, or undertaking, made or entered into with any Executive officer of the United States, either in writing or otherwise: nor shall any Executive officer, as aforesaid, either in writing or otherwise, enter into any such contract, agreement, or understanding, with any member of Congress, or appoint any member of Congress to execute or perform any trust, agency, or commission for, and in behalf of the United States, of any kind whatsoever. And every such person offending against the provisions of this section, if a member of Congress, shall, upon conviction thereof, be liable to all the penalties prescribed in the first section of the act, entitled "An act regulating public contracts," approved April 21, 1808. And if an Executive officer of the United States he shall, upon conviction thereof, be liable to all the penalties prescribed in the fourth section of the said act. Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to repeal or annul the second section of the said recited act, or to prevent any member of Congress from performing any trust, agency, or duty of any kind whatsoever, for and in behalf of the United States, without receiving any compensation therefor.

The addition proposed by Mr. COOK was opposed by Messrs. F. JONES and A. SMYTH, and supported by the mover, but ultimately withdrawn.

The question then recurred upon the amended proposition of Mr. SMYTH, which was put without further debate, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 61.

The question then recurred upon the recommitment with the said instructions, upon which Mr. STODDARD called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered.

The recommitment was opposed by Messrs. MONTGOMERY and HUBBARD; when

Mr. WRIGHT submitted an addition to the instructions which had been agreed to; the purport of which was to provide that the rate of mileage be made at thirty instead of twenty miles per day for the members, &c.

Before the question was put, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, stated that he had moved that this bill be laid on the table at an early hour this morning, but had consented to waive it on being told that it would be disposed of in a short time. But it was now evident that it was leading to a long discussion, and it was indispensably necessary that the military appropriation bill should be passed, for reasons which he stated to the House; he, therefore, renewed the motion that it be laid on the table. The question was then put and carried—yeas 72, noes 71.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill making further appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1822.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, (chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means,) moved an amendment to the bill so as to appropriate $50,000 for the compensation due the citizens of Georgia by the Creek nation.

Mr. GILMER moved to amend the amendment by striking out the sum of $50,000, and to insert in lieu thereof the sum of $100,000, and he supported the motion in a speech of considerable length.

Mr. COCKE opposed the amendment.

Mr. RANKIN suggested, that, by the rules of the House, it was not competent to incorporate into an appropriation for other objects, an appropriation for carrying into effect treaties.

Some discussion ensued upon the construction of the rule, in which Messrs. RANKIN, SMITH, of Maryland, H. NELSON, CUTHBERT, REID, and RHEA, took part, when the question was taken, and the motion to fill the blank with $100,000 was lost and that for 50,000 prevailed.

Mr. GILMER submitted the following :

"For the purpose of holding treaties with the Cherokee and Creek tribes of Indians, for the extinguishment of the Indian title to all the lands within the State of Georgia, pursuant to the fourth section of the first article of the agreement and cession concluded between the United States and the State of Georgia on 24th April, 1802, the sum of $30,000."

The motion was supported at length by Mr. GILMER, who was followed on the same side by

Mr. RHEA, who moved to amend the amendment by inserting the words "and Tennessee" after the word "Georgia." He said his object was, that the treaty intended, by the appropriation asked for, might be to extinguish the Cherokee claim for lands, not only for what remained in Georgia, but also to extinguish the claim of the Cherokee Indians, for the residue of land in Tennessee, by them claimed. He observed, that a small portion of land in East Tennessee was yet encumbered with that Indian claim—that it was bounded by the Tennessee river, Highwassee river, and the boundary line between Tennessee and Georgia—and one treaty would answer the purpose as well as more, and thereby thirty thousand dollars was sufficient. The Cherokee claim covered a considerable quantity of land in Georgia—and, if that claim for that land only was extinguished, little land would remain to the Cherokees, and that lay in Tennessee—that the United States were equally bound to extinguish the Cherokee claim for land in Tennessee as in Georgia; the cession act of North Carolina is to that effect. If the intended treaty be so provided for, that it will extinguish the claim of the Cherokees to the land in Tennessee as well as in Georgia, the settlement of Georgia and Tennessee will be connected, otherwise not. Mr. R. said, that on principles of sound policy and economy, the Cherokee claim for land in Georgia and in Tennessee, ought to be done away. The sovereignty of Tennessee and of Georgia ought to be extended over the land now encumbered with Cherokee claims in said States respectively. The Cherokee Indians now residing in Tennessee are not many; and they, and the other Cherokees residing on lands in Georgia, ought to be moved, (that is, they who may be willing) over the river Mississippi, where the great mass of that nation now is. I am not, said Mr. R., in favor of disturbing any establishment for education included within the limits of the lands in question; neither do I desire to force away any individual of that nation who may choose to continue where he is;

but I desire that the treaty may be; that the sovereignty of Tennessee may be extended over that country within its limits; that establishments for education may remain undisturbed; and that sufficient lands may be laid off for such Cherokees as may desire to remain; and that the residue of the land may be inhabited by citizens, who will add to the number of citizens in Tennessee, and to the strength of the Southern country.

The amendment was supported by the mover, and opposed by Messrs. COCKE, TATNALL, and REID, who also supported the amendment which was offered, when the question was taken, and the amendment was negatived, and the appropriation as proposed by Mr. GILMER was agreed to.

Mr. COCKE moved to add a proviso to preclude all persons from receiving any moneys under that act, who were in arrears to the Government. The question was put and carried.

Mr. FLOYD moved to strike out the sum of $125,000, which had been inserted for the contingent expenses of the War Department, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

For pay allowed by law to Indian Agents	- $22,300
For presents to Indians, allowed by the law of 1802	- - - - - 15,000
For contingent expenses of the Indian Department	- - - - - 40,000

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN moved to insert an appropriation of $5,000 for the preservation of ammunition, which was agreed to, and at twenty minutes before six, the Committee rose and reported the bill to the House, as amended, and then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 30.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a bill from the Senate to select a site for the establishment of a national armory on the Western waters, reported the same without amendment, with a recommendation that the same be postponed to the next session; and, on his motion, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

The resolution yesterday, moved by Mr. DWIGHT, for instituting a committee, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report at the next session on the subject of the decisions of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, was again taken up.

Mr. WRIGHT withdrew the amendment which he yesterday proposed to it; and,

The question being taken on agreeing to the original motion, it was decided in the negative. So the resolution was rejected.

Mr. LINCOLN submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be deposited in the library of Congress the originals or copies of all such reports, memoirs, or documents, not heretofore published, as have been made by public officers, Indian agents, private individuals, or exploring parties, to the Executive department of the Government; together with any maps, drawings, or charts, or copies of the same, which, in his opinion, it may be consistent with the public service to have there deposited.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. REED, of Maryland, moved that the House do come to the following resolutions :

1. Resolved, That the Secretaries of the State, Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and the Postmaster General, be, and they are hereby, directed to lay before this House, within ten days after the commencement of the next session of Congress, a report, showing the time when was made the last statement, upon which a balance was found to be due of the accounts of the officers or agents, foreign and domestic, collecting or disbursing the public money, under the authority of their respective departments, who have held their several appointments for the last three years; how such balances were suffered to accrue, what steps have been taken to recover it, the sufficiency of the principal and securities, and whether any, and who, of such agents or officers, have been continued in the public service after such balance was stated to be due by them.

2. Resolved, That the Second, Third, Fourth, and Fifth Auditors, be, and they are hereby, directed to lay before this House, within ten days after the commencement of the next session of Congress, an account showing the amount of moneys unaudited at the period when their several offices were established; the amount annually appropriated by Congress since the establishment of their respective offices, which it was their duty to have audited, and what amount has been actually audited by them, annually, carrying the balance of one year to the account of the succeeding year.

3. Resolved, That it is hereby made the duty of the several Auditors of the Treasury to render to the Secretaries of their respective Departments a semi-annual statement, commencing from the first day of the present year, showing the balance, if any, due by any and every officer, whose duty it may be to collect or disburse the public moneys.

4. Resolved, That it is hereby made the duty of the Secretaries of State, Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, to lay before this House, within ten days after the commencement of their annual session, a list of the balances which may appear to be due upon the last semi-annual statement which may be rendered to them respectively.

5. Resolved, That is hereby made the duty of the Postmaster General to lay before this House, within ten days after the commencement of their annual session, a semi-annual statement, showing the balance, if any, due by each and every deputy postmaster.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to alter the times of holding the district court in the district of New Jersey;" in which bill they request the concurrence of this House.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which was read, and is as follows :

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, in pursuance of their resolution of the 18th instant, "requesting to be furnished with a copy of the judicial proceedings in the United States court for the district of Louisiana, in the case of the French slave ship La Pensee."

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, April 29, 1822.

The Message was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a statement of the amount of money paid as salaries, outfits, and contingent expenses to foreign Ministers, since the year 1800, and the amount paid to each; in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th instant: which letter and statement was ordered to lie on the table.

UNCURRENT BANK NOTES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating such additional evidence as is in the possession of the Treasury Department, tending to show that the uncurrent notes received from the Banks of Edwardsville, Tombigbee, and Missouri, had been deposited in those banks before the date of the arrangements by which they became responsible in cash, for all bank notes deposited with them by the Receivers of Public Money, together with all the additional returns and correspondence required by the resolution of the 12th of March last, which report was read, and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows :

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 27, 1822.

SIR : In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 12th March last, I have the honor to transmit such evidence as is in the possession of the department tending to show that the uncurrent notes received from the Banks of Edwardsville, Tombigbee, and Missouri, had been deposited in those banks before the date of the arrangement, by which they became responsible in cash for all bank notes deposited with them by the receivers of public money, together with all the additional returns and correspondence required by the resolution, except two letters from the receiver at St. Louis, which are of a confidential nature.

In the documents appended to the report from this department of the 14th of February, will be found the terms upon which the Bank of Missouri became the depository of the public money. The bank most clearly was not by that arrangement responsible for the solvency of banks whose notes might be deposited in it to the credit of the Treasurer. This arrangement continued until the 9th of August, 1819, when the president of the bank, by letter, accepted the arrangement proposed in my letter of the 23d of June of the same year. But in that letter the bank expressly refuses to be responsible for the notes of any bank not therein enumerated, and none of the banks whose notes formed a part of the uncurrent money received from the Bank of Missouri are included in that enumeration. By the same letter, it appears that sums in the notes of those banks to a larger amount than was received in uncurrent money from that bank, were, at the date of the letter, in the possession of the bank. If there is any exception to this declaration, it is in relation to the State Bank of North Carolina. The president in that letter proposes to deposite in the Branch Bank at Fayetteville $50,000 in such paper of that State and of South Carolina and Georgia as was authorized to be received. The whole sum transferred was $42,000. The remainder was understood to have been notes of South Carolina and Georgia. The evidence that the whole of the uncurrent notes received from the Bank of Missouri had been received on deposite by it before the date of that letter, and, consequently, before the commencement of the second arrangement, is believed to be entirely satisfactory.

Before the 20th of August, 1820, the Bank of Tombigbee was not bound to transfer the public funds deposited in it. On that day a new arrangement was tendered to it, and a permanent deposite was offered as an inducement to assume that obligation. On the 8th of September following the proposition was accepted. By a reference to a statement annexed to a letter of the president of the bank, bearing date the 13th August, 1819, it will be seen that there had been deposited in the bank the sum of $15,000 in notes of the State Bank of North Carolina. About this period the latter bank stopped payment. The amount received from the bank in the uncurrent notes of the State Bank of North Carolina has been stated at $15,311. The sum received after the date of the letter was therefore very inconsiderable.

By a reference to the report, the terms on which the public money was originally deposited in the Bank of Edwardsville will be found. The obligation to transfer the public money, and compensation for such service, by means of a permanent deposite, are not among them; nor had the bank the right of selecting the banks, the notes of which were to be received in deposite. In this case, as in the first arrangement with the Bank of Tombigbee, the money deposited was to be entered to the credit of the Treasurer as cash. This term was used in opposition to the term special deposite, and was not intended to subject the bank to the payment of specie for notes which were not convertible into specie. It was not understood by either of the parties that the bank was responsible for the credit of the banks whose notes were deposited in it. The letter of the president of the bank, of April 18, 1820, and the letter of the same officer of January 7, 1820, to the honorable Ninian Edwards, then a director of the bank, by whom it was transmitted to this department, and herewith communicated, explain most fully the understanding of the directors of the bank that no such responsibility was intended to be incurred by them.

By the statements of the bank, herewith communicated, it appears that on the 30th of November, 1819, there was on deposite to the credit of the Treasurer $45,475 04, and that the bank had then in its possession $31,437 in the notes of banks receivable at the land offices. There is no evidence in the department showing the amount of Kentucky and Tennessee notes comprehended in that sum. In December of the same year there were deposited by the receiver at Edwardsville $6,063 in Kentucky notes, and $3,000 in notes of the banks of Tennessee; and in January, 1820, the receiver at Kaskaskia deposited $6,250 in Kentucky notes, and $2,760 in notes of the banks of Tennessee. These several sums amount to $17,073. If the same proportion of the notes of the banks of Kentucky and Tennessee were comprehended in the sum of $31,437, as in the deposites made in the months of December, 1819, and January, 1820, there would be of Kentucky notes $4,430, and of Tennessee notes $2,200. These sums, added to the above sum of $17,073, make the aggregate amount of $23,703. But it has been ascertained that in the month of December, 1819, the bank paid, in part satisfaction of a Treasury draft, $4,880 in Kentucky notes. This sum being deducted from the amount last mentioned, leaves of uncurrent money in the possession of the bank, on the 3d of January, 1820, the sum of $18,823. The sum received from the bank in uncurrent notes was $18,562. In my letter of February 2d, 1821, to the president of the Bank of Edwardsville, authority was given to place to the credit of the Treasurer notes of the banks of Kentucky and Tennessee to the amount of $20,000, the evidence in the possession of the department that that amount had been received on account of the Treasury before the failure of those banks being at that time considered satisfactory. I have had no reason since to change that opinion. The evidence, however, is respectfully submitted to the House. I remain, with respect, &c.

Fourth—The Public Debt.

	$29,637,077 59

In the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, relative to the exchange of five per cent. for six and seven per cent. stock, a mistake was made in stating that the debt would, (except the three per cents.,) be paid off in 1833. It ought to have been stated in 1835. The error is presumed to have arisen from the figure 5 being mistaken for 3. The exchanged stock for the seven per cent. is, by the bill, payable in 1834, which proves the error.

By the operation of the present Sinking Fund of ten millions, it has been shown, by a former report, that, should the exchange of stock be effected, the stock contemplated, amounting to $63,786,137 74, will be extinguished in the year 1834, except the sum of $1,952.

The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund will be charged with the payment of that amount in the year 1835, viz : - - - - $1,952,000 00

And with the payment of the following sums :

Five per cent. stocks of 1820 - - -	999,999 13
Five per cent. stocks of 1821 - - -	4,735,296 30

Total to be paid in 1835 - - - -	$7,687,295 43
----------------------------------	-----------------------

On the 1st of July, 1824, the deferred debt will be paid off by the operation of the present Sinking Fund. During the present year the following stocks will be paid off : six per cents. of 1796, $80,000, and the small remnant of the Louisiana stock ; and, during the years 1822, 1823, and 1824, it is expected by the Secretary of the Treasury, (if no unforeseen expenditures shall occur,) that the six per cent. loan of 1820, of two millions will be paid off. There will then remain (3 per cents. excepted) only the seven million subscription to the Bank, which is balanced by United States Bank stock to a similar amount, and can scarcely be considered as a debt. If, however, Congress should reduce the amount of the Sinking Fund to eight millions, which your committee recommend, then the extinguishment of the debt will be prolonged four years.

The state of the Finances.

Surplus estimated to be in the Treasury on the 31st December, 1822	$713,548 07

The amount of duty bonds taken in 1821, and which will become payable in 1822, may, agreeably to the information received from the Secretary of the Treasury, be stated at fifteen millions. The collection from the bonds in suit, and which makes no part of the above sum, will, it is presumed by the Secretary, be equal to the sums not paid of the above when due. The tonnage duties and the payments made upon duty bonds taken during the first six months of this year, would in ordinary times be equal to the expense of collection, and to the payment of the debentures which are chargeable on the revenue. This would give a net revenue from the customs of fifteen millions; but, as it is probable that the re-exportation for benefit of drawback will be increased the present year, on account of the almost total cessation of the civil war in Spanish America, the committee have deemed it safer to state the receipts of the present year at fourteen millions five hundred thousand dollars, although they think it may amount to fifteen millions.

The committee submit the following estimate for the year 1823:

Receipts bottomed on those of 1822 - $16,610,000 00

Expenditures bottomed on the appropriations actually made for the service of the year 1822, to wit:

Permanent appropriations	†$6,620,007 00
Temporary	9,592,390 00
Making	$16,212,397 00

* The sum of $1,117,029 22, being a part of the sum stated by the Secretary of the Treasury as the balance of appropriations chargeable upon the revenue of 1821 having been reappropriated, the above balance of $1,235,923 71 only remains of the appropriations of 1821.

† There will be required, on account of the permanent appropriation for the gradual increase of the Navy, $300,000 more in 1823 than in the preceding year.

From which may be deducted the following items, which will not be required for the service of 1823:

Deficit in Revolutionary pensions	$451,536
Deficit in Quartermaster's department	76,000
Deficit in Indian department	70,000
Arrearages prior to the 1st of July, 1817	90,000
Outfit to missions to South American nations	32,000
Difference in expenditures of the present and succeeding sessions of the Legislature	166,812
	886,348 00
Leaving	$15,326,049 00

Which amount, being deducted from the estimated receipts for 1823, as above, of Leaves - $1,283,951 00

To which add the surplus estimated to be in the Treasury on the 31st of December, 1822

713,548 07

Amount estimated as a surplus in the Treasury on the 31st of December, 1823, and applicable to the expenses of 1824

$1,997,499 07

The committee submit the preceding estimate for the year 1823, and they feel a well-founded confidence that it will be verified by the result. But it is bottomed on no certainty; it is an estimate, and who can estimate with precision a revenue mainly arising on duties on imports, subject to the winds and the waves, to the caprice of commerce, to the merchants making a greater or less re-exportation, to the want of punctuality in payment of bonds when due, and to other events that no human being can foresee? Has any Secretary of the Treasury, since the commencement of the Government, been accurate in his estimates of the revenue? No one has, and no one ever can. The present Secretary has been nearer to the result than his immediate predecessors, as appears by a document which the committee ask leave to present as part of their report; yet he has not been entirely accurate. At the last session he estimated the imports for 1821 at fourteen millions. This was esteemed by the best informed members of the House as too low, and the Secretary was openly censured for presenting a view of the finances worse than they really were. The Committee of Ways and Means were directed by the House to investigate the subject, and they reported that the imports would give fifteen millions of dollars. They were incorrect, for the customs gave little more than thirteen millions in 1821, yet the committee formed their opinion upon data that they thought were tenable; they took the average receipts for the four preceding years, which gave the sum of $17,868,809, and they might have, with such a result, been justified in estimating a higher amount than they did. They thought themselves safe in assuming for 1821, the amount actually received from the customs in 1820, to wit: of fifteen millions. It appears, however, from the actual receipts, that their estimate was erroneous. The result being so much less than they had presumed, arose from a variety of causes. A less amount was received from bonds in suit than had been expected; a greater amount of debentures were issued than could have been anticipated, owing to the distress of the merchants compelling them to export, to enable them, by the debentures, to meet the payments of their bonds, and to the following circumstance: Debentures amounting to a sum exceeding eight hundred thousand dollars, which were payable in 1820, were not paid until 1821, thus becoming an unexpected charge upon 1821.

H. OF R.

Amendments to the Constitution.

APRIL, 1822.

If that charge had been paid in 1820, the estimate of the Secretary, of fourteen millions of dollars from the customs, would have been nearly correct, and the report of the Committee of Ways and Means would have been different from what it was. Other causes operated most powerfully—an inability to pay for the imports on the part of the consumers, and the rapid increase of the manufactures of the country—an increase that the most sanguine had not anticipated. The following view will show the great loss of revenue in two years, and particularly in that arising from cottons and woollens; those articles pay an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent.—none others do. In the year 1818 it will be seen that the imports of those articles amounted to $24,804,188; and in 1820 only to $8,980,075—being a loss, in two years, on those two items, of $15,824,113—a loss to an extent that no human being could have foreseen. It however carries with it this consolation, that it shows the great and salutary increase of the national manufactures, and gives a well-founded expectation that, in a few years, our own manufactures of cotton and woollen will be equal to our consumption.

Of goods paying an ad valorem duty, the average value in the years 1818, 1819, and 1820, was:

In 1818 - -	$58,661,504	$11,947,260

Amount of presumed expenditures of the year 1825 - - - - 14,772,815 67

The committee pretend not to form any estimate of the revenue that will arise in 1825; but with a view of presenting the subject, they assume may be estimated at $16,000,000

And they presume that the proposed revision of the tariff of 1816 may give an addition of - - - - 1,500,000

If the result should be as presumed, there would remain subject to the Sinking Fund - - - - $2,727,184 33

Which amount, with salutary retrenchments on the present public expenditures, would be adequate to meet a sinking fund of eight millions of dollars, and to leave some funds applicable to unforeseen events.

If the exchange of stock, proposed by the act which has lately passed, should take effect, there will be a saving of interest, resulting annually therefrom, of $346,063, which may be added to the above result.

All which is respectfully submitted.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendments to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution:

“That no increase or diminution of the compensation to Representatives, for their services as such, shall be made by Congress, to have effect or operation during the period for which the members of the House of Representatives, acting upon the subject, shall have been elected.

“That no person shall be appointed by the President of the United States to any office, either of profit, honor, or trust, or who shall have been a member of either House of Congress within the last two years preceding the election of the President for the time being.”

In offering this proposition—

APRIL, 1822.

Military Regulations.

H. OF R.

Mr. BLAIR said the object of this resolution was to amend the Constitution in such a manner as would perhaps prevent a frequent recurrence to such debates as had agitated the House for several days past; and to prevent, also, any improper motive, either of avarice or of popularity, from attaching to the conduct of any Congress that might hereafter find it necessary to increase or diminish the compensation allowed to members of either House. Another object of the resolution, he said, was to place the members of both Houses as far beyond even a suspicion of any improper influence as possible. It would not be in order now, he said, to develop the advantages that might result from such amendment of the Constitution as this resolution proposed. He therefore only requested that the Clerk would read the resolution, and that it might lie on the table until the next session, when he designed to call it up.

MILITARY REGULATIONS.

Mr. STEVENSON rose and remarked that the House on yesterday were good enough to lay upon the table the bill fixing the Military Peace Establishment, on an assurance from him that a satisfactory explanation would be given to-day (so far at least as General Scott was concerned) of the transactions alluded to in the debate of yesterday. Mr. S. was gratified in saying that it was now in his power to redeem the pledge which he and his colleague (Mr. ARCHER) had given. The conduct of that officer, in relation to this subject, had been not only justifiable, but, in his opinion, praiseworthy. He had discharged the duty required of him in a way not only to free himself from censure, but to entitle him to the thanks of the country. The facts were these: General Scott was in Philadelphia when the book of rules and regulations for the Army, printed by Gales & Seaton, under the order of the House, came from the press; copies of it were sent to him at Philadelphia to be corrected. He accordingly corrected two copies and had them carefully examined with each other. One he returned, the other he forwarded to the Department of War, with a request that it should be laid before the Military Committee. It was accordingly given to the Chairman of that Committee, (Mr. SMYTH of Virginia,) who states that it was received by him, and he thinks approved by Congress and filed with the Clerk, and it was this corrected copy, he supposes, on which the bill passed. This was in January. Mr. S. said that this was a subject of sufficient importance to require investigation by a committee of the House; it was due to the country and the individual, and he therefore offered the following resolution for adoption:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report to this House whether the system of field service and police, adopted for the government of the Army at the last session of Congress, has been published in form and effect different from the system adopted; and, if so, how it has happened; and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. FLOYD commenced his remarks by noticing the intimation which he understood his colleague to have thrown out, that charges had been yesterday made against General Scott. [Mr. S. said he had spoken of the charges generally, and not as charges against General Scott.] Mr. F. said, that he did say, yesterday, that there was a forgery committed under that law, and the gentleman pledged himself to vindicate General Scott from blame on that score. I (said Mr. F.) am not in the habit of giving pledges for anybody. I have been too well acquainted with the manner in which things are sometimes conducted in this country, to give pledges for anybody. Mr. F. made no charges upon any one, but he said there was a forgery. If it could be explained away by those whom it concerned, he should be as much rejoiced as any man to find the War Department and General Scott, and all concerned, acquitted of blame. It was not in the mind of the Clerk of this House, that any document at all, such as a copy of the Regulations, had been put into his charge. What Mr. F. said, and now repeated was, that a resolution of Congress required the Secretary of War to have a system of rules and regulations for the government of the Army compiled and laid before Congress; that, in obedience to that resolution, such a system was reported; that, by the order of this House, the manuscript thus laid before it was ordered to be printed for the use of the members; that it was printed, and laid on the table of every member, and that it was enacted into a law. Now, even granting all the gentleman said—that a printed copy had been sent to General Scott, corrected by him, and returned to the War Department, and that it had been, by the Chairman of the Military Committee, committed to the care of the Clerk—Mr. F. said he spoke not of General Scott, but of the law, and the circumstances attending it—no correction of the document, thus printed for the use of the members, could have been by them enacted into a law. The manuscript copy was here, and all control of the War Department, or of anybody else over it, had ended, &c. Who made these interpolations, Mr. F. said he knew not—he cared not. How the fact transpired, was a matter equally immaterial to him, and to the House. All that was material was the fact. Mr. F. said, likewise, that he expected it might be in his power, in the course of this day, to obtain possession of a document which would show the practical effect of that forgery. He did not know that he should certainly obtain it. No injury, however, could arise from the delay to pass this bill, as well as the resolution, upon the table; and he hoped they would both be allowed to lie on the table.

Mr. ARCHER felt himself called upon by the relation in which he was placed, by his relation of a friendship of long standing with the very distinguished officer whose name had been brought into view of the House, to make an explanation, rather more full in some particulars, than given by his friend from Virginia. He was truly gratified to find the disposition which his colleague (Mr. FLOYD) brought to the consideration of this subject. He knew him to be incapable of doing injustice to General Scott; and thought that he could state this matter in such a way, that his colleague himself would be the very first to stand upon this floor and acquit that officer of any blame on this subject. What, Mr. A. went on to examine, was, the matter which was thought to require examination? A discrepancy between the printed copy of the regulations, and the copy which had been laid before the House. General Scott was ordered to prepare a system of rules and regulations for the government of the Army. He did so, as thus became his duty. At an early period of the last session, a copy of this system was laid before this House. After the work was printed for the use of the members, several copies were sent to General Scott, then at Philadelphia. On examination, General Scott discovered some errors which required correction. With great care he made the correction which he thought proper, and also made a few alterations, all which were made with the pen, in red ink. In this corrected form, he sent one copy to the War Department, and reserved for himself another, carefully collated with that which was sent here. Was there any thing wrong in this proceeding of General Scott? So far from it, Mr. A. argued, he had done no more than what he owed to the interest of the Government and his own reputation, both of which were involved in it. The copy which General Scott sent to Washington, Mr. A. said, was sent by the Secretary of War to the Military Committee, according to the request of General Scott; and, after the receipt of this corrected copy, the regulations received the assent of Congress. This work was therefore corrected; but no interpolation or alteration was made by General Scott, or by anybody else, after the work had been passed upon in its corrected form by this House. Mr. A. further explained the ground of the alteration of 75th article, which had been specially complained of. It appears, by an antecedent article of the same regulations, that in case of promotion, though the rule of seniority was to be observed in general, yet a power was given to the Executive to depart from that rule in extraordinary cases. It occurred to General Scott, that, if that power was given in extraordinary cases in regard to promotions, a fortiori the same power ought to be given in the case of transfers, and he had therefore applied to the article of "transfers" the same words as the regulation already contained in regard to promotions. The explanation of the whole matter which he had received, was, Mr. A. said, so satisfactory to him that he should, if the House thought with him, oppose the inquiry, upon the belief that no further inquiry could be necessary in relation to it. In addition this, Mr. A. held in his hand a very short document, proving the material fact of the corrected copy having been formally transferred to the Military Committee, the organ of this House, which document he read as follows:

"DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Feb. 22, 1821.

The Secretary of War's compliments to General Smyth, and transmits to him the "system of field service and police," with the correction of Major General Scott.

Rep's.

It appears, from the remark in red ink [italic] above, that the letter of Gen. Scott, of the 20th Feb. above, was transmitted to Gen. Smyth.

C. VANDEVENTER.

30th April, 1822."

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, asked the gentleman from Virginia, whether this corrected copy spoken of was certainly the one acted upon by the Military Committee and intended to be established?

Mr. ARCHER said it was not for him to say, not having been a member of that committee. But he had established the fact that it was sent to that committee from the War Department, with the request that it might be adopted.

Mr. WRIGHT was in favor of investigation of this matter by a committee, and against discussing it at this time. He flattered himself from the high standing and honorable character of the officer in question, that he had nothing to apprehend from any investigation.

Mr. SMYTH made a very particular statement of facts, confirming, in general, what he had said yesterday, and what had fallen from Mr. STEVENSON and Mr. ARCHER to-day. His recollection did not enable him to say, whether he had laid before the Military Committee either the first corrected copy which he received from General Scott, or the second more complete copy, which latter, however, it was strongly impressed upon his mind, that he had given to the Clerk, either for the purpose of being filed, or sent to the Senate with the bill. The Clerk, though he has it not, thinks he saw it, and he could not well have seen it but at the Clerk's table, where (Mr. S.) must have placed it. The first copy received from General Scott, Mr. S. now produced. It was not nearly as correct as the last received; but even this copy contained, in all, forty-seven different corrections—leaving, however, yet nineteen blanks not filled, though lessening the number of blanks in the original manuscript. It was obvious, Mr. S. argued, that Congress did not mean to adopt the original sketch, with its blanks, &c., and it was equally obvious that they would not have enacted the first corrected copy, containing, as it did, so many blanks yet to be filled. The copy which they enacted, therefore, must, from the reason of the thing, have been the complete copy, as he well recollected such to have been his intention. In examining this code of regulations, Mr. S. said he had not very minutely scanned it. He glanced his eye over it, and, seeing much to approve and nothing to condemn, he had recommended its adoption. In so doing, what did he act upon? Upon the confidence he reposed in the talents, integrity, and military knowledge of General Scott. On what did the House act in passing the act? On the same principle; and in that view it is obvious that they must have taken the perfect copy. The regulations must have been adopted in the shape in which they were when the bill was reported for establishing them—which was the shape in which they were now promulgated. As to the practical operation of this corrected article, Mr. S. said it could have no effect on the question now before the House, because it could not, when adopted, be foreseen in what manner it was to operate. General Scott, in the most positive and clear manner, had declared, that he had not designed the article with a view to its operation on any particular individual. If the gentleman from Virginia objected to the article respecting brevets, it was enough to say that it contained no more than was already contained in the regulation of the Department on that subject, and it was better that the provision on the subject should be legal and fixed, than that it should depend on regulation. The War Department, Mr. S. added, had nothing to do with this thing. The thing was altogether with General Scott and the Military Committee of the last session, or himself, the chairman of that committee. For himself, he did verily believe that he received the last corrected copy of the regulations, and that the volume promulgated is a transcript of that copy. The law, therefore, is published precisely as prescribed by the act of Congress.

Mr. COCKE made a statement of facts in this case, to the best of his recollection. He gave a history of the incidents of the day, the material part of which was that, himself being a member of the Military Committee, and occasionally acting as chairman of it in the absence of Mr. SMYTH, (who had disagreed with the Committee respecting the reduction of the Army,) he had no recollection of any corrected copy of the rules being laid before that committee—nor did he recollect ever to have seen or heard of a corrected copy of them until he heard of the official copy varying from that which was laid before Congress. He did not propose to inquire into the effects of this or that regulation; but he thought it due to the House to state the facts he had mentioned, in regard to which the recollection of other members of the committee corresponded with his.

Mr. ARCHER made some explanatory remarks. He had no objection to the inquiry, except as wholly unnecessary, and did not by any means intend to make the personal and professional merit of General Scott an argument against it, because he should rather consider it an argument the other way.

Mr. WALWORTH stated, that it appeared that the bill to reduce and fix the Peace Establishment was passed in the House of Representatives, on the 23d of January, 1821, just one month before the amended copy of the Army regulations was sent to General Smyth, chairman of the Military Committee. Whether the 14th section was then contained in the bill he did not know. It was not in the printed bill. That, on the 24th of February, the Senate passed the bill with amendments, and the amendments were hanging between this House and the Senate several days; from which it would seem probable that the House and Senate passed upon the original regulations, and not upon the amended copy; but as the President did not approve the act until the 2d of March, it was probable General Scott supposed the amended regulations were those sanctioned by Congress. He thought it was due to the character of that distinguished officer, that the committee should be appointed, and that he should be permitted to explain the transaction. [Mr. WALWORTH afterwards examined the original proceedings in the Clerk's Office, and has furnished the following statement:]

The bill to reduce the Army passed the House of Representatives on 23d January, 1821, without the 14th section. On 24th February the Senate passed the bill with amendments. On the 27th of February the Committee on Military Affairs, in the House, reported certain amendments to the Senate's amendments, and, among others, the 14th section of the act, which adopts the system of regulations of General Scott, and which amendments were passed by the House the same day, and were adopted by the Senate on the 28th of February.

Mr. LITTLE moved to lay the resolution on the table; which resolution was negatived—76 to 65. After which, a disposition appearing to prolong the debate—

On the demand of Mr. VANCE, the Speaker proceeded to other business, the morning hour allotted to the consideration of original motions having passed.

COMPENSATION BILL.

Mr. HARDIN moved that the House take up for consideration the bill to reduce the compensation of the members of Congress, &c., and on that motion he called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered; and, the question being taken, it was carried—yeas 120, nays 46.

Mr. HARDIN, after a few preliminary observations, in which he stated it to be the first time he had ever proposed or had voted for the previous question, yet he now felt it his duty to move it, and did so accordingly; but the call was not sustained by the House—ayes 53, noes 86.

The question recurred upon Mr. WRIGHT's motion, to add to the instructions a proviso, that the mileage should be at the rate of thirty, instead of twenty miles per day for the members; and on this question Mr. W. called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question being taken thereon it was decided in the negative—yeas 79, nays 87, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen of Massachusetts, Archer, Barber of Connecticut, Bateman, Bayly, Borland, Brown, Buchanan, Burrows, Butler, Cassedy, Condict, Conkling, Conner, Cushman, Darlington, Denison, Dickinson, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Findlay, Fuller, Gebhard, Gross, Hemphill, Hooks, Hubbard, F. Smyth, Swearingen, Thompson, Tracy, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Vance, Van Rensselaer, Van Wyck, Walker, Whipple, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, Williamson, Wilson, and Woodson.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. HARDIN expressed his opposition to a commitment, on the ground that the subject was fully understood by the House, and could be decided upon without the formality of going into Committee upon it.

Mr. WOOD was also opposed to the commitment, on the ground that he was unwilling to reduce the compensation of the officers of Government, but thought that six dollars per day was as much as it was expedient the members of the Legislature should receive.

Mr. H. NELSON moved to add to the instructions a provision, the purport of which was, that the bill should be so reported as to allow to the members of the present Congress an average allowance of six dollars per day for attendance, and six dollars per day for every twenty miles travel, for the current and next session. Mr. N. stated, that this form of the proposition avoided the Constitutional question that might have operated against the amendment he had offered at an early part of the debate, containing essentially the same provision. His object was, that the compensation should be reduced for the whole term of the Congress, and not be limited to that part of it which was contained in the next approaching session.

A question of order was suggested by Mr. BASSETT, upon a motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, to divide the proposition; and, after some further remarks by Messrs. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and WHIPPLE, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. FARRELY moved to amend the proposition, by substituting six dollars and forty cents in lieu of six dollars, as the rate of compensation; but before any question was taken thereon, Mr. BALL renewed the call for the previous question, but it was refused by the House—ayes 68, noes 78.

Mr. CONDUCT moved to strike out the word "average," but it was negatived without a division.

Mr. CANNON renewed the motion to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

On this motion Mr. HARDIN called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered and taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 41, nays 127, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Archer, Ball, Barstow, Bayly, Blackledge, Breckenridge, Burrows, Cannon, Colden, Cushman, Dickinson, Gilmer, Herrick, J. S. Mr. RICH then moved to strike out the limitation of the amendment to the present Congress, but the motion was lost without a division.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the instructions so as to make the proposed reduction fifteen per cent. instead of twenty, but the motion was negatived without debate or division.

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved to strike out the word "six" dollars where they occur in the motion of Mr. NELSON, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "four" dollars, and on that question he called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and, having gone about half through with calling the same—

Mr. H. NELSON inquired of the Speaker whether it would be in order for him, as the mover, to accept of the modification proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. MONTGOMERY.)

The SPEAKER decided that it would be in order at all times until the question had been decided, or an amendment thereof made by the House.

Mr. NELSON accepted the modification.

Compensation Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. HARDIN stated that, under the motion as it now stood, the members at the next Congress would have to bring their own provisions, and pay out two hundred and seventy-six dollars for the honor of coming here, and, if it prevailed, he would venture to predict that, notwithstanding the professions of patriotism, not five members would be found at that time to attend the House.

Mr. MONTGOMERY remarked that he had not adverted to the consequences to which the motion would lead at the time he had proposed it, but, as it was done, he would not recall it.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 132, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies, Bayly, Blackledge, Borland, Breckenridge, Burrows, Cannon, Colden, Conner, Cushman, Dickinson, Eustis, Farrelly, Fuller, Gebhard, Hill, Jones of Tennessee, Keyes, Litchfield, McDuffie, Mitchell of South Carolina, Montgomery, Nelson of Maryland, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Pitcher, Rochester, Russ, Sawyer, Sloan, Sterling of New York, Tatnall, Taylor, and Warfield.

Mr. PIERSON renewed the motion, as originally proposed by Mr. H. NELSON, so as to make an average allowance of six dollars for both sessions of the present Congress, and on that motion he called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered, and the question was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 108, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies, Bayly, Blackledge, Borland, Breckenridge, Butler, Campbell of New York, Cassedy, Conner, Cook, Cushman, Eddy, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Eustis, Farrelly, Gebhard, Gorham, Hooks, Hubbard, F. Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Keyes, Litchfield, Little, McCarty, McDuffie, Mat-

Mr. McCARTY moved that the bill and amendments be postponed to the second Monday in December next. He said, he believed, when the subject was first proposed, that there was not time to pass the bill, and the subsequent time it had occupied, confirmed him in the opinion. It was under this view of the subject that he offered the motion, and upon it he called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the previous question, but the call was not sustained by the House.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—yeas 46, nays 113, as follows:

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, moved a further proviso to the instructions, the purport of which was, that no member should receive pay for any greater number than one hundred days in any one session.

Mr. ALLEN called for the yeas and nays, but the motion was not accorded by the House.

Mr. A. said he believed that the professed object of the Committee of Retrenchment would be more effectually accomplished by this amendment, than by the passage of the bill which they had reported without it; and he thought it would contribute more to lessen the expense of this part of the Government than any other provision that had been proposed. There should not, he said, be any inducement for members to prolong the sessions—however pure and patriotic might be their intentions, it exposed them to the imputation of unworthy and dishonorable motives.

It would be recollected, he said, that a resolution for reducing the pay of members, had been offered at an early period of the session, but the House refused even to consider it, by an almost unanimous vote; and now, after sitting one hundred and fifty days, and taking our pay under the existing law, when a few days only remain to us, and public business of the utmost importance is pressing upon us, we are set about regulating the pay of members at the future sessions. We have already taken our pay for the principal part of the period for which we were chosen, and shall we now make a merit of reducing two dollars for each of the few days that remain to us? If gentlemen were in earnest to make a reduction, why did they not meet the question at the commencement of the session? We have spent the time, and got the money, and now we gravely talk of reduction! Mr. A. said, gentlemen had considered this as a question between their own pockets and the people. This was a narrow view of the subject—it was not a measure of mere private consideration; it was chiefly to be regarded in the influence it might have upon the future composition and character of the House.

A gentleman from New York, (Mr. Wood,) had said, that the compensation should not be so high as to induce members to protract the sessions for private advantage. But will the gentleman's suggestion afford any security against the mischief he deprecates? Put your compensation at what you will, if it is sufficient to induce men to come here, it will be sufficient to induce them to stay here; and there are men enough to whom the lowest compensation would be an object to be coveted.

Mr. A. said, he believed the business of every session of Congress could be done in one hundred days as well as in a longer time. The second session of each Congress is limited, generally, to about that time, and we go through with about as much business as in the long sessions, and perform it as well. The Fourteenth Congress had more business before it perhaps than any other ever had, unless, indeed, we except the First Congress, which had to organize the Government, and to put it in operation. They had to investigate and pass upon that vast mass of private claims which grew out of the late war. They had to reduce the establishments of the country, and adapt them to a state of peace; yet they accomplished all these, in addition to the ordinary subjects of legislation, and rose on the 30th of April, leaving no business requiring an earlier meeting at their second session, than the Constitutional time. If the daily pay could be an inducement to protract the sessions, it was proper that such inducement should be taken away; and it was due to members that there should be no ground for imputing to them unworthy motives. This House, said Mr. A., is the depository of the rights and liberties of the people—it is the image of their sovereignty. The compensation should be such as to command the best talents in the country—it should be a fair recompence for their services. But the reward of men of public feelings, and of honorable and elevated sentiments, is not money. Money is but the means to enable them to do their duties. No gentleman on this floor, no member of the committee, had said, that the present compensation was too high. If it was right and just to reduce it, we ought to have reduced it before. We should also extend the reduction to the present session. Is the measure called for by the state of the public Treasury? The reduction it proposes, as the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. HARDIN) has expressed it, would be but a drop in the ocean.

Mr. A. would be among the last who would vote for large salaries; but he would also be among the last to reduce the pay of members below a fair and equitable standard. He believed the proposition he offered would save more to the Treasury than the reduction contemplated in the bill would effect without it—that it would insure more despatch of the public business, and contribute more to reduce the burdens of the people.

Mr. WHIPPLE did not rise, he said, to enter into a discussion of the merits of the proposition now before the House. His only object was to vindicate the Committee of Retrenchment from the imputations that had been made upon it. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ALLEN) has insinuated that it was a project of the committee, and says it was not called for by the state of the Treasury, or by the people. Mr. W. contended it was imperiously called for by both. The first report of the committee showed conclusively that the situation of our finances, and the magnitude of the public debt required a retrenchment of our expenses, to restore the one, and to enable us to pay off the other; and he went into a discussion, at some length, to show the correctness of the report, and that the state of the Treasury required a reduction. But the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ALLEN) has said that it is a gratuitous measure on the part of the committee, and that the people have not asked it of us. But does that gentleman not remember, that, at an early period of this session, an honorable member from Connecticut (Mr. EDWARDS) had moved a resolution to reduce the compensation of the members of Congress, pursuant to a resolution of the Legislature of that State—which resolution the House refused even to consider? And does he not know, said Mr. W., that the members of this House, from the State which I have the honor in part to represent, (New Hampshire,) have come here with similar instructions? Do not the votes given in this House furnish a refutation of the assertion that public sentiment does not demand this measure? If gentlemen are conscious that their constituents are satisfied with the present state of things, let them give a direct vote, to put this bill at rest. The people will never be wanting in that consistency of conduct which will not permit them to condemn what their better judgment approves. And if the public sentiment be so perfectly at rest on this subject, why these repeated attempts to put the bill from before the House by what I would denominate parliamenteering? Gentlemen might undoubtedly find themselves fully able to reconcile to their constituents what they now so entirely approve.

But great opprobrium, said Mr. W., has been cast upon the committee for having brought forward this measure at a late period of the session, when other important business was crowding upon the House. The committee, it is true, was appointed in February; but they deemed it expedient to take a wide and comprehensive view of the subject, and to report a general system of retrenchment that should operate fairly and justly upon all those expenditures that could possibly be retrenched, and they did not propose, nor did they intend to bring the system into operation at the present session. But they have been challenged, from time to time, to bring it forward, and have been reproached for the delay. It is not the fault of the committee, then, if this bill stands in the way of other business. If there is any fault about it, it does not lie at the doors of the committee. Nor was this all—for Mr. W. contended that the passage of this bill was essentially necessary to preserve the steady habits of the country. As a nation we had gone on, year after year, in a habit of profusion and extravagance incongenial with our institutions, and if gentlemen would examine the history of other Governments, they would find that no Government, whatever may have been its structure or form, has, during so short a period from its foundation, increased so rapidly in its expenditures as our own. Whence do we derive our institutions? From the early, virtuous habits of the first settlers of this country. Let those primeval manners be supplanted, and whatever name your Government may bear, its spirit will be oppression. I do not entertain the opinion that we are now in the broad road to ruin; but, sir, it becomes us to adhere to maxims of economy; for, if the step be once taken, it is difficult to recall what has been done—

“Facilis descensus Avernī,
Sed revocare gradum, superasque evadere ad auras,
Hic labor, hoc opus est.”

Mr. W. was not of the opinion that the people of the United States were more penurious than was necessary to restrain the tendency in some classes to profusion. They were doubtless willing to compensate their public agents well; but he believed they did expect, and had a right to expect, that their Government would be administered in the spirit of our Revolutionary period, when we boldly held the doctrine that Government had its origin in the weakness of individuals, and had for its end the strength and security of the whole, in opposition to the wealth and security of a few. A habit of economy should be encouraged. Examples were not wanting to enforce it. George IV. has lately become so much of a radical that he has relinquished £300,000 of his royal income, and he (Mr. W.) could not but hope that those who professed to be republicans would show a disposition also to retrench.

Messrs. COOK and HARDIN also opposed the motion, when the question was taken, and the motion was negatived.

The recommitment to the committee, with instructions, was the question next in order.

The recommitment was supported by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, SMYTH, of Virginia, and JONES, of Tennessee, and opposed by Messrs. ROSS, STEWART, and WOOD, when the question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 118, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ball, Bassett, Bateman, Bayly, Blackledge, Breckenridge, Burrows, Butler, Campbell of New York, Cannon, Condict, Fuller, Gist, Hill, Hooks, Jones of Tennessee, Keyes, Leftwich, Lincoln, Litchfield, Little, Long, McCoy, McNeill, Mallary, Matson, Nelson of Massachusetts, Newton, Overstreet, Patterson of New York, Pierson, Pitcher, Rankin, Reed of Massachusetts, Reed of Maryland, Rochester, Russ, Sawyer, Scott, Sloan, S. Mr. NEWTON moved that the House adjourn, on which Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved for the yeas and nays, which were taken thereon, and the question was decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, noes 71. So, at 5 o'clock precisely, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 1.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. STEVENSON yesterday, and, on the question, Will the House agree thereto? it passed in the affirmative; and Messrs. TARNALL, PITCHER, SANDERS, and SMITH of Kentucky, were appointed a committee in pursuance of the said resolution.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Charles Grice; whereupon, it was ordered that the said report, together with the petition, be referred to the Committee of Commerce.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Military Expenditures, made a report thereon.

The report concludes with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the standing rules of this House shall be so amended as that the Committee on the Accounts and Public Expenditures relative to the War Department shall hereafter consist of seven members.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary shall inquire into the expediency of enlarging the duties of the Attorney General.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was recommitted a bill for altering the jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace in said District, reported the same with amendments made pursuant to the direction of the House, and the bill and amendments were ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. BARBER, of Ohio, submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to report to this House, at the commencement of the next session, a bill for the establishment of post roads throughout the United States, which shall contain all the post roads now established, which may appear to him useful; and that he point out such routes as he may omit in the bill, and such alterations and new routes as he may insert therein, together with his reasons therefor.

Resolved, also, That the Postmaster General report a bill for regulating the Post Office Department, digesting the existing acts on the subject, into one view; and that he point out such alterations as he shall have made in the existing acts, and his reasons therefor.

The question of consideration being required, it was taken and determined in the negative; so the House refused to consider the same.

Mr. GORHAM moved for the printing of two thousand additional copies of the report of the committee on the suppression of the slave trade, which it appears it is not intended to call up for decision at the present session. The motion was supported by the mover, and Mr. TOMLINSON, on the ground of the importance of the subject, and the necessity for a full examination of it during the recess, and was opposed by Mr. COCKE; when the question was put and carried—yeas 77.

Mr. COCKE moved for the consideration of the resolution heretofore submitted by him for the appointment of a committee of investigation to sit during the recess of Congress; but the House refused to consider the same.

Mr. CONKLING presented for consideration the following joint resolution:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendments to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the Constitution:

"That no increase of the compensation of members of Congress shall take effect during the continuance of the Congress by which it shall have been made. And no law shall be passed fixing the pay of members of Congress at a greater sum than six dollars for each day's attendance, and six dollars for every twenty miles travel in coming to and returning from the Seat of Government."

In offering this resolution, Mr. C. said, the House has now been for several days engaged, how fruitlessly engaged he need not say, in endeavoring to fix the amount of our own compensation. For his part, he had witnessed the proceedings of the House with pain and mortification; and his mind had been irresistibly impelled to the conclusion that this was an unfit subject for unrestrained legislation. With a view, therefore, if possible, to prevent the recurrence of such, he would not say disgraceful, but, he would say humiliating scenes in future, he offered to the consideration of the House an amendment to the Constitution, which it was his intention to ask the House to discuss at the next session.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. F. JOHNSON laid on the table the following resolutions, and gave notice that he should call for the consideration of the same on Saturday next:

Resolved, That the practice which has obtained in the public offices of this City, (of not attending to business until nine or ten o'clock in the morning, and closing the offices at three o'clock in the evening,) is inconvenient to those who have business to transact in them; is not such reasonable attention to the public service as should be given, nor such attention as the salaries allowed, by law, are entitled to command, and that the said practice ought to be abolished.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the respective Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, and of the Navy, and the Postmaster General, to report to this House, on the second day of the next session of Congress, the number of active and well qualified clerks, and accountants, that will be necessary to perform the duties of their respective offices and departments, by requiring a reasonable, constant, and diligent attention to business.

Resolved That the number of officers and seamen of the Navy of the United States ought to be limited by law, and that the number of neither should exceed as many as can be actively and fully employed in the service.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, on the 2d day of the next session of Congress, a plan for a Peace Establishment of the Navy of the United States, in conformity to the principles declared in the foregoing resolutions.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were discharged from the further consideration of all the petitions and other matters that had been referred to them.

On motion of Mr. RANKIN, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the further consideration of the bill providing for the disposal of the public lands in the State of Mississippi, and for the better organization of the land districts in the States of Alabama and Mississippi; and the same being amended and gone through with in the House, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

STATEMENT OF POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Mr. F. JOHNSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, presented the following communication from the Postmaster General; which was ordered to be laid on the table:

GENERAL POST OFFICE,
April 26, 1822.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a statement, exhibiting the actual condition of the General Post Office Department, conformable to your request.

Very respectfully, &c.

R. J. MEIGS, Jr.

Hon. FRANCIS JOHNSON,
Chairman Com. Post Offices, &c.

Statement of the actual condition of the Post Office Department.

Amount of postages collected from the establishment of the Post Office, viz: from the year 1793 to April 1, 1814, inclusive - - - $7,890,531 00

Amount of postages, collected under the administration of R. J. Meigs, viz: from April 1, 1814, to January 1, 1822 - - - - - 8,083,829 00

Difference - - - - - $193,298 00

Amount of outstanding debit balances or debts due the Department, April 1, 1814 - - - - - $246,968 00

Amount of outstanding debit balances, or debts due the Department, January 1, 1822 - - - - - 424,462 00

Leaving, for increase of balances, from April 1, 1814, to January 1, 1822 - $177,494 00

Average amount of postage, now collected in one quarter of a year - 270,000 00

Excess of one quarter's postage over amount of debts, accruing from April 1, 1814, to January 1, 1822 - $92,506 00

From the data above, it appears that the increase of debit balances, or amount of debts accruing under the administration of R. J. Meigs, Jr., is $177,494, which is but a small fraction over two per cent. on the amount of postage during the same period.* Of this sum, viz: $177,494, a part is due by late postmasters, whose accounts are now in suit—a part by late postmasters, whose accounts have been stated and sent out for collection—and a larger proportion by postmasters now in office, who are daily making payments by deposits in bank, by remittances, and on drafts issued by the Department.

It will also be seen that the amount of postages, collected under R. J. Meigs, Jr., exceeds the total amount collected, previous to his administration, in the sum of $193,298; and that the total amount of debit balances accruing under his administration is less than the amount of one quarter's postage in the sum of $92,506.

The amount of losses cannot be accurately stated, but is ascertained to be very small, and is believed to be less than one-tenth of one per cent. on the amount of postage.

The increase of post offices, since April 1, 1814, is about two thousand.

The amount now in suit is stated at about one hundred thousand dollars.

Amount paid by R. J. Meigs, Jr., into the Treasury of the United States, $385,878 21.

The yearly amount now paid for the transportation of the mail, is $814,998 06.

The total amount of advances, or balances due by contractors, whose contracts have expired, from April 1, 1814, to January 1, 1822, is $4,009 95, which is less than one-twelfth part of one per cent. on the amount paid for mail transportation. No loss is ascertained to have arisen from these advances.

POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. F. JOHNSON moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill "further to regulate the Post Office Department," which was agreed to. The said bill was then taken up by the House; and the first section thereof being under consideration in the following words:

"Be it enacted, &c., That all post roads, on which the net proceeds of the postages do not amount to one-third part of the expense of conveying the mail thereon, shall, at the expiration of the present contracts, be, and the same are hereby, discontinued, except it be a road on which the mail is usually conveyed from the

* This remark applies as well to the general balance, $424,462, as to the increase of the same.

Seat of the General Government of the United States to the seat of government in a State or Territory; or from the seat of government in some State or Territory to the seat of government in some other State or Territory; or from the seat of government in a State or Territory to the seat of justice in the same county therein; or from the seat of justice in one county to that in another."

After a small verbal amendment thereof at the suggestion of Mr. F. JOHNSON—

Mr. RHEA moved to amend the same, by expunging therefrom the concluding words, "or from the seat of justice in one county to that of another;" which motion was negatived.

Mr. HUBBARD, of New York, moved an amendment to the bill, the purport of which was to authorize the Postmaster General to discontinue such post routes, at his discretion, as shall not produce one-third of the expense of conveying the mails thereon, instead of making such discontinuances absolute and imperative by the bill.

The motion was supported by the mover, and Messrs. HENDRICKS and COOK, and opposed by Messrs. F. JOHNSON, TOMLINSON, MALLARY, MCCOY, and WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, when the question was taken upon it, and negatived.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to amend the first section, by providing for the discontinuance of any post route, when the net proceeds of the postages do not exceed one-half of the expense of conveying the mail thereon, instead of one-third as reported in the bill.

The motion was supported by Messrs. TAYLOR and REED, of Massachusetts, and opposed by Messrs. F. JOHNSON, MALLARY, MOORE, of Alabama, and WOODCOCK; when the motion was put, and lost.

Mr. SANDERS moved to strike out the first section of the bill after the enacting clause; and the motion was supported at some length by the mover, but it was negatived by the House by a large majority; and no further amendments were proposed to that section.

The third section, in relation to the privilege of franking, being under consideration—

Mr. F. JOHNSON submitted a substitute for it, in the following words:

"That no postmaster shall be allowed, after the 30th June next, to frank any letter, package, or newspaper, whatsoever. Each postmaster shall be entitled to receive all letters and packages directed to him, and one daily newspaper, or newspapers equivalent thereto, free from the charge of postage: Provided. Such letter or package shall not exceed one half an ounce in weight, excepting letters and packages to and from the General Post Office, and to and from other post offices, upon the business, or relating to the concerns of the Post Office Department, which shall go free of postage as heretofore; Provided, also, That nothing in this section contained shall be construed to extend to the Postmaster General or the Assistant Postmasters General."

Mr. TAYLOR suggested an amendment to the substitute, which was decided to be not in order at present.

The substitute was opposed by Messrs. RHEA

HUBBARD, and HERRICK; when the question was put thereon, and negatived.

Mr. RHEA then moved to strike out the whole of the third section, as reported by the committee, restricting and limiting the privilege of franking as now authorized by law, and followed his motion by a speech in its favor.

Mr. PIERSON was also in favor of the motion to strike out that section.

Mr. CONDUCT moved to strike out that part of the section which excepts from the privilege of franking, letters written by or to the postmaster, on business of his own, or if it exceed half an ounce in weight.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. WOODCOCK, HUBBARD, and RHEA, and supported by Mr. CONDUCT; when the question being put thereon, it was negatived.

The question then recurred upon Mr. RHEA's motion to strike out the whole section; which was also put and lost.

Mr. SERGEANT moved so to amend the section, as to authorize postmasters to frank and receive, free of postage, letters upon the business of their office; which was agreed to.

The fourth section of the bill, to prevent postmasters and contractors for carrying the mail, from exercising both employments at the same time, being under consideration—

Mr. REED, of Maryland, proposed a proviso, the object of which was to make an exception to the section in the case of Rock Hall, in Maryland, where the mail was conveyed by packets, and the contractor was the only person that resided at the landing.

After some conversation on the subject of settling the phraseology and limitation of the proviso, in which Messrs. REED, of Maryland, WOODCOCK, HUBBARD, BURTON, SMITH, of Maryland, TAYLOR, and F. JOHNSON, participated, the motion prevailed; and, on motion of Mr. TOD, Clarke's Ferry, in Pennsylvania, was added thereto.

Mr. DENISON moved an additional proviso, the object of which was to make the operation of the section prospective only; which was agreed to.

The fifth section being under consideration—

Mr. WILLIAMSON moved an amendment, of which the object was, to make it the duty of the Postmaster General, as often as once in each year, specially to require a settlement with each of the deputy postmasters in the United States.

The motion was supported by Mr. WILLIAMSON, and opposed by Messrs. F. JOHNSON and PIERSON; when the question was taken, and the motion negatived.

Mr. PIERSON moved to strike out "sixty" days, as the period for the settlement of the accounts of the deputy postmasters, and to insert "ninety;" which was carried.

Mr. RHEA moved to strike out the section altogether; which was put, and lost.

The sixth section being under consideration—

Mr. F. JOHNSON moved to add an "s" to the word "postmaster," so as to authorize allowances to more than one postmaster for clerk hire and contingencies. The motion prevailed, and Mr.

BARBER, of Ohio, moved to strike out the word "previously," which, in the bill reported, makes it necessary that the allowance of the extra charges should be previous to the expenditure.

The motion was supported by Mr. BARBER, of Ohio, and opposed by Messrs. F. JOHNSON and BUTLER; when the question was taken, and the motion was negatived.

Mr. COCKE moved to amend the section, by adding a proviso, the effect of which was, that no such extra allowance should exceed one thousand dollars.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. SANDERS, HUBBARD, and RUSS, when Mr. COCKE modified the same, so as to make it $1,500 instead of $1,000.

The motion was further opposed by Mr. F. JOHNSON, when

Mr. BUTLER moved to amend the amendment, by striking out $1,500, and by inserting, in lieu thereof, $5,000.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, HILL, A. SMYTH, and COLDEN, when Mr. BUTLER withdrew the modification, and the question was taken on the proposition of Mr. COCKE, and negatived by a large majority.

The seventh section being under consideration—

Mr. HUBBARD moved to amend the section, so as to allow "thirty," instead of "twenty-five" per cent. on any sum received by the deputy postmasters, not exceeding one hundred dollars. And after a few remarks thereon by Messrs. HUBBARD, BARBER, of Ohio, PIERSON, MALLARY, and FULLER, in favor, and by Messrs. F. JOHNSON, TAYLOR, and TUCKER, of Virginia, against the motion, the question was taken, and the motion prevailed—ayes 66.

Mr. A. SMYTH moved to amend the section, so as to graduate the allowances as follows:

On any sum exceeding $100, and not exceeding $1,000, 20 per cent.

On any sum exceeding $1,000, and not exceeding $2,000, 15 per cent.

On any sum exceeding $2,000, 8 per cent.

After a few remarks thereon by the mover and Mr. F. JOHNSON, the question was put, and negatived.

Mr. FULLER moved to strike out the whole section.

A debate ensued thereon, in which Messrs. FULLER, REED, of Massachusetts, and GORHAM, took part; when the question was taken and the motion lost.

Mr. PIERSON proposed to amend the bill so as to allow on any sum above one hundred dollars and not exceeding three hundred dollars, a commission of twenty-five per cent.; which was put and lost.

Mr. F. JOHNSON moved a proviso, the purport of which was, that nothing in the section should affect the commissions to be allowed to deputy postmasters on newspapers, magazines, and pamphlets, and for opening mails in the night; which was agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH submitted the following amendment to be appended to the 7th section:

"And be it further enacted, That whensoever there shall be a vacancy in the office of deputy postmaster, and the receipts of the office shall have exceeded one thousand dollars per annum for the last two years, the Postmaster General shall report the fact to the President of the United States, who shall, if the Senate is not in session, make a temporary appointment, and shall, at the next session of the Senate, nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a person to fill the said office."

In support of the amendment, Mr. SMYTH contended that this was an expedient and important principle which he wished to incorporate into the bill; for some of the post offices were so lucrative that members of the House of Representatives, and even of the Senate, had been applicants for them. Mr. S. would agree that the President of the United States may, with propriety, look to this House for candidates for foreign missions, for judges, and to fill the situations of the heads of Departments; but he thought it was improper that he should do so, where pecuniary emolument was the only object of application. He thought the members of the Legislature should not be drawn from their duty in it to fill offices that were merely pecuniary. He referred to the case some years since from Philadelphia, in which the Executive declined any interference in regard to a postmaster, and the consequence was, that in a few days the Postmaster General was himself ejected from office. He also adverted to a recent case in the State of New York, which had occasioned great excitement. He thought in all such cases the responsibility should rest upon the Executive and Senate, and not upon an officer who may thereby become liable, not only to the indirect influence, but to the direct power of his superior.

Mr. F. JOHNSON was opposed not only to the principle of the amendment, but to the time and manner of its introduction. The effect of it would be to retard the passage of a necessary and important bill. Shall the appointment to an important office, he asked, be made to depend upon the fluctuations in its receipts? Shall it be referred to the President of the United States, or to the Postmaster General, according to the ebb and flow of the revenue? This, Mr. J. thought, was peculiarly improper, and inexpedient. He was also adverse to legislating with reference to individual cases, such as those from Pennsylvania and New York, to which the gentleman had alluded. He had heard no great complaint on the subject; and in relation to the latter case, he thought it very doubtful whether the President and Senate would have made a better appointment than the Postmaster General had done, or indeed whether they would have varied at all from that appointment.

Mr. SMYTH briefly replied, when the question was taken on the motion and negatived.

The eighth section, for increasing the rates of postage, being under consideration, Mr. SERGEANT moved to strike out the whole section.

The motion was supported by Mr. SERGEANT, and opposed by Mr. F. JOHNSON, but before any question was taken thereon,

Mr. NELSON moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill to the first Monday in December next.

The question being taken thereon, it was negative—yeas 48, nays 87.

The motion to strike out the second section recurred, and the question being taken, it was also negative—yeas 65, nays 68.

Mr. F. JOHNSON then moved so to amend that part of the section which relates to the increase of postage on letters, as to extend it only to such as are conveyed over seven hundred and forty miles. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SANDERS further moved to amend the section, by striking out all that part of the section which proposes an increase of postages on newspapers; which was also agreed to—yeas 70.

Mr. SERGEANT moved to amend the bill, by striking out that part of the section which proposes an increase of postage on magazines and pamphlets; and the question being taken thereon, it was negative—yeas 55, nays 65.

A verbal amendment was also agreed to at the suggestion of Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, further proposed a proviso to limit the postage on magazines and pamphlets, to one and an half cents per sheet, within the State; which was also negative.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, proposed an additional section, the object of which was, that when two printers were resident in any one town, no mail contractor should be allowed to convey the newspapers of the one, and refuse to carry those of the other. The section was adopted.

The ninth section, exempting newspapers to printers, being under consideration—

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to strike out the words that limit the selection to six from one State; which was agreed to.

Mr. SANDERS moved to strike out the whole section; but the motion was negative, without a division.

The tenth section, for the punishment of the abuse of the privilege of franking, being under consideration—

Mr. RHEA moved to strike out the whole section; but that motion was also negative—ayes 34.

Mr. BASSETT moved to strike out the proviso to the tenth section, providing penalties for violating the law respecting franking, which exempts the members of Congress from the penalties prescribed by the section. The question being taken thereon, it was negative—ayes 42, noes 75.

Mr. TOMLINSON moved to strike out the whole section as amended, and after a few remarks on the question by Messrs. TOMLINSON, F. JOHNSON, and RHEA, it was put and carried.

Mr. SANDERS submitted the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That, in the settlement of the Post Office accounts, the Comptroller of the Treasury shall allow the sum expressed in the several contracts; and if, from any cause, any contracts shall be changed, no larger sum shall be allowed than the amount expressed in the first contract, until a second contract shall be entered into; and it shall be the duty of the Comptroller to deliver over to the Auditor, whose duty it is to pass on the Post Office accounts, the duplicates of all such accounts as may be lodged with him for settlement.

The amendment was supported by the mover, and opposed by Messrs. F. JOHNSON, COOK, BARBER of Ohio, and TOMLINSON; when the question was taken, and the motion was negative.

Mr. ROCHESTER moved a reconsideration of the vote, by which the House refused to strike out the ninth section, limiting the reception of newspapers by printers free of postage to fifty in the whole.

The motion was supported by Messrs. ROCHESTER, BUCHANAN, and RHEA, and opposed by Mr. FULLER.

Mr. F. JOHNSON expressed his acquiescence (as the section had been amended) in the motion to reconsider; and, the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 69, noes 34.

The question of striking out that section was then taken and carried—ayes 70.

Mr. BUTLER moved an amendment to the second section, the purport of which was to place the responsibility of making the contracts in the several States on the Postmaster General exclusively, instead of allowing persons in the States to decide the question of who is entitled to the contracts, subject to the approbation only of the Postmaster General.

The motion was supported by the mover, and opposed by Mr. F. JOHNSON, and negative.

Mr. RHEA moved to strike out the whole of the second section, and he supported the motion in a speech of considerable length; but, before the question was taken thereon—

Mr. COOK moved to amend, by striking out that clause of the section which provides that the persons in the several States, under the instructions of the Postmaster General, who shall "determine upon the person or persons who may be entitled to the contracts for each route or routes," with the view of proposing a further amendment that should render the contract incomplete until it had received the sanction of the Postmaster General.

The motion was supported by the mover, and opposed by Mr. F. JOHNSON; and, being put, was negative.

Mr. RHEA's motion to strike out the whole section was then put and lost, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and then the House adjourned.

On motion of Mr. BLACKLEDGE, the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill fixing the compensation of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, were discharged, and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ate to abolish the United States' trading establishment with the Indian tribes, be discharged from the consideration thereof; and, the question thereon being taken, it passed in the affirmative, and the said bills were committed to a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Board of Health, of the City of Washington, signed by Henry Hunt, their President, representing the pernicious effects arising from the stagnant waters on the low grounds west of the Capitol, and bordering on the waters of Tiber creek, which grounds are the property of the United States, and asking of Congress the adoption of such measures as shall be calculated to remove the same; which letter was ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill from the Senate to alter the times of holding the District Courts in the District of New Jersey, was read twice, and subsequently read a third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to provide for the further disposal of the public lands in Mississippi, was read a third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill "further to regulate the Post Office Department," was read a third time, when Mr. H. NELSON called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered, and the bill was passed—yeas 91, nays 56.

An engrossed bill to extend the charter of the Mechanics' Bank in Alexandria, was read a third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act vesting in the State of Pennsylvania the right of the United States to all fines, assessed for the non-performance of militia duty, during the late war with Great Britain; An act to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," approved 30th March, 1802; and An act in addition to the "act concerning navigation, in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved that the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of all reports and other matters before them; which was agreed to.

Mr. FULLER submitted the following joint resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the Constitution, viz:

The compensation of the President of the United States, of the Vice President, and the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, shall be fixed by law at the first session of every Congress elected next after the Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States, according to a new census, taken pursuant to the Constitution, and shall not be increased or altered for the term of ten years, nor until after the census and apportionment next succeeding; but no increase or alteration of such compensation shall take effect till after the term shall have expired for which the persons holding the offices or stations aforesaid at the time of such increase or alteration, shall have been respectively elected.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the House do now consider the bill in relation to the taking up of fugitive slaves, &c.; but the House refused to consider the same.

On motion of Mr. KENT, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the further consideration of the bill to extend the charter of the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, and the same being taken up by the House, it was, without debate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. F. JOHNSON, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the further consideration of the bill to establish certain post roads, and to discontinue others; and, the same being before the House, was taken up by sections for amendment.

As usual on this bill, which annually comes before the House, there was a good deal of debate on the various propositions to amend it.—which, however interesting to post office neighborhoods, is not of sufficient general interest to be reported.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In the Message to both Houses of Congress at the commencement of their present session, it was mentioned that the Government of Norway had issued an ordinance for admitting the vessels of the United States and their cargoes into the ports of that Kingdom upon the payment of no other or higher duties than are paid by Norwegian vessels, of whatever articles the said cargoes may consist, and from whatever ports the vessels laden with them may come.

In communicating this ordinance to the Government of the United States, that of Norway has requested the benefit of a similar and reciprocal provision for the vessels of Norway and their cargoes, which may enter the ports of the United States.

This provision being within the competency only of the legislative authority of Congress, I communicate to them, herewith, copies of the communications received from the Norwegian Government in relation to the subject, and recommend the same to their consideration.

JAMES MONROE.

The Message, with the accompanying documents, were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF DEBATES IN CONGRESS.

Mr. WARFIELD delivered in the following report:

The committee to whom was referred the resolution instructing them to report the best mode, in their opinion, of giving to the public a full and correct statement of the debates and proceedings of this House, report: That they have taken the same into consideration, and are of opinion that the Government of the United States being a Government which essentially depends upon public opinion, it is a consideration of the first importance that the course pursued by the immediate Representatives of the people in Congress should be impartially presented to the public view. Whether it will be practicable to give a minute account of the debates and proceedings of Congress on all the various subjects that may arise, your committee will not undertake to decide. But they consider a rigid adherence to fact in whatever is published of the proceedings of Congress as indispensable; that whenever a part of a debate is published, the whole should be published, as well the arguments on the one side of the question as the arguments on the other side, and the proceedings faithfully given to the public. Your committee therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker be requested to receive, during the approaching recess of Congress, proposals for reporting and publishing from day to day a correct account of the debates and proceedings of the House of Representatives, and to submit the same to the consideration of the House at the commencement of the next session.

Mr. LITTLE moved to lay the resolution on the table.—The motion was negatived.

The question being then stated on agreeing to the report—

Mr. LITTLE said he was averse to any measure, not indispensable, which necessarily involved any considerable expense to the Government. Such, he conceived, would be the effect of adopting this resolution. What, he asked, would be the expense which a resort to the measure proposed by this resolution would involve? We had a sample, the other day, said he, of a report of one day's proceedings in this House, and that not a full report, which may give an idea of the extent which must be given to reports of our proceedings, if every thing is to be reported. Mr. L. said he was disposed, for his part, to leave this matter as it now stands—that those who are admitted to seats in this House shall go on and take such parts of the proceedings as may be acceptable to the public. It was known, that in case of long arguments on any question before the House, gentlemen sometimes prepare their speeches for publication. If they chose to do so, they had a right to do it, and they will always find access to the press, without reference to the wishes of this House upon the subject. Mr. L. said he did not believe that the country would be disposed to go to the expense of twenty or thirty thousand dollars per year for the publication of the debates at large. No benefit, certainly, would arise from it, and it would be a waste of the public money; and, Mr. L. said, he was not disposed to lend his name to a resolution which would at least give to the Speaker considerable trouble in inviting and receiving proposals, and to the House trouble in considering them. Mr. L. then moved to postpone the report to Monday next.

Mr. WARFIELD hoped the consideration of the report would not be postponed. As to the idea that the proposed publication of debates would be expensive, it was certain that the committee had no such idea in contemplation. A waste of public money! did the gentleman say?

[The SPEAKER here remarked, that the question of postponement did not admit of debate on the merits of the report.]

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, again moved to lay the report on the table.

And the report was then ordered to lie on the table—ayes 71.

MILITARY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HARDIN proposed that the House proceed to the consideration of the Compensation bill—but, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill making further appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1822, was again taken up for consideration.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole were concurred in by a general vote, subject to specific exceptions that were named.

Mr. COCKE proposed to disagree to the appropriation of $50,000 for Fort Calhoun; and he stated a variety of considerations in support of the proposition.

The question of agreeing to the report of the Committee of the Whole was then put, and carried—ayes 69.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, proposed to add to the appropriations for the Indian department, for the pay of sub-agents, the sum of $9,538.

Mr. VANCE said the sum proposed was not sufficient to pay for so many sub-agents as the law provided for, and he moved the sum of $11,338. The appropriation was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to amend the appropriation for the contingencies of the Indian Department, by striking out $40,000, and inserting in lieu thereof $75,000.

Mr. VANCE proposed to make this disbursement of contingencies as specific as we can. He, therefore, moved the sum of $14,992 for interpreters.

Mr. VANCE finally expressed his acquiescence in the proposition of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and after further remarks by Mr. FLOYD, Mr. VANCE, and Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON, the question was put, and the proposition of Mr. SMITH was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. PATTERSON excepted to an agreement with the Committee of the Whole in the appropriation of about $19,000 for the payment of the expenses incurred by court martials in the State of New York. A very spirited debate ensued, in which the disagreement was advocated by Mr. PATTERSON and Mr. MCCOY, and opposed by Mr. CAMBRELENG, Mr. ROCHESTER, Mr. WALWORTH, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. COLDEN, when, on motion of Mr. PATTERSON, the question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 134, nays 15, as follows:

Mr. RHEA moved to amend the proposed appropriation for an indemnity to the State of Georgia, by a provision to include also the State of Tennessee, but the motion was negatived.

Mr. COCKE moved to strike out the appropriation for Fort Calhoun, (it being now in order, as an affirmative proposition,) and he again adverted to the considerations that should influence a decision upon it.

Mr. BUTLER was in favor of the motion, because it would operate as a suspension, though not a decision upon the contract, and the public would not suffer by the delay.

The motion to strike out was further supported by Messrs. CAMPBELL of Ohio, MALLARY, FULLER, F. JONES, COCKE, and CUTHBERT, and opposed by Messrs. BASSETT, McDUFFIE, FARRELLY, A. SMYTH, and BALDWIN; but at six o'clock, and before any question was taken thereon, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, May 3.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for Indian annuities; and the various blanks therein having been filled, as recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means, the Committee rose and reported the same as amended, which was concurred in by the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill from the Senate to abolish the United States trading establishment with the Indian tribes.

An explanation of the bill was made by Mr. METCALFE, and the same having been gone through with, by sections, without amendment, the Committee rose and reported the bill to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading.

The Compensation bill was then called up; and, on motion of Mr. SANDERS, it was ordered to be laid on the table, without a division, by a large majority.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, the House then again went into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill concerning the disbursement of public money. The bill having been read, and the first section, prohibiting all advances of public money, being under consideration—

Mr. BALDWIN moved an amendment, the purport of which was, to except from the operation of the section the Commissary General of Purchases; and, after a few remarks by Messrs. BALDWIN, COCKE, and BASSETT, the Committee rose and reported that they had made some progress, but had come to no determination thereon.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to continue in force "An act declaring the assent of Congress to acts of the State of South Carolina, authorizing the city of Charleston to impose and collect a duty on the tonnage of vessels from foreign ports, and to acts of the State of Georgia, authorizing the imposition and collection of a duty on the tonnage of vessels in the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's;" and, after a brief consideration thereof, the Committee rose and reported the same to the House, where the report of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act for the disposition of certain special bank deposits;" and "An act to relieve the people of Florida from the operation of certain ordinances;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. WOODCOCK moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill for the payment of certain certificates, but the House negatived the motion.

Mr. SIBLEY moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill for the establishment of an additional land office in the Territory of Michigan. The motion was advocated by Mr. SIBLEY and Mr. RANKIN, and opposed by Mr. VANCE; and the question being taken, the motion was negatived.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit to Congress copies of letters received at the Department of State from the Minister of Great Britain, on the subject of the duties discriminating between imported, rolled, and hammered iron.

I recommend them particularly to the consideration of Congress, believing that, although there may be ground for controversy with regard to the application of the engagements of the treaty to the case, yet a liberal construction of those engagements would be compatible at once with a conciliatory and a judicious policy.

Department of State.

MAY, 1822.

The Message, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

A bill from the Senate, transferring to the State of Pennsylvania the right of the United States to the proceeds of the militia fines incurred during the late war within said State, was twice read; and, after adopting an amendment proposed by Mr. SERGEANT as an additional section, Mr. COLDEN moved to insert the words "New York," so as to extend the provision to that State. But, after some conversation upon the subject, Mr. COLDEN withdrew his motion. And, after some further discussion, in which Mr. SERGEANT, Mr. McCoy, and Mr. HARRISON, took part, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

A bill from the Senate to amend the act "to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill from the Senate in addition to the act, entitled "An act concerning trade and navigation," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on Commerce.

The engrossed bill to establish certain roads and to discontinue others was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. POINSETT, from the joint Library Committee, reported unfavorably upon the petition of John Melish, asking for encouragement in making a chart of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers; which was concurred in.

Mr. POINSETT, from the same committee, reported unfavorably upon the proposition to purchase, for the use of Congress, a number of copies of Seybert's Statistics; which report was concurred in.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of State, made the following report thereon:

The committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Department of State, report:

That the manner in which the moneys appropriated to the Department of State, or made subject to the control of the Secretary, are drawn and expended, will be seen by a communication made to the committee by the Secretary, and which is annexed to this report.

It will be seen by the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, that most of the appropriations made to this Department for the year 1821, which have been drawn and expended, are specific in their nature and amount. The committee therefore have directed their attention principally to an examination of the accounts of the expenditures of the contingent appropriations for the year past, as far as they deemed it necessary, and the same was practicable.

None of the appropriations for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, intercourse with the Barbary Powers, and for the relief of seamen, made at the last session of Congress, have been drawn or expended. The balances of former appropriations have been more than sufficient for their expenses.

Of the contingent expenses of our Ministers abroad, entire returns have only been received from the Minister at London. The contingent expenses of that mission for the year past, amounted to the sum of nine hundred forty-four dollars and sixty-one cents; the objects of expenditure are such as are incident to the office, and are inconsiderable in number and amount. The accounts are regularly kept, and certified by the Secretary of Legation, and the Committee were informed at the Treasury, that the accounts of all the Ministers of the United States are required to be kept and certified in the same manner.

The moneys appropriated for the relief of distressed American seamen in foreign countries, are expended by the American consuls, and the accounts are regularly entered, receipts are taken and witnessed, and the whole certified by the consul.

The expenditure of the moneys appropriated for the contingent expenses of the Department, is confided to one of the clerks of the Department. These contingences embrace the advertising, printing, and distribution of the laws of the United States; books and maps for the use of the Department; newspapers for our Ministers in foreign countries; the translation of foreign languages; stationery, printing, and necessities for that office, and for the Patent Office.

The committee have examined the accounts of these expenditures, &c., &c., with the vouchers for the said accounts, as far as they judged necessary.

The objects of expenditure appear to be such as are necessary to the execution of the duties of the Department, and must therefore be authorized by law. The expenditure is within the appropriation, and is supported by sufficient vouchers. The accounts are regularly kept; the expenditures appear to be made with fidelity and economy, and the committee are unable to suggest any subject of retrenchment compatible with the public service.

The report was read; and, on motion of Mr. TOMLINSON, was ordered to be laid on the table.

JOHN MITCHELL.

Mr. SERGEANT from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of John Mitchell, which was twice read. Mr. S. moved, owing to the lateness of the session, that the bill be now ordered for a third reading.

On this subject a short debate took place, in the course of which the bill was supported by Mr. SERGEANT and Mr. BURTON, and opposed by Mr. COCKE and Mr. NELSON, of Maryland.

The case of Mr. Mitchell was stated to be one of peculiar hardship; that he is now upwards of seventy years of age, and has been, in various stations, a faithful public servant; that, whilst agent for prisoners of war at Halifax, during the late war, a bill drawn by him upon the Government was charged to him, but, owing to the failure of the merchant who bought it, was never realized, and in consequence Mr. Mitchell stands charged for moneys he never received. Mr. M. now a clerk in an office here, and without other means of support, asks that an exception be made in his favor, for the present, against the general provision of the appropriation law, which allows no person to draw money for salary as a public officer, who stands charged as a debtor on the books of the Military Appropriation Bill.

H. OF R.

Treasury. This, it was argued, it would be no more than just to allow in the present case.

On the other hand it was argued, that the case of Mr. Mitchell would be embraced by the bill, now depending, which provides for the settlement, on principles of equity, of all accounts arising out of the late war. Under this provision, admitting his own statement to be entirely correct, Mr. M. would be soon able to liquidate the charge against him, which was all, it was contended, that he could reasonably desire. The provision of the appropriation bill, against which he appeals to Congress, was viewed as one which was of much importance, and ought to be considered the settled policy of the Government, not to be relaxed, or to be allowed to be subject to exceptions, but in all cases to be rigorously enforced, &c.

Finally, on motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, the bill was ordered to be laid on the table—yeas 64, nays 54.

MILITARY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House having resumed the consideration of the bill, making certain appropriations for the military service, the question recurred upon the motion of Mr. COCKE, to strike out the appropriation of fifty thousand dollars for Fort Calhoun.

Mr. COLDEN, after a few remarks to show the necessity of acting on the bill without further debate, called for the previous question.

The call was sustained by the House—ayes 73, noes 49.

The previous question was then put—"Shall the main question now be put?" and was decided in the affirmative.

The effect of this decision being to set aside all motions to amend—

The main question was stated, viz: "Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?"

Some questions having been proposed to the Speaker as to the effect of the decision that had been made by the House, and some gentlemen seeming to have misunderstood its bearing—

Mr. HENDRICKS, who had voted in the affirmative, moved a reconsideration of the vote for taking the previous question.

Mr. NELSON, of Maryland, called for the yeas and nays upon the question, but the House did not affirm the call; and the question upon Mr. HENDRICKS's motion being put, it was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. FLOYD expressed a disposition to propose an amendment; but the Speaker decided that no debate on the subject was in order; and Mr. FLOYD observed, thereupon, that, if he was precluded from making the amendment, he should be constrained to vote against the bill.

The question of engrossment was then put, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 131, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Ball, Barber of Connecticut, Barstow, Bassett, Bateman, Blackledge, Blair, Borland, Breckenridge, Brown, Burton, Cambreleng, Campbell of New York, Cassedy, Colden, Condict, Cook, Crudup, Cushman, Cuthbert, Darlington, Denison, Dickinson, Durfee, Dwight, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Farrelly, Findlay, Fuller, Gebhard, Gilmer, Gist, Gorham, Gross, Hall, Hardin, Harvey, Hendricks, Herrick, Hill, Hobart, Holcombe, Hooks, Hubbard, Jackson, J. T. Johnson, J. S. Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Lathrop, Leftwich, Litchfield, Little, McCarty, McCoy, McDuffie, McLane, McNeill, McSherry, Matson, Mattocks, Mercer, Milnor, Mitchell of Pa., Montgomery, Moore of Pa., Moore of Virginia, Moore of Ala., Morgan, Murray, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Maryland, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Overstreet, Patterson of New York, Patterson of Pennsylvania, Phillips, Pier-son, Pitcher, Plumer of New Hampshire, Plumer of Pennsylvania, Poinsett, Rankin, Reed of Massachusetts, Reed of Maryland, Rhea, Rich, Rochester, Rogers, Russ, Sanders, Sawyer, Sergeant, S. NAYS—Messrs. Baylies, Burrows, Butler, Campbell of Ohio, Cannon, Chambers, Cocke, Crafts, Edwards of North Carolina, Eustis, Floyd, F. Johnson, Keyes, Kirkland, Long, Mallary, Matlack, Metcalfe, Ross, and Williams of North Carolina.

COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill fixing the compensation of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings. The bill proposed to reduce the compensation of that officer from two thousand to one thousand five hundred dollars; and after a few explanatory observations by Mr. BLACKLEDGE—

It was proposed by Mr. COCKE to add a section, limiting the compensation of the Architect of the Public Buildings to one thousand five hundred dollars; but, on the suggestion of Mr. MALLARY, he modified the same by proposing two thousand instead of one thousand five hundred dollars. The motion was opposed by Mr. Wood and Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH, and supported by Mr. COCKE and Mr. MALLARY, when the question was taken and negatived.

Mr. HOBART proposed an amendment, requiring the Commissioner to give bonds, with surety, for the faithful discharge of his duty, which was agreed to; and, on motion of Mr. COCKE, a proviso was appended thereto, providing that no more money shall, at any time, be placed in the hands of that officer, than may be covered by the amount of the bond.

Mr. WALWORTH moved an amendment that no allowances should be made to the said Commissioner for clerk hire, and the question being put thereon, it was agreed to.

Mr. HOBART moved to strike out the second section of the bill as being unnecessary; but the motion was negatived.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill, and the same, with the amendments thereto, were concurred in by the House, excepting that amendment which refuses to the Commissioner a clerk, on which there was some conversation between Messrs. PIERSON, WOOD, BLACKLEDGE, BROWN, NELSON, of Massachusetts, and WHIPPLE.

Mr. F. JONES moved to strike out the two first sections of the bill after the enacting clause, so as to leave the salary of the Commissioner two thousand instead of one thousand five hundred dollars; which was negatived, and the bill was then ordered for a third reading.

The House then, on request of Mr. BALL, went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of William Henderson, and, after considering the same, it was reported to the House, and concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. And then, after a vain attempt to procure a recess for an evening sitting, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, May 4.

A bill from the Senate to relieve the people of Florida from the operation of certain ordinances, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill from the Senate to abolish the United States' Trading Establishment with the Indian tribes, was read a third time.

Mr. MILNOR remarked, that, as this was a bill of which he considered the policy to be, to say the least of it, extremely doubtful, and, as it was one of great importance, he should ask for the yeas and nays upon its passage. The question being put, the call for the yeas and nays was not sustained; and the bill was passed without debate or division.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled An act for the relief of certain insolvent debtors; with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate, in addition to the act "concerning navigation," and also to authorize the appointment of deputy collectors (the title of the bill having been amended so to read,) was read a third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the official transactions of John Brahan, late receiver of public moneys at Huntsville, in the State of Alabama, as required by the resolution of this House, of the 18th ultimo; which report was ordered to lie on the table.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain insolvent debtors," was read, and agreed to by the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Thaddeus Mayhew; the bill for the relief of the representatives of John B. Dash; and the bill for the relief of Alexander Roddy; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported the first and last mentioned bills without amendment, and that for the relief of the representatives of John B. Dash, with an amendment, which was read, and concurred in by the House, and that, together with the bill for the relief of Alexander Roddy, were ordered to be engrossed, and severally read a third time to-day.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, the bill for the relief of Thaddeus Mayhew was laid on the table.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, from the Committee of Commerce, to whom was referred a bill from the Senate, in addition to the act concerning navigation, reported the same without amendment; to which sundry amendments were subsequently proposed by Mr. N. and adopted, and the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the same, with the bill, were ordered for a third reading this day. [The principal amendment moved by Mr. N. provides that the 3d, 4th, and the 7th sections of the act of the 3d of March, 1817, to continue in force the act "further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed in 1815, shall be revived and made permanent.]

Mr. HENDRICKS moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill authorizing the location of certain school lands in the State of Indiana, which was agreed to, and, after a few remarks by Mr. HENDRICKS and Mr. FLOYD, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. COCKE moved that the House do now take into consideration the bill to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment; but the House refused to consider the same—ayes 49, noes 54.

The engrossed bill making further appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1822, was read a third time.

Mr. WRIGHT rose and said, he voted against the appropriation of the nineteen thousand dollars to pay the militia courts martial in New York during the late war; and he felt it due to himself, he said, briefly to assign the reason. These culprits were moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil and the Hartford Convention, treasonably to desert the standard of their country, and not to do their duty. They themselves ought to have paid the cost. We have no such charge in Maryland, and it may be a question whether the court martial ought to be paid at all, as I do not understand that any of these culprits suffered death.

The bill was then passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The engrossed bill to provide for annuities to certain Indian tribes; a bill fixing the compensation of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings; a bill for the relief of William Henderson; a bill to authorize the location of certain school lands in the State of Indiana, were read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The bill from the Senate to amend the act to regulate the trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes and to preserve peace on the frontiers was read a third time and passed.

Mr. CONNER moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of a bill for the relief of the securities of John H. Alley; but the motion was refused, as was a motion of a similar description by Mr.

H. OF R.

DENISON, in relation to the Pennsylvania judicial district bill.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on a bill for the relief of David Cummings, and reported the same to the House without amendment, and the bill was ordered for a third reading.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on a bill for the relief of William Bartlett and others; on a bill for the relief of Isaac Collier; and a bill for the relief of John M. Moody and Samuel Moody, and reported the same to the House, respectively, without amendment; and the said bills were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and were subsequently read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to postpone the orders of the day preceding the bill in relation to surveys, &c. of roads and canals, but the House refused to agree to this motion.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on a bill for the relief of Nathan Branson, and a bill for the relief of Trapmaun, Jahucke & Co. and reported the same to the House, respectively, without amendment, and the said bills were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then went into a Committee on a bill to repeal in part an act passed by the State of Maryland respecting the sale of water lots in Georgetown; and a bill to incorporate the inhabitants of Georgetown. To the former bill an amendment was made, on motion of Mr. KENT, and the Committee having gone through with both bills, rose and reported the same to the House, and, being there concurred in, they were both ordered to a third reading.

Two or three other private bills were then passed through a Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Anthony Kennedy; a bill for the relief of John Byers; and a bill for the relief of the heirs of Edward McCarty, deceased, and reported the two former to the House without amendment where they were concurred in, and severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and the latter bill, having been corrected in its phraseology, was also reported, and gone through with, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on a bill for the relief of James Ross; a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Girault; and a bill for the relief of William N. Earle; and reported the two latter bills to the House, without amendment, and also reported progress on the bill for the relief of James Ross, on which the Committee had leave to sit again. The report of the Committee of the Whole in the cases of William N. Earle and the legal representatives of John Girault, were concurred in, and the said bills were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on a bill for the relief of Robert Purdy; a bill for the relief of Charles A. Swearingen; and a bill for the relief of Solomon Prevost. The said bills having been gone through with, were reported to the House respectively without amendment, where they were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then again went into a Committee of the Whole on a bill for the relief of John Pellet; a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Guthrie, deceased; and a bill for the relief of John Crute; and, after an amendment to the bill for the legal representatives of John S. Guthrie, deceased, at the suggestion of Mr. LATHROP, the Committee rose and reported the said bills, which were concurred in by the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Marie Therese, and on the bill for the relief of Sally Vance, and no amendments having been offered thereto, the same were reported to the House, concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The following engrossed bills were read a third time and passed, viz: A bill for the relief of Trapmaun, Jahucke & Co.; a bill for the relief of Alexander Roddy; a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John B. Dash; a bill for the relief of Nathan Branson; a bill for the relief of David Cummings.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on a bill for the relief of certain persons who have paid duty on goods imported into Castine, and on a bill for the relief of William Whitehead and others. No amendments having been offered thereto, the same were reported to the House, and on motion, both bills were ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. TOMLINSON moved to reconsider the bill for the relief of certain persons who have paid duties on goods imported into Castine; but the motion was negatived.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on a bill for the relief of Reuben Hickman and Fielding Hickman, and on the bill for the relief of William Biggs, and, having gone through with the same, they were reported to the House. The bill for the relief of William Biggs, on motion of Mr. RANKIN, was ordered to be laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. GILMER, the name of Joshua Cannon was inserted, next before the name of Reuben Hickman, in the bill for the relief of Reuben and Fielding Hickman. On the question of ordering the bill to a third reading, it was supported by Mr. TRACY, Mr. LITTLE, Mr. HARDIN, and Mr. MATROCKS, and opposed by Mr. EDWARDS of North Carolina, and Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH, when the question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

LETTER OF MR. RUSSELL.

A Message, received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES yesterday, was read, and is as follows:

H. OF R.

Indian Trade.

MAY, 1822.

To the House of Representatives of the United States.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 19th of April, requesting the President "to cause to be communicated to the House, if not injurious to the public interest, any letter which may have been received from Jonathan Russell, one of the Ministers who concluded the Treaty of Ghent, in conformity with the indications contained in his letter of 25th December, 1814," I have to state, that, having referred the resolution to the Secretary of State, and it appearing, by a report from him, that no such documents had been deposited among the archives of the department, I examined and found among my private papers a letter of that description, marked, "private" by himself. I transmit a copy of the report of the Secretary of State, by which it appears that Mr. Russell, on being apprized that the document referred to by the resolution had not been deposited in the Department of State, delivered there "a paper purporting to be the duplicate of a letter written by him from Paris, on the 11th of February, 1815, to the then Secretary of State, to be communicated to the House, as the letter called for by the resolution."

On the perusal of the document called for, I find that it communicates a difference of opinion between Mr. Russell and a majority of his colleagues, in certain transactions which occurred in the negotiations at Ghent, touching interests which have been since satisfactorily adjusted by treaty between the United States and Great Britain. The view which Mr. Russell presents of his own conduct, and that of his colleagues, in those transactions, will, it is presumed call from the two surviving members of that mission, who differed from him, a reply, containing their view of those transactions, and of the conduct of the parties in them, and who, should his letter be communicated to the House of Representatives, will also claim that their reply should be communicated in like manner by the Executive—a claim which, on the principle of equal justice, could not be resisted. The Secretary of State, one of the Ministers referred to, has already expressed a desire that Mr. Russell's letter should be communicated, and that I would transmit, at the same time, a communication from him respecting it.

On full consideration of the subject, I have thought it would be improper for the Executive to communicate the letter called for, unless the House, on a knowledge of these circumstances, should desire it; in which case the document called for shall be communicated, accompanied by a report from the Secretary of State, as above suggested. I have directed a copy to be delivered to Mr. Russell, to be disposed of as he may think proper, and have caused the original to be deposited in the Department of State, with instruction to deliver a copy to any person who may be interested.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, May 4, 1822.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 3, 1822.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 19th ultimo, requesting the President "to cause to be communicated to the House, if not injurious to the public good, any letter or communication which may have been received from Jonathan Russell, esquire, one of the Ministers of the United States, who concluded the Treaty of Ghent, after the signature of that treaty, and which was written in conformity to the indications contained in said Minister's letter, dated at Ghent, 25th of December, 1814," has the honor of reporting to the President, that, until after the adoption of the said resolution by the House, there was upon the files of the Department of State no letter from Mr. Russell, of the description mentioned therein; but that Mr. Russell himself has since delivered at the department a communication, purporting to be the duplicate of a letter written by him from Paris, on the 11th of February, 1815, to the then Secretary of State, to be communicated to the House, as the letter called for by their resolution.

A copy of this paper is herewith submitted to the President.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the Message was ordered to be laid on the table.

INDIAN TRADE.

Mr. METCALFE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate to amend the act, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," reported the same with amendments, consisting of two additional sections, as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the thirteenth section of the act, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," approved the thirtieth of March, one thousand eight hundred and two, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That an act, entitled "An act making provision for the civilization of the Indian tribes, adjoining the frontier settlements," approved March the third, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, however. That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as in anywise to alter or impair the effect of any treaty stipulation, or other obligation, which may have been entered into between the United States and any Indian tribe or tribes.

On these amendments a debate ensued, in which they were supported by Mr. FLOYD and Mr. METCALFE, and opposed by Mr. WOOD and Mr. VANCE.

Mr. METCALFE addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I would not object to any direction which it might be the pleasure of the House to give to the bill for the purpose of affording an opportunity of a more full and thorough investigation of the amendments proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, were it not too late in the session for delay, and because it is important that the bill should pass, whether the amendment be adopted or rejected.

Perhaps, said Mr. M., an apology is due to the gentleman from Virginia, who, being a member of the committee, was not consulted touching the proposed amendment. This bill was not referred to the committee until yesterday, and as the session is nearly at a close, it was expected by all the warm friends of the bill that the committee would not fail to report it on this day. My own duty on another committee, and the shortness of the time allowed, prevented a regular meeting, this morning, of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and therefore it was, that I consulted such of the members only as could be found in the House at the moment, and obtained the consent of a majority, to the amendment proposed.

Let it be recollected, said Mr. M., that, by the authority of the House, it has been made the special duty of this committee to inquire into the progress which has been made in the civilization and happiness of the Indian tribes, under the system which has been devised and pursued for that purpose. It is, therefore, my duty to communicate to the House the result of the inquiries. Here Mr. M. adverted to the 13th section of the act of 1802, by which the sum of $15,000, annually, is appropriated for civilizing purposes; for presents, &c. He objected to this expenditure, upon the ground that it was no longer necessary; that the Indians derived no benefit from it; and because no satisfactory account could be obtained of its application, to whom paid, or for what purpose. He then adverted to the act of 1819, appropriating the sum of $10,000, annually, for the instruction of the Indians in agricultural pursuits, and to educate them; and read a communication from the President, showing if the President was not himself deceived, as Mr. M. supposed he might be, that a considerable portion of this sum had been applied to the erection of buildings in the Indian settlements, which in his opinion ought not to be tolerated. And he objected to the employment of Dr. J. Morse, and to the sum paid for his services, under the provisions of this law. But, said Mr. M., that we may know something of the situation of those people, and of their numbers; that we may be well informed of the nature and condition of the materials upon which we are about to operate, I will take the liberty of adverting to extracts from the report of Dr. Morse, which was referred to the committee for that purpose.

In New England there are nine tribes, 2,247 souls. In New York ten tribes, 4,840 souls. In Pennsylvania thirty years ago, three tribes, 1,300 souls, number at this time not known. In Ohio, fifteen tribes, 2,047 souls. In Michigan and the Northwest Territory, thirty-six tribes, 27,480 souls. In Indiana and Illinois, 14 tribes, 15,522 souls. Southern Indians east of the Mississippi, twenty tribes, 66,487 souls. Total number east of the Mississippi, twenty tribes, 120,283 souls. North of Missouri and west of the Mississippi, thirteen tribes, 41,350 souls. East of the Rocky Mountains to the Mississippi, and between Missouri and Red river or west of the Mississippi to the Rocky Mountains, 36 tribes, 105,021 souls. Between Red river and the Rio del Norte, 42 tribes, 105,021 souls. Whole number west of the Mississippi 337,341. Total numbers in the United States, besides about 5,000 in Florida, and ten tribes, (number not known,) inhabiting the Upper Mississippi, 457,642 souls.

Now, said Mr. M., how to civilize and refine, and christianize these our red brothers and sisters is the question—a question truly of considerable magnitude—the solution of which appears to be attended with no inconsiderable difficulty. The past and the present history of this matter sheds a faint gleam of light, by which to guide us in future. Here Mr. M. referred to Loskiel's history of the missions among the Indians in North America about one hundred and fifty years ago. At that period the author informs us that much had been done for the edification and refinement of the Indians; that vast numbers of them were at that time a pious and an exemplary people, rapidly increasing in civilization, and in Christian knowledge. By reading their subsequent history, however, we are irresistibly drawn to the conclusion, that their spiritual fathers wrote with an eye to their own exclusive benefit and emolument, making those upon whom their heavy contributions were levied, the dupes.

Mr. M. now referred to Bouchette on Canada, giving an account of the condition of the domiciliated Indians of St. Regis, who for centuries had been blessed with resident Catholic missionaries as their spiritual fathers; and, instead of progressing in civilization and refinement, or in Christian piety and virtue, were still a lazy, dirty, and degraded band of savages, unchristian, immoral, and vicious in the extreme.

Mr. M. said he would now refer to the history of the various tribes, or remnant of tribes, in the interior of our own country, by reading extracts from the report of Dr. Morse. The Rev. E. Kellogg writes the following account: "The Passamaquoddies and Penobscots are Catholics, and under the care of Catholic priests, who receive a stated stipend from the State treasury. They have made no other than incipient improvements in any thing which pertains to civilized life, and are sadly given to intemperance." So much for the Indians in the State of Maine. Now for those in the State of Massachusetts—"All the Indians remaining in this State reside on their respective reservations at Marshpee, Herring Pond, Martha's Vineyard, and Troy, on the southeast part of the State, from fifty to one hundred miles from Boston. The State, by a board of overseers, exercises a guardian care over them, as to their lands and civil rights and privileges. And the Corporation of Harvard College, and the Society for Propagating the Gospel among the Indians and others in North America, provide for their religious and moral instruction, having charity funds in its treasury, appropriated for the use and benefit of the Indians, the former $12,000 the latter $9,000. A stated missionary, Rev. Dr. Fish, is supported at Marshpee. The Rev. Doctor writes that, among them are a few who are eminently pious; considerable numbers decent in their lives, and not a few shockingly profligate. The state of morals low. Intemperance, with its concomitants, is found among them. The number of pure blooded Indians is extremely small, say fifty or sixty, and is daily decreasing. The mixture of blood arises far more from their connexion with negroes, than with the whites; their number is diminishing on account of their vices." Rev. Mr. Thatcher writes as follows: "It is true we think we see but little good in preaching to 'these people. Did we not take into consideration the evils which we probably prevent, who would not be discouraged and give up the cause, saying I have labored in vain, and spent my strength for naught?' In Rhode Island it is said their condition is not quite so bad.

Of those in Connecticut, it is said "that the few now remaining in this State have made but few advances in any thing which pertains to civilization, and are gradually wasting away, after the manner of other tribes, now extinct. The State has assumed the care of their property, in like manner as the other New England States have provided for their Indians. They have such advantages of religious and moral instruction as they are willing to receive, which are few, and the effects proportionably small. Those Indians, especially at North Stonington, and at Groton, are said to be, with very few exceptions, intemperate and improvident; of course, poor and miserable. They manufacture mats, brooms, baskets, and so on, which they generally sell for ardent spirits." Such are the results of long experience, as we have it from the mouths of individuals who are employed to civilize and to convert them to Christianity, and who are compensated for their services by public or private donations. Shall this Government take up and follow the hopeless example?

"The Six Nations, residing in the State of New York, in number 4,575, remain on their respective reservations, containing, in all, about 265,315 acres of land." "Many petty depredations, and thefts, and trespasses, are committed by them and the whites upon each other." To this testimony may be added that of honorable members from New York, who inform us that, instead of advancing in civilization or in piety, they are rapidly degenerating into vice and corruption.

Of those in the State of Ohio, it is said: "The Wyandots came from the country near Quebec, about two hundred and fifty years ago, when the French had dominion of Canada. They maintained a Roman Catholic missionary among them. By these missionaries they were nearly all baptized, and nearly all the aged ones still carry crucifixes in their bosoms, under their shirts. Between the years 1803 and 1810 the Presbyterians supported a missionary among them, on the Sandusky river. A few converts were made, who were put to death by the Catholic Indians on account of their religion."

From this I infer that it is improper to impose a tax upon our Protestant citizens for the support of Catholic missionaries, and equally as improper to tax the Catholic for the purpose of supporting Protestant missionaries. To preserve our holy religion in its purity, we must let it make its own way, with the smiles and friendly countenance of the Government beaming upon every sect and denomination, without giving pecuniary aid to any one. "The number of Cherokees, inclusive of whites, blacks, and mixed blood, is estimated at 11,500. In the treaty of March, 1819, they ceded a part of their territory to the United States. Among other reservations is one of a 'tract of land, of twelve miles square, to be sold by the United States, and vested by the President in the most profitable stock, as a school fund for the Cherokee nation.'

For a population not half equal to that which is contained in a small county in one of our States, this appears to be an ample provision. Our own citizens, in any part of this Union, would rejoice to have such a school fund as this.

The Choctaws, it is said, are also well provided for.

Now, said Mr. M., what are we told by that distinguished fellow-citizen, whose keen and penetrating intellect, and whose long experience enables him to speak to us the language of wisdom, and to afford us so much light upon this momentous subject? [He then read from the Literary and Scientific Repository the following extract of a letter from Governor Cass:]

"The lessons of experience upon this subject are too important to be disregarded. In the zealous efforts which are now making to meliorate the condition of the Indians, we have much to learn from the history of the progress and result of the same experiment which was made by the Jesuits. We cannot bring to the task more fervid zeal, more profound talents, more extensive or varied acquirements, nor probably a deeper knowledge of the principles of human nature. But, so far as respects any permanent or valuable impression, they have wholly failed. Very few of the Indians profess any attachment to the Christian religion; and, of those who make this profession, there is not probably one whose knowledge is not confined to the imposing rites and external ceremonies of the Catholic church. A more vivid impression appears to have been made upon the Wyandots than upon any others; and they preserved for a longer term than any other tribe, traces of the indefatigable exertions of their spiritual fathers. But, even with them, superior as they are in intellectual endowments, and placed by their local situation in contact with a Catholic community, the subject is forgotten, or, if remembered, it is remembered only by a few aged and decrepid persons, like other traditionary legends of their nation."

Upon these remarks, said Mr. M., no commentary can be necessary. I will now pass to one more extract of a letter from Mr. Sibley, an intelligent Indian agent, of long experience among that people, to Dr. Morse, which I have taken from his report:

"I have noticed Indians observing with much apparent interest the effects of our agricultural skill, our fine gardens, abundant crops, and numerous comforts and conveniences. A very sensible Osage, the Big Soldier, who had twice been at Washington, once said to me, when I was urging the subject of civilization upon him: 'I see and admire your manner of living, your good warm houses, your extensive fields of corn, your gardens, your cows, oxen, work horses, wagons, and a thousand machines that I know not the use of. I see that you are able to clothe yourselves, even from weeds and grass. In short, you can do almost what you please. You whites possess the power of subduing almost every animal to your use.' But, after this acknowledgment, on his part, of our superior skill in the various arts, and this candid expression of his admiration, he continues thus: 'You are surrounded by slaves. Every thing about you is in chains; and you are slaves yourselves. I fear, if I should change my pursuits for yours, I should become a slave. Talk to my sons; perhaps they may be persuaded to adopt your fashions, or at least to recommend them to their sons; but, for myself, I was born free, and wish to die free! I am perfectly content with my condition. The forests and rivers supply all the wants of nature in plenty; and there is no lack of white people to purchase the products of our labor.' "

Such, said Mr. M., is said to be the language, such the sentiments of the Indians generally. And what a commentary is this upon the speculations of the theorist! upon him whose fanciful notions give direction to all his actions! What a lesson to the proud presumptuous man who never thinks of doing good to thousands and tens of thousands of nearer, and dearer, and much nobler objects immediately around him, who are fairly within the sphere of his action, and in need of his assistance, but is continually casting ahead before the light breezes of his own inordinate vanity, pretending to vie with his Maker in acts of universal benevolence! Yes, of universal benevolence! How has his imaginary castles been upset and demolished by those plain but irresistible and self-evident truths which have fallen from the lips of an Indian!

When the forests no longer abound in game, nor the rivers with fish, in sufficient quantities for the sustenance and support of the Indian, he will abandon the life of the hunter for that of the agriculturist, and not before. As long as furs and peltries are in demand, and can be had by following the chase, that long there must, and will, and ought to be, hunters; and were it in our power, by forced measures, or otherwise, to withdraw the Indian from the recesses of the wilderness, from the pursuits of the chase, and learn him to become a tiller of the ground, what would be the consequence? Would not the white man become a hunter in his stead? And thus while with such eager solicitude we urge, and press, and force, if we could force, the Indians into a state of civilization, do we uncivilize, or, rather, savage, an equal number of our own citizens. Would not this be the inevitable result? No one, it is presumed, will, or can, deny the fact. And is it not a fact worthy our most serious consideration? I candidly acknowledge, that, for my own part, I have no great partiality for such a change, or rather for such an exchange, even were it in our power to accomplish it.

But I am persuaded that the civilization of the Indians, if effected at all, is to be the work not only of time, but of necessity. Yes, sir, of sheer, of stern necessity. Slowly progressive in its march, and by degrees almost imperceptible, it will, within the time, and to such extent as their great and good spirit shall direct, come to pass.

Let us be careful to throw no obstacles in the way. On the contrary, let us set them a bright example, and that example will have its attractions. We are much the strongest party; therefore, let justice, peace, and mercy, towards them, be our motto. It is our duty to treat them with humanity and tenderness, and not to abuse the power we possess, by wielding it to their injury and destruction. And, sir, if we go beyond this, if we must and will draw upon our country's Treasury to help them on, let it only be done when there is at least a reasonable prospect of attaining the great object we have in view.

Much of the treasure of this people has already been wasted in vain and futile attempts to civilize the Indians. I say wasted, because its application has had no good effect upon them, and has subserved no other purpose, except to fill the pockets of a few favored individuals, who are interested in deceiving us, and all of whom now unite in one general cry for more money—more money—give us more money, and the public land, and the good work shall be done! Not that any good is likely to be done so as to be discernable to those who live in our day, and generation. Oh no! But perhaps some small traces of the good effects of our honest and disinterested efforts may be visible to those of our posterity a few centuries hence, who delight so much in looking back through the dark mists, and shadows, as they are closing behind them—through the twilight of uncertainty, for the purpose of desecrating, and of contemplating the virtues and the generosity of their ancestors; and of profiting, as individuals of a similar cast always have done, as they now do, and always will do—very little by any good example.

How various are the pursuits of various men. One man is engaged, deeply and ardently engaged, in contemplating the scenes which have long since gone by, and over which Time, bald-pated Time! is about to throw, or perhaps has already thrown, his impenetrable mantle, for the purpose of hiding those scenes forever from the view of mortals.

Another devotes his whole life most earnestly and zealously to the study of some plan, or scheme, or project, by which he fondly hopes to add very greatly to the future stock of human happiness, of human grandeur, and of human glory, and thereby to procure for himself a name immortal. While, on the other hand, such men as myself, limited, extremely limited no doubt in their views, and fully sensible of their own weakness, without looking quite so much at the past, or pretending to form any very extensive plans for the future, confine their humble and feeble exertions principally to that, which, in their opinion, will redound most to the honor and interest of their compeers; especially of those upon whom their acts are to have an immediate, and certain effect—returning thanks occasionally, to be sure, for the good with which their ancestors were blessed, and praying for the good of posterity, but, without once losing sight of what they consider a great, a paramount, and an indispensable duty, which they owe to the present generation.

Such men as these, Mr. Speaker, will necessarily inquire of you, how do we raise the revenue out of which this civilizing cash is to be furnished? They will not forget, that it is raised in part by an indirect tax upon articles of the very first necessity; and in part by taxing those articles from the use of which our citizens derive a very considerable portion of all their comforts, and of all their enjoyments; that it is a tax upon articles of necessary consumption, a matter of very doubtful policy at any time. For, in proportion to the increase of such a tax, do we depress our own productive citizens, and discourage and check the increasing population of our own country. Yes, of our own country! endearing name, but always lost sight of when we are chasing a shadow, or pursuing a phantom, from which no good is to be realized. He that will not provide for his own household, is said, by the highest authority, to be worse than an infidel. We have a numerous household, consisting of nearly ten millions of souls, for whom, if we do not provide, let us not deprive them of the means which they are industriously striving to provide for themselves.

The citizen of this Republic who rears a numerous family in decency, were he to sit down and calculate the amount of taxes annually paid by him upon the articles of sugar, molasses, tea, coffee, pepper, spices, muslins, calicoes, cloths, and so on—an endless list—would be lost in astonishment. Yes, he would be lost in astonishment.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that we represent a magnanimous and a generous people. Of taxes they will not complain if imposed for humane, and benevolent, and useful purposes, and applied accordingly. But we are deceiving ourselves, and the people are deceived, in supposing that we promote the cause of humanity, or add any real substantial benefit to the Indians by this idle application of our money—this wanton waste of the nation's treasure. A word or two in relation to those Indians who are dispersed and scattered over that vast region of wilderness beyond the borders of our settlements. And here I do not mean to travel with you upon the waters of the Rio del Norte or along the shores of the Pacific. Nor do I intend at present to run across the path of my honorable and highly respected friend from Virginia, by disturbing his infant colony at the mouth of the Columbia; though I may hereafter stand at his back, when it shall become necessary to support him in opposition to the Emperor Alexander. But, confining myself to the Indians on this side of the Rocky Mountains—what do they think of our civilizing systems? Let them answer for themselves. The words of a principal chief of the Fox tribes, as related by Mr. Sibley, will show you their aversion to our laws, and the repugnance they feel to what we call civilization. "The Great Spirit (said Wah-ha-lo) put the Indians on the earth to hunt, and to gain a living in the wilderness; and I always find, that when any of our people depart from this mode of life, by attempting to read and write, and live like the white people do, the Great Spirit is displeased with them, and they soon die.*" Here we discover that submission to laws, however mild and equitable in their provisions, is, in their estimation, the most intolerable bondage. The various cords and links by which, under the social compact, all civilized societies are united, they look upon as so many galling chains, as the very badges of slavery, and therefore not to be endured. These wild, but proud and lofty spirits, indignantly spurn what they are led to consider a dull and ponderous load. Mr. Speaker, I know not how to hold the mirror up to nature. But little of my time has been devoted to the study of her laws. I cannot pretend to say, whether, in the organization and construction of the interior man, there is so great a difference that the white and red man cannot be brought to think and act alike, under similar circumstances. But, I will say, that all our attempts to make them think and act alike under circumstances so dissimilar, is not only vain, but, if I may be pardoned for the expression, it is in my opinion an exceeding folly, if not presumption.

There are certain animals which, in their exterior appearance, bear as strong a resemblance to each other as does the white man and the Indian, and yet, by nature, they are wholly irreconcilable. Not to mention certain quadrupeds of this description, I will barely point to some of the feathered tribes. The wild duck for instance—how soon it dives to hide from you. The partridge conceals itself while the shell is yet upon its head. But more especially the turkey. Do we not see what we very properly call the wild turkey, often brought into life by, and raised with, those of the domestic breed, without having seen one of its own kind? And yet, we find that, as soon as it arrives at sufficient strength and maturity, scorning the barnyard, though strewed with abundance, it leaves the roost of its companions, and, bounding aloft, it perches on the top of some distant, towering, tree—on the branches of the proudest monarch of the forest within its reach. This is repeated again and again. Wandering from the side of the gentle brood, he strolls in pursuit of other objects, which, though he has never seen, he is, by the irresistible force of nature, led to believe do somewhere exist. With desire keen and strong, he seeks, and, if successful, he bids farewell, a long farewell, to all his old companions, and returns to them no more. And thus it is that whole broods have, from time to time, been brought into life and raised up on the farm, and have as invariably disappeared. Where are they now to be found? Though I will not indulge in the afflicting belief that such a destiny as this does really await our red brethren, yet I do most sincerely believe that such is the barrier which nature interposes between the two people, together with the powerful force of habit operating upon them, that all our attempts to civilize those Indians, who are dispersed and scattered in the wilderness, will be fruitless and unavailing. And, therefore, in plain and common language, I do most respectfully give it as my humble opinion that we had much better mind our own business; yes, we had much better mind our own business. And equally vain will be all our attempts to civilize those within the interior of our country, and surrounded by our settlements, unless we first remove certain artificial obstacles which we must see, and perhaps can remove. I mean, that we must radically change our present system of policy—the political relations existing between them and us. We may educate them, instruct them in agricultural and mechanic arts, furnish them with the implements of husbandry, and try to convert them to Christianity; and, after all, unless we secure to them the benefit and protection of our laws and municipal regulations, and in this way ingraft them, like so many twigs, upon the stalk, or upon the branches of the stalk of the Republic, all our efforts will be without effect.

If the States, respectively, in which the small tribes or remnant of tribes remain, will not consent to the removal of these artificial obstacles, and suffer our civilizing experiments to be fairly made, for one, I despair of success; and, abandoning all our projects as idle, and even visionary, I will not vote my country's treasure to any such purpose. Encompassed around about by such a power as this, what can they do, while they remain, not independent communities, but dependent upon our will, and yet without the pale of our laws. Aliens in their own country, they can do nothing; they may recede, they cannot advance. If the Government will give them, individually, a just and reasonable portion of their lands—of their respective reservations, laid out in its proper metes and boundaries, and take them under the jurisdiction and control of the laws, gradually extending to them such rights and privileges as shall be reasonable, perhaps something may be done. Otherwise, viewing all our projects as a mere mockery, I am prepared to give it over.

In support of these views, Mr. M. said he would refer honorable members to the Inaugural Address of the President, on the 4th of last March, and also, to the report of the honorable Secretary of War, during the present session of Congress, as well as at the session of 1818. It is but right, said he, to give the Indians fair play. Encourage them to the exertion of their own faculties, of their own energies; but do not impose heavy contributions upon our white citizens, from which the Indians are, in truth, to derive no profit, no advantage; but which goes to the special and exclusive benefit of those who can, with the greatest facility and convenience, obtain access to your treasury.

Mr. VANCE called for the previous question, which was sustained by the House; and the previous question being taken, was decided in the affirmative. The main question on ordering the bill to be read a third time, thereby excluding the proposed amendments of Mr. METCALFE, was put and carried.

SPECIAL BANK DEPOSITES.

A bill from the Senate for the disposal of certain special deposits, was twice read; and

Mr. MILNOR moved that the same be postponed until the first Monday in December next. The ground on which he made the motion was, that he did not fully understand the object and bearing of the bill; nor did he think it was fully understood by the House. He could perceive no special necessity for its passage at this time; and he was unwilling that any bill of this sort should go through the House without being fully investigated and well understood.

Mr. HARDIN remarked, that it was essentially necessary that the bill should pass at the present session, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury, before it was too late, to make such an arrangement as should secure to the United States the amount of these deposits. The bill forbids any disposition of those funds at a rate lower than par. Of course the interest of the United States was perfectly safe. Besides, it was all to be done under the cognizance, and with the approbation, of the President of the United States. What harm, then, could flow from this bill? On the other hand, if it did not pass, Mr. H. said, and the charters of the banks indebted to the United States should be taken away before the debt was secured, the whole amount would be inevitably lost. He had no doubt there was a disposition on the part of the directors, in all these States, to secure the United States, if they could do so; because he would not doubt but there was honesty enough in the West to do this, if an opportunity was offered. But delay might be fatal, and he hoped, therefore, the bill would be allowed to pass.

Mr. COOK commenced some remarks, by observing that the gentleman from Kentucky was wrong in his premises, when he assumed that the debts due by these banks were in the nature of special deposits in their vaults. Of such special deposits, the proportion was very small. It was debts due by these banks, and not special deposits, which was the subject of this bill. In the case of the Bank of St. Louis, of the $152,000 due by that bank, no part was special deposit. It was a deposit of money in that bank, which, from the unfortunate management of its affairs, or rather from the unfortunate situation of the affairs of that part of the country, became unable to pay it. Mr. C. took a review of the manner in which these debts by the banks had arisen. Permanent deposits in certain of these banks, which Mr. C. enumerated, had been made in consequence of stipulations with the Treasury. They were authorized to receive the public moneys in their banks, and were required to make transmissions of it to such points as the Government might wish. The special deposit must be of very limited amount, because, in 1816, a resolution passed forbidding the receipt of any paper in payment on public account which could not be cashed at sight, &c. The deposits, then, had been cash, or paper of value equivalent to specie, and the banks are bound to pay the same to the Government. This bill ought not to pass in its present shape for various reasons, one of which was, that it authorized an indulgence to the banks on their securing the principal of their debt, thus giving up the interest altogether. This bill, besides, was unnecessary in any view, if the course heretofore pursued had been a proper one. The Secretary of the Treasury, who had draughted this bill asking permission to make arrangements for securing the future payment of this money, had been exercising this power since the year 1818. With the Bank of Steubenville he had made an arrangement to receive payment of the money due by them in instalments; and, in regard to the Bank of Vincennes, of the $168,000 due by that bank, the Secretary had received, in the exercise of the same power, the bonds of individuals to the amount of forty or fifty thousand dollars, and taken a mortgage on real property to secure the payment of the remainder. This same bank loaned to the State of Indiana a large sum of money, and the Governor gave bonds for the repayment of it; and these bonds had been transferred to the United States. The Governor of the State was ready to pay them off—but what in? In the paper of those very banks, which is not worth a farthing. And an arrangement had been authorized to be made with the Bank of Missouri, precisely of the sort proposed in this bill to be authorized. Why bring in a bill now to give authority to do a thing which has been done at all times heretofore without that authority? Why was the bill brought in, too, by one committee, when the subject had been specially referred to another? These banks, Mr. C. further observed, were, many of them, earnestly desirous to pay these debts. The Bank of Edwardsville was anxious to pay its debts, and was taking efficient means to pay it, having set apart double the amount of good and solvent paper to meet it.

[The SPEAKER had more than once observed, that debate on the main question was not in order on a question of postponement, and, submitting to this intimation, Mr. Cook here closed his remarks.]

Mr. TAYLOR then moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was agreed to.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by Mr. Gouverneur, his Secretary, who, by command of the President, returned to the House the enrolled bill passed by the two Houses, entitled "An act for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland Road," presented to the President for his approbation and signature on this day, to which bill the President, having made objections in writing, the same were also delivered in by the said Secretary at the Speaker's table; who thereupon withdrew.

The said objections were read, and are as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States.

Having duly considered the bill, entitled "An act for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland Road," it is with deep regret, approving, as I do, the policy, that I am compelled to object to its passage, and to return the bill to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, under a conviction that Congress do not possess the power, under the Constitution, to pass such a law.

A power to establish turnpikes, with gates and tolls, and to enforce the collection of tolls by penalties, implies a power to adopt and execute a complete system of internal improvement. A right to impose duties to be paid by all persons, passing a certain road, and on horses and carriages, as is done by this bill, involves the right to take the land from the proprietor, on a valuation, and to pass laws for the protection of the road from injuries; and, if it exist as to one road, it exists as to any other, and to as many roads as Congress may think proper to establish. A right to legislate for one of these purposes is a right to legislate for the others. It is a complete right of jurisdiction and sovereignty, for all the purposes of internal improvement, and not merely the right of applying money, under the power vested in Congress to make appropriations, under which power, with the consent of the States through which this road passes, the work was originally commenced, and has been so far executed. I am of opinion that Congress do not possess this power; that the States, individually, cannot grant it; for, although they may assent to the appropriation of money within their limits for such purposes, they can grant no power of jurisdiction or sovereignty by special compacts with the United States. This power can be granted only by an amendment to the Constitution, and in the mode prescribed by it.

If the power exist, it must be, either because it has been specifically granted to the United States, or that it is incidental to some power which has been specifically granted. If we examine the specific grants of power, we do not find it among them; nor is it incidental to any power which has been specifically granted.

It has never been contended that the power was specifically granted. It is claimed only as being incidental to some one or more of the powers which are specifically granted. The following are the powers from which it is said to be derived:

1st. From the right to establish post offices and post roads. 2d. From the right to declare war. 3d. To regulate commerce. 4th. To pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare. 5th. From the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. 6th, and lastly. From the power to dispose of, and make, all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory and other property of the United States.

According to my judgment, it cannot be derived from either of those powers, nor from all of them united, and in consequence it does not exist.

Having stated my objections to the bill, I should now cheerfully communicate at large the reasons on which they are founded, if I had time to reduce them to such form as to include them in this paper. The advanced stage of the session renders that impossible. Having, at the commencement of my service in this high trust, considered it a duty to express the opinion, that the United States do not possess the power in question, and to suggest, for the consideration of Congress, the propriety of recommending to the States an amendment to the Constitution, to vest the power in the United States, my attention has been often drawn to the subject since, in consequence whereof I have occasionally committed my sentiments to paper respecting it. The form which this exposition has assumed, is not such as I should have given it, had it been intended for Congress, nor is it concluded. Nevertheless, as it contains my views on this subject, being one which I deem of very high importance, and which, in many of its bearings, has now become pecu-

RELIEF BILLS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on a bill for the relief of Joshua Bennet; and, no amendment having been proposed thereto, the Committee reported the said bill to the House, and the same was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. LITTLE, by unanimous consent, reported a bill explanatory of the act for the relief of sundry inhabitants of Baltimore, which was, by general assent, read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The following bills were read a third time, and passed, viz: A bill for the relief of William N. Earle; a bill for the relief of Charles A. Swearingen; a bill for the relief of the heirs of Edward McCarty, deceased; a bill for the relief of Solomon Prevost; a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Girault; a bill for the relief of John Byers; a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Guthrie, deceased; a bill for the relief of Anthony Kennedy; and a bill for the relief of Sally Vance.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill vesting in the commissioners of the counties of Wood and Sandusky, their right to certain lots in the town of Perrysburg and Croghansville, in the State of Ohio, and for other purposes; a bill for the relief of Samuel Ewings; and a bill for the relief of William Dooley; and, after sundry amendments made thereto, the said bills were reported to the House. The reports of the Committee of the Whole were concurred in respectively, and the said bills were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

By general assent of the House, the bill for the relief of certain persons who have paid duty on goods imported into Castine, was taken up; and, after observations thereon by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, COCKE, WILLIAMSON, and TOD—

Mr. COCKE moved that the bill be laid on the table; which was agreed to—ayes 66.

On motion of Mr. ROCHESTER, (it being four o'clock,) a recess of the House, until six o'clock, was ordered.

Evening Sitting—Six o'clock.

Mr. SAWYER moved for the consideration of a resolution heretofore submitted by him, relative to an earlier meeting of the next session of Congress, than the time prescribed by law, but it was decided to be not in order.

On motion of Mr. RANKIN, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill requiring Surveyors General to give bond and security for the faithful disbursement of public money, and to limit their term of office. The blanks having been filled, and the bill gone through with, the Committee rose, and reported the same to the House, and the bill, with the amendments, was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Engrossed bills of the following titles: An act to incorporate the inhabitants of Georgetown, and to repeal all other acts heretofore passed for that purpose; An act for the relief of William Dooley; An act for the relief of John Crute; and An act for the relief of Samuel Ewings; were severally read the third time, and passed.

A bill for the relief of Robert Purdy, having been read a third time, after some remarks by Mr. MATROCKS against it, on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, was ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT said he voted in the majority in order to obtain the opportunity of moving to reconsider the vote, which he therefore did, and made a speech upon the subject, in favor of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR called for the previous question, which was sustained by the House—ayes 57, nays 42; and the main question, to reconsider the bill, being stated, Mr. BALDWIN called for the yeas and nays on the main question, but the House did not sustain the call.

The main question was put, Will the House reconsider the vote just passed? And it was decided in the negative—ayes 52, nays 74. So the bill lies upon the table.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to continue in force 'An act declaring the consent of Congress to acts of the State of South Carolina, authorizing the City Council of Charleston to impose and collect a duty on the tonnage of vessels from foreign ports; and to acts of the State of Georgia, authorizing the imposition and collection of a duty on the tonnage of vessels in the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's,' was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on a bill to incorporate the United States Naval Fraternal Association; a bill for the relief of Amos Muzzy and Benjamin White; a bill for the relief of John Post, and Farley Fuller; and a bill for the relief of John Matteson; after certain amendments to the first named bill, the same were reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed, except in the case of the United States' Fraternal Association, which bill, on motion of Mr. HARDIN, was ordered to be laid on the table—ayes 66.

[The ground of objection was against the exercise of the general power of incorporation which it proposes.]

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Edward Kinsey and William Smilie; a bill concerning certain invalid pensioners; a bill for the relief of James Brisbane and Jonah Lewis; and a bill for the relief of William Thompson; and after some amendment thereto had been adopted, the Committee rose, and reported the said bills to the House, where the same were respectively read and concurred in, and they were severally ordered to be engrossed.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, viz: An act requiring surveyors general to give bond and security for the faithful disbursement of public money, and limit their term of office; An act for the relief of Amos Muzzy and Benjamin White; An act for the relief of Edward Kinsey and William Smiley; An act for the relief of William Thompson; An act for the relief of John Post and Farley Fuller; and An act for the relief of John Matteson; were severally read the third time, and passed.

Penrose; a bill confirming the claims to certain lots in the town of Mobile and land claims in Florida; a bill for the relief of Susan Berzat, widow and the legal representative of the late Gabriel Berzat, deceased; a bill for the relief of James Pierce; and a bill for the relief of Peter Cadwell, and James Britten. The said bills having been gone through with, were reported to the House and concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, &c., except the bill for the relief of Clement B. Penrose, which, on motion of Mr. McCoy, was ordered to be laid on the table.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on a bill for the relief of Charles Campbell; a bill for the relief of William Gwynn; a bill for the relief of Loudon Case; a bill for the relief of James Miller, John C. Elliott, and others, sureties of John H. Alley; which were gone through with, reported without amendment, concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, &c.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on a bill to authorize the Secretary of State to issue letters patent to Frederick S. Warburg, Richard Holden, John Garsed, and James Green; and no amendment having been ordered, thereto, the Committee reported the same, and the said bills were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, viz: An act for the relief of James Brisbane; An act for the relief of Susan Berzat, widow, and the legal representatives of Gabriel Berzat; An act for the relief of James Pierce; An act for the relief of Peter Cadwell and James Britten; An act for the relief of Charles Campbell; and, An act for the relief of James Miller, John C. Elliott, Noah Hampton, James Erwin, and Jonathan Hampton; were severally read the third time and passed.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Stephen Howard, Jr.; a bill for the relief of Joseph Bainbridge; a resolution authorizing the delivery of certain rifles to Captain Aikin's Volunteers; and a bill for the relief of Benjamin Desobry; which, after consideration thereof, were reported to the House without amendment, concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed.

Dutton, and others; and a bill for the relief of James Barron; which, having been gone through with, were reported to the House, concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on a bill relinquishing the right of the United States to certain lots of land in the town of Tuscaloosa; a bill concerning Abner L. Duncan; a bill for the relief of Henry Lee; and a bill for the relief of William R. Maddox; which, having been gone through with, were reported to the House. The bill concerning Abner L. Duncan was ordered to be laid on the table; and the bills for the relief of Henry Lee and William R. Maddox, were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The question was taken on engrossing the bill relinquishing the right and title of the United States to certain lots of ground to the President and Commissioners of the town of Tuscaloosa, in the State of Alabama, and passing the same to a third reading, and was determined in the negative; and so the said bill was rejected.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on a bill authorizing the payment of certain certificates; which, having been amended, was reported to the House, concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed.

An additional Message from the President of the United States, in relation to the Message this day presented on the subject of the Cumberland road, was received; and, on motion of Mr. Ross, was ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

The engrossed resolution to authorize the delivery of certain rifles promised to Captain Aikin's volunteers at the siege of Plattsburg, after some discussion, in which Messrs. INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

In the course of the day, the following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit the paper, alluded to in the Message of this day, on the subject of internal improvements.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, May 4, 1822.

Views of the President of the United States on the subject of Internal Improvements.

It may be presumed that the proposition relating to internal improvements, by roads and canals, which has been several times before Congress, will be taken into consideration again; either for the purpose of recommending to the States the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution, to vest the necessary power in the General Government, or to carry the system into effect, on the principle that the power has already been granted. It seems to be the prevailing opinion that great advantage would be derived from the exercise of such a power by Congress. Respecting the right, there is much diversity of sentiment. It is of the highest importance that this question should be settled. If the right exist, it ought forthwith to be exercised; if it does not exist, surely those who are friends to the power ought to unite in recommending an amendment to the Constitution to obtain it. I propose to examine this question.

The inquiry, confined to its proper objects, and within the most limited scale, is extensive. Our Government is unlike other Governments, both in its origin and form. In analyzing it, the differences in certain respects between it and those of other nations, ancient and modern, necessarily come into view. I propose to notice these differences, so far as they are connected with the object of inquiry and the consequences likely to result from them, varying in equal degree from those which have attended other Governments. The digression (if it may be so called) will in every instance be short, and the transition to the main object immediate and direct.

To do justice to the subject, it will be necessary to mount to the source of power in these States, and to pursue this power in its gradations and distribution among the several departments in which it is now vested. The great division is between the State governments and the General Government. If there was a perfect accord in every instance as to the precise extent of the powers granted to the General Government, we should then know with equal certainty what were the powers which remained to the State governments; since it would follow, that those which were not granted to the one would remain to the other. But it is on this point, and particularly respecting the construction of these powers and their incidents, that a difference of opinion exists; and hence it is necessary to trace distinctly the origin of each government, the purposes intended by it, and the means adopted to accomplish them. By having the interior of both governments fully before us, we shall have all the means which can be afforded to enable us to form a correct opinion of the endowments of each.

Before the Revolution, the present States (then colonies) were separate communities, unconnected with each other, except in their common relation to the Crown. Their governments were instituted by grants from the Crown, which operated, according to the conditions of each grant, in the nature of a compact between the settlers in each colony and the Crown. All power not retained in the Crown was vested exclusively in the colonies. Each having a government consisting of an executive, a judiciary, and a legislative assembly—one branch of which was, in every instance, elected by the people. No office was hereditary, nor did any title under the Crown give rank or office in any of the colonies. In resisting the encroachments of the parent country, and abrogating the power of the Crown, the authority which had been held by it vested exclusively in the people of the colonies. By them was a Congress appointed, composed of delegates from each colony, who managed the war, declared independence, treated with foreign Powers, and acted in all things according to the sense of their constituents. The Declaration of Independence confirmed in form what had before existed in substance. It announced to the world new States, possessing and exercising complete sovereignty, which they were resolved to maintain. They were soon after recognised by France and other Powers, and finally by Great Britain herself in 1783.

Soon after the power of the Crown was annulled, the people of each colony established a constitution or frame of government for themselves: in which these separate branches, Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary, were instituted, each independent of the others. To these branches, each having its appropriate portion, the whole power of the people, not delegated to Congress, was communicated; to be exercised for their advantage, on the representative principle, by persons of their appointment, or otherwise deriving their authority immediately from them, and holding their offices for stated terms. All the powers necessary for useful purposes, held by any of the strongest governments of the Old World, not vested in Congress, were imparted to these State governments, without other checks than such as are necessary to prevent abuse, in the form of fundamental declarations, or bills of right. The great difference between our governments and those of the Old World, consists in this: that the former, being representative, the persons who exercise their powers do it, not for themselves, or in their own right, but for the people; and, therefore, while they are in the highest degree efficient, they can never become oppressive. It is this transfer of the power of the people to representative and responsible bodies, in every branch, which constitutes the great improvement in the science of government, and forms the boast of our system. It combines all the advantages of every known government, without any of their disadvantages. It retains the sovereignty in the people, while it avoids the tumult and disorder incident to the exercise of that power by the people themselves. It possesses all the energy and efficiency of the most despotic governments, while it avoids all the oppressions and abuses inseparable from those governments.

In every stage of the conflict, from its commencement, until March, 1781, the powers of Congress were undefined, but of vast extent. The assemblies, or conventions, of the several colonies, being formed by representatives from every county in each colony, and the Congress by delegates from each colonial assembly, the powers of the latter, for general purposes, resembled those of the former, for local. They rested on the same basis, the people, and were complete for all the purposes contemplated. Never was a movement so spontaneous, so patriotic, so efficient. The nation exerted its whole faculties in support of its rights and of its independence, after the contest took that direction, and it succeeded. It was, however, foreseen, at a very early stage, that, although the patriotism of the country might be relied on in the struggle for its independence, a well digested compact would be necessary to preserve it, after obtained. A plan of confederation was, in consequence, proposed and taken into consideration by Congress, even at the moment when the other great act which severed them from Great Britain, and declared their independence, was proclaimed to the world. This compact was ratified on the 21st March, 1781, by the last State, and thereupon carried into immediate effect.

The following powers were vested in the United States by the Articles of Confederation. As this, the first bond of union, was in operation nearly eight years, during which time a practical construction was given to many of its powers, all of which were adopted in the Constitution, with important additions, it is thought that a correct view of those powers, and of the manner in which they are executed, may shed light on the subject under consideration. It may fairly be presumed, that where certain powers were transferred from one instrument to the other, and in the same terms, or terms descriptive only of the same powers, that it was intended that they should be construed in the same sense in the latter, that they were in the former.

Article 1 declares that the style of the confederacy shall be, the United States of America.

Art. 2. Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power and right which is not expressly delegated to the United States.

Art. 3. The States severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other, for their common defence, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other against all force offered to, or attacks made upon, them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, &c.

Art. 4. The free inhabitants of each State, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice, excepted, shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States, &c. Fugitives from justice into any of the States, shall be delivered up on the demand of the Executive of the State from which they fled. Full faith and credit shall be given, in each State, to the records and acts of every other State.

Art. 5. Delegates shall be annually appointed, by the Legislature of each State, to meet in Congress on the first Monday in November, with a power to recall, &c. No State shall appoint less than two, nor more than seven, nor shall any delegate hold his office for more than three in six years. Each State shall maintain its own delegates. Each State shall have one vote. Freedom of speech shall not be impeached, and the members shall be protected from arrests, except for treason, &c.

Art. 6. No State shall send or receive an embassy, or enter into a treaty with a foreign Power. Nor shall any person, holding any office of profit or trust under the United States, or any State, accept any present, emolument, office, or title, from a foreign Power. Nor shall the United States, or any State, grant any title of nobility. No two States shall enter into any treaty without the consent of Congress. No State shall lay any imposts, or duties, which may interfere with any treaties entered into by the United States. No State shall engage in war, unless it be invaded or menaced with invasion by some Indian tribe; nor grant letters of marque or reprisal, unless it be against pirates, nor keep up vessels of war, nor any body of troops, in time of peace, without the consent of Congress; but every State shall keep up a well regulated militia, &c.

Art. 7. When land forces are raised by any State for the common defence, all officers of, and under, the rank of colonel, shall be appointed by the Legislature of each State.

Art. 8. All charges of war, and all other expenses which shall be incurred for the common defence or general welfare, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury; which shall be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the value of all the land in each State, granted to individuals. The taxes for paying each proportion shall be levied by the several States.

Art. 9. Congress shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war, except in the cases mentioned in the sixth article; of sending and receiving ambassadors, entering into alliances, except, &c.; of establishing rules for deciding what captures on land and water shall be legal; of granting letters of marque and reprisal in time of peace; appointing courts for the trial of piracies and felonies on the high seas; for deciding controversies between the States, and between individuals claiming lands under two or more States, whose jurisdiction has been adjusted; of regulating the alloy and value of coin struck by their authority, and of foreign coin; fixing the standard of weights and measures; regulating the trade with the Indians; establishing and regulating post offices from one State to another, and throughout all the States, and exacting such postage as may be requisite to defray the expenses of the office; of appointing all officers of the land forces, except the regimental; appointing all the officers of the naval forces; to ascertain the necessary sums of money to be raised for the service of the United States, and appropriate the same; to borrow money, and emit bills of credit; to build and equip a navy; to agree on the number of land forces, and to make requisitions on each State for its quota; that the assent of nine States shall be requisite to these great acts.

Art. 10 regulates the powers of the Committee of the States, to sit in the recess of Congress.

Art. 11 provides for the admission of Canada into the Confederation.

Art. 12 pledges the faith of the United States for the payment of all bills of credit issued, and money borrowed, on their account.

Art. 13. Every State shall abide by the determination of the United States, on all questions submitted to them by the Confederation. The Articles of the Confederation to be perpetual, and not to be altered without the consent of every State.

This bond of union was soon found to be utterly incompetent to the purposes intended by it. It was defective in its powers; it was defective, also, in the means of executing the powers actually granted by it. Being a league of sovereign and independent States, its acts, like those of all other leagues, required the interposition of the States composing it, to give them effect within their respective jurisdictions. The acts of Congress, without the aid of State laws to enforce them, were altogether nugatory. The refusal, or omission, of one State, to pass such laws, was urged as a reason to justify like conduct in others, and thus the Government was soon at a stand.

The experience of a few years demonstrated that the Confederation could not be relied on, for the security of the blessings which had been derived from the Revolution. The interests of the nation required a more efficient Government, which the good sense and virtue of the people provided, by the adoption of the present Constitution.

The Constitution of the United States was formed by a Convention of Delegates from the several States, who met in Philadelphia, duly authorized for the purpose, and it was ratified by a Convention in each State, which was especially called to consider and decide on the same. In this progress the State governments were never suspended in their functions. On the contrary, they took the lead in it. Conscious of their incompetency to secure to the Union the blessings of the Revolution, they promoted the diminution of their own powers, and the enlargement of those of the General Government in the way in which they might be most adequate and efficient. It is believed that no other example can be found of a Government exerting its influence to lessen its own powers; of a policy so enlightened, of a patriotism so pure and disinterested. The credit, however, is more especially due to the people of each State, in obedience to whose will, and under whose control, the State Governments acted.

The Constitution of the United States being ratified by the people of the several States, became, of necessity, to the extent of its powers, the paramount authority of the Union. On sound principles it can be viewed in no other light. The people, the highest authority known to our system, from whom all our institutions spring, and on whom they depend, formed it. Had the people of the several States thought proper to incorporate themselves into one community, under one Government, they might have done it. They had the power, and there was nothing then, nor is there any thing now, should they be so disposed, to prevent it. They wisely stopped, however, at a certain point, extending the incorporation to that point, making the National Government, thus far, a consolidated Government, and preserving the State governments, without that limit, perfectly sovereign and independent of the National Government. Had the people of the several States incorporated themselves into one community, they must have remained such; their Constitution becoming then, like the constitution of the several States, incapable of change, until altered by the will of the majority. In the institution of a State government by the citizens of a State a compact is formed, to which all and every citizen are equal parties. They are also the sole parties, and may amend it at pleasure. In the institution of the Government of the United States, by the citizens of every State, a compact was formed between the whole American people, which has the same force, and partakes of all the qualities, to the extent of its powers, as a compact between the citizens of a State, in the formation of their own constitution. It cannot be altered, except by those who formed it, or in the mode prescribed by the parties to the compact itself.

This Constitution was adopted for the purpose of remedying all defects of the Confederation, and in this it has succeeded, beyond any calculation that could have been formed of any human institution. By binding the States together, the Constitution performs the great office of the Confederation, but it is in that sense only that it has any of the properties of that compact; and in that it is more effectual to the purpose, as it holds them together by a much stronger bond, and in all other respects, in which the Confederation failed, the Constitution has been blessed with complete success. The Confederation was a compact between separate and independent States; the execution of whose articles, in the powers which operated internally, depended on the State governments. But the great office of the Constitution, by incorporating the people of the several States to the extent of its powers into one community, and enabling it to act directly on the people, was to annul the powers of the State governments to that extent, except in cases where they were concurrent, and to preclude their agency in giving effect to those of the General Government. The Government of the United States relies on its own means for the execution of its powers, as the State governments do for the execution of theirs; both governments having a common origin, or sovereign, the people; the State governments the people of each State, the National Government the people of every State, and being amenable to the power which created it. It is by executing its functions as a Government, thus originating and thus acting, that the Constitution of the United States holds the States together, and performs the office of a league. It is owing to the nature of its powers, and the high source from whence they are derived, the people, that it performs that office better than the Confederation, or any league which ever existed, being a compact which the State governments did not form, to which they are not parties, and which executes its own powers independently of them.

There were two separate and independent governments established over our Union, one for local purposes over each State, by the people of the State; the other for national purposes over all the States, by the people of the United States. The whole power of the people, on the representative principle, is divided between them. The State governments are independent of each other, and to the extent of their powers are complete sovereignties. The National Government begins where the State governments terminate, except in some instances where there is a concurrent jurisdiction between them. This Government is, also, according to the extent of its powers, a complete sovereignty. I speak here, as repeatedly mentioned before, altogether of representative sovereignties, for the real sovereignty is in the people alone.

The history of the world affords no such example of two separate and independent governments established over the same people, nor can it exist, except in governments founded on the sovereignty of the people. In monarchies, and other governments not representative, there can be no such division of power. The Government is inherent in the possessor; it is his, and cannot be taken from him without a revolution. In such Governments, alliances and leagues alone are practicable. But with us individuals count for nothing in the offices which they hold; that is, they have no right to them. They hold them as representatives, by appointment from the people, in whom the sovereignty is exclusively vested. It is impossible to speak too highly of this system, taken in its two-fold character, and in all its great principles of two governments, completely distinct from and independent of each other; each constitutional, founded by, and acting directly on the people; each competent to all its purposes, administering all the blessings for which it was instituted, without even the most remote danger of exercising any of its powers in a way to oppress the people. A system capable of expansion over a vast territory, not only without weakening either government, but enjoying the peculiar advantage of adding, thereby, new strength and vigor to the faculties of both; possessing also this additional advantage, that, while the several States enjoy all the rights reserved to them, of separate and independent governments, and each is secured by the nature of the Federal Government, which acts directly on the people against the failure of the others, to bear their equal share of the public burdens, and thereby enjoys, in a more perfect degree, all the advantages of a league; it holds them together by a bond, altogether different and much stronger than the late Confederation, or any league that was ever known before; a bond beyond their control, and which cannot even be amended, except in the mode prescribed by it. So great an effort in favor of human happiness was never made before, but it became those who made it. Established in the new hemisphere; descended from the same ancestors; speaking the same language; having the same religion and universal toleration; born equal, and educated in the same principles of free government; made independent by a common struggle, and menaced by the same dangers; ties existed between them which never applied before to separate communities. They had every motive to bind them together, which could operate on the interests and affections of a generous, enlightened, and virtuous people; and it affords inexpressible consolation to find that these motives had their merited influence.

In thus tracing our institutions to their origin, and pursuing them in their progress and modifications, down to the adoption of this Constitution, two important facts have been disclosed, on which it may not be improper, in this stage, to make a few observations. The first is, that, in wresting the power, or what is called the sovereignty, from the Crown, it passed directly to the people. The second, that it passed directly to the people of each colony, and not to the people of all the colonies, in the aggregate; to thirteen distinct communities, and not to one. To these two facts, each contributing its equal proportion, I am inclined to think that we are, in an eminent degree, indebted for the success of our Revolution. By passing to the people, it vested in a community, every individual of which had equal rights, and a common interest. There was no family dethroned among us; no banished pretender in a foreign country, looking back to his connexions and adherents here, in the hope of a recall; no order of nobility, whose hereditary rights in the Government had been violated; no hierarchy, which had been degraded and oppressed. There was but one order, that of the people, by whom every thing was gained by the change. I mention it also as a circumstance of peculiar felicity, that the great body of the people had been born and educated under these equal and original institutions. Their habits, their principles, and their prejudices, were, therefore, all on the side of the Revolution, and of free Republican Government.

Had distinct orders existed, our fortune might, and probably would, have been different. It would scarcely have been possible to have united, so completely, the whole force of the country against a common enemy. A contest would probably have arisen in the outset, between the orders, for the control. Had the aristocracy prevailed, the people would have been heartless. Had the people prevailed, the nobility would probably have left the country, or, remaining behind, internal divisions would have taken place in every State, and a civil war broken out more destructive even than the foreign, which might have defeated the whole movement. Ancient and modern history is replete with examples proceeding from conflicts between distinct orders; of revolutions attempted, which proved abortive; of Republics, which have terminated in despotism. It is owing to the simplicity of the elements of which our system is composed, that the attraction of all the parts has been to a common centre; that every change has tended to cement the Union; and, in short, that we have been blessed with such glorious and happy success.

And that the power wrested from the British Crown passed to the people of each colony, the whole history of our political movement, from the emigration of our ancestors to the present day, clearly demonstrates. What produced the Revolution? The violation of our rights. What rights? Our chartered rights. To whom were the charters granted? To the people of each colony, or to the people of all the colonies as a single community? We know that no such community as the aggregate existed; and, of course, that no such rights could be violated. It may be added that the nature of the powers which were given to the delegates by each colony, and the manner in which they were executed, show that the sovereignty was in the people of each, and not in the aggregate. They respectively presented credentials, such as are usual between Ministers of separate Powers, which were examined and approved, before they entered on the discharge of the important duties committed to them. They voted, also, by colonies, and not individually; all the members from one colony being entitled to one vote only. This fact, alone, the first of our political association, and at the period of our greatest peril, fixes, beyond all controversy, the source from whence the power which has directed and secured success to all our measures, has proceeded.

Had the sovereignty passed to the aggregate, consequences might have ensued, admitting the success of our Revolution, which might, even yet, seriously affect our system. By passing to the people of each colony, the opposition to Great Britain, the prosecution of the war, the Declaration of Independence, the adoption of the Confederation, and of this Constitution, are all imputable to them. Had it passed to the aggregate, every measure would be traced to that source; even the State governments might be said to have emanated from it, and amendments of their constitutions, on that principle, be proposed by the same authority. In short, it is not easy to perceive all the consequences into which such a doctrine might lead. It is obvious, that the people, in mass, would have had much less agency in all the great measures of the revolution, and in those which followed, than they actually had, and proportionably less credit for their patriotism and services, than they are now entitled to and enjoy. By passing to the people of each colony, the whole body in each were kept in constant and active deliberation, on subjects of the highest national importance, and in the supervision of the conduct of all the public servants, in the discharge of their respective duties. Thus the most effectual guards were provided against abuses and dangers of every kind, which human ingenuity could devise, and the whole people rendered more competent to the self-government which, by an heroic exertion, they had acquired.

I will now proceed to examine the powers of the General Government, which, like the Governments of the several States, is divided into three branches, a legislative, executive, and judiciary, each having its appropriate share. Of these, the legislative, from the nature of its powers, all laws proceeding from it, and the manner of its appointment, its members being elected immediately by the people, is by far the most important. The whole system of the National Government may be said to rest, essentially, on the powers granted to this branch. They mark the limit within which, with few exceptions, all the branches must move in the discharge of their respective functions. It will be proper, therefore, to take a full and correct view of the powers granted to it.

By the 8th section of the first article of the Constitution, it is declared that Congress shall have power—

1st. To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States.

2d. To borrow money.

3d. To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

4th. To establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws respecting bankruptcies.

5th. To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures.

6th. To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States.

7th. To establish post offices and post roads.

8th. To promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

9th. To constitute tribunals inferior to the supreme court, to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the laws of nations.

10th. To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water.

11th. To raise and support armies.

12th. To provide and maintain a navy.

13th. To make rules for the government of the land and naval forces.

14th. To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

15th. To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be in the service of the United States, reserving to the States the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

16th. To exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatever, over such district, (not exceeding ten miles square,) as may, by the cession of particular States, and the acceptance of, by Congress, become the Seat of Government of the United States; and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same may be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings.

17th. And to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

To the other branches of the Government, the powers properly belonging to each, are granted. The President, in whom the executive power is vested, is made Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and Militia, when called into the service of the United States. He is authorized, with the advice and consent of the Senate, two-thirds of the members present concurring, to form treaties; to nominate, and, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers whose appointments are not otherwise provided for by law. He has power to grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States, except in cases of impeachment. It is made his duty to give to Congress, from time to time, information of the state of the Union; to recommend to their consideration such measures as he may judge necessary and expedient; to convene both Houses on extraordinary occasions; to receive ambassadors; and to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

The judicial power is vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may establish; and it is made to extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made under their authority. Cases affecting ambassadors and other public characters; cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; causes in which the United States are a party; between two or more States; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State, claiming grants of land under different States; between a State or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, are specially assigned to these tribunals.

Other powers have been granted, in other parts of the Constitution, which, although they relate to specific objects, unconnected with the ordinary administration, yet, as they form important features in the Government, and may shed useful light on the construction which ought to be given to the powers above enumerated, it is proper to bring into view.

By article one, section nine, clause first, it is provided that the migration or importation of such persons, as any of the States, now existing, shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1808, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation not exceeding ten dollars for each person.

By article 3, sec. 3, clause 1st, new States may be admitted by Congress into the Union, but that no new State shall be formed within the jurisdiction of another State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislature of the States concerned, as well as of the United States. And, by the next clause of the same article and section, power is vested in Congress to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States, with a proviso, that nothing in the Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

By article 4, sec. 4, the United States guaranty to every State a republican form of Government, and engage to protect each of them against invasion: and, on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence.

Of the other parts of the Constitution relating to power, some form restraints on the exercise of the powers granted to Congress, and others, on the exercise of the powers remaining to the States. The object, in both instances, is, to draw, more completely, the line between the two Governments, and also to prevent abuses by either. Other parts operate like conventional stipulations between the States, abolishing between them all distinctions, applicable to foreign Powers, and securing to the inhabitants of each State all the rights and immunities of citizens in the several States.

By the fifth article, it is provided, that Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention, for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid, as a part of the Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode may be proposed by Congress; provided that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal vote in the Senate, and that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808, shall affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article.

By the second section of the sixth article, it is declared, that the Constitution, and laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and, that the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the Constitution or laws of any State, to the contrary notwithstanding. This right in the National Government to execute its powers was indispensable to its existence. If the State Governments had not been restrained from encroaching on the powers vested in the National Government, the Constitution, like the Confederation, would soon have been set at naught; and it was not within the limit of the human mind to devise any plan for the accomplishment of the object, other than by making a National Constitution, which should be, to the extent of its powers, the supreme law of the land. This right in the National Government would have existed, under the Constitution, to the full extent provided for by this declaration, had it not been made. To prevent the possibility of a doubt, however, on so important a subject, it was proper to make the declaration.

Having presented above a full view of all the powers granted to the United States, it will be proper to look to those remaining to the States. It is by fixing the great powers, which are admitted to belong to each government, that we may hope to come to a right conclusion, respecting those in controversy between them. In regard to the National Government, this task was easy, because its powers were to be found in specific grants in the Constitution; but it is more difficult to give a detail of the powers of the State governments, as their constitutions, containing all powers granted by the people, not specifically taken from them by grants to the United States, cannot well be enumerated. Fortunately, a precise detail of all the powers remaining to the State governments, is not necessary in the present instance. A knowledge of their great powers, only, will answer every purpose contemplated, and respecting these there can be no diversity in opinion. They are sufficiently recognised and established by the Constitution of the United States itself. In designating the important powers of the State governments, it is proper to observe, first, that the territory contemplated by the Constitution belongs to each State, in its separate character, and not to the United States in their aggregate character. Each State holds territory according to its original charter, except in cases where cessions have been made to the United States by individual States. The United States had none when the Constitution was adopted, which had not been thus ceded to them, and which they held on the conditions on which such cession had been made. Within the individual States, it is believed, that they held not a single acre, but, if they did, it was as citizens held it, merely as private property. The territory acquired by cession, lying without the individual States, rests on a different principle, and is provided for by a separate and distinct part of the Constitution. It is the territory within the individual States, to which the Constitution, in its great principles, applies; and, it applies to such territory as the territory of a State, and not as that of the United States. The next circumstance to be attended to, is, that the people composing this Union are the people of the several States, and not of the United States, in the full sense of a consolidated Government. The militia are the militia of the several States; lands are held under the laws of the States; descents, contracts, and all the concerns of private property, the administration of justice, and the whole criminal code, except in the cases of breaches of the laws of the United States, made under, and in conformity with, the powers vested in Congress, and of the laws of nations, are regulated by State laws. This enumeration shows the great extent of the powers of the State governments. The territory and the people form the basis on which all governments are founded. The militia constitutes their effective force. The regulation and protection of property, and of personal liberty, are also among the highest attributes of sovereignty. This, without other evidence, is sufficient to show that the great office of the Constitution of the United States is, to unite the States together, under a Government endowed with powers adequate to the purposes of its institution, relating, directly or indirectly, to foreign concerns, to the discharge of which, a National Government, thus formed, alone, could be competent.

This view of the exclusive jurisdiction of the several States over the territory within their respective limits, except in cases otherwise specially provided for, is supported by the obvious intent of the several powers granted to Congress, to which a more particular attention is now due. Of these, the right to declare war is perhaps the most important, as well by the consequences attending war, as by the other powers granted in aid of it. The right to lay taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, though necessary for the support of the civil government, is equally necessary to sustain the charges of war; the right to raise and support armies, and a navy, and to call forth and govern the militia when in the service of the United States, are altogether of the latter kind. They are granted in aid of the power to make war, and intended to give effect to it. These several powers are of great force and extent, and operate more directly within the limits, and upon the resources of the States, than any of the other powers. But still they are means only for given ends. War is declared, and must be maintained. An army and a navy must be raised; fortifications must be erected for the common defence; debts must be paid. For these purposes duties, imposts, and excises, are levied; taxes are laid; the lands, merchandise, and other property, of the citizens are liable for them; if the money is not paid, seizures are made, and the lands are sold. The transaction is terminated; the lands pass into other hands, who hold them as the former proprietors did, under the laws of the individual States. They were means only to certain ends; the United States have nothing further to do with them. The same view is applicable to the power of the General Government over persons. The militia is called into the service of the United States; the service is performed; the corps returns to the State to which it belongs; it is the militia of such State, and not of the United States. Soldiers are required for the army, who may be obtained by voluntary enlistment, or by some other process, founded in the principles of equality. In either case, the citizen, after the tour of duty is performed, is restored to his former station in society, with his equal share in the common sovereignty of the nation. In all these cases, which are the strongest which can be given, we see that the right of the General Government is nothing more than what it is called in the Constitution, a power to perform certain acts; and that the subject on which it operates is a mean only to that end; that it was, both before and after that act, under the protection, and subject to the laws, of the individual State within which it was.

To the other powers of the General Government the same remarks are applicable, and with greater force. The right to regulate commerce with foreign Powers was necessary, as well to enable Congress to lay and collect duties and imposts, as to support the rights of the nation in the intercourse with foreign Powers. It is executed at the ports of the several States, and operates almost altogether externally. The right to borrow and coin money, and to fix its value, and that of foreign coin, are important to the establishment of a national government, and particularly necessary in support of the right to declare war; as, indeed, may be considered the right to punish piracy and felonies on the high seas, and offences against the laws of nations. The right to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws respecting bankruptcies, seems to be essentially connected with the right to regulate commerce. The first branch of it relates to foreigners entering the country; the second to merchants who have failed. The right to promote the progress of useful arts and sciences may be executed without touching any of the individual States. It is accomplished by granting patents to inventors, and preserving models, which may be done exclusively within the Federal district. The right to constitute courts inferior to the Supreme Court, was a necessary consequence of the judiciary existing as a separate branch of the General Government. Without such inferior court in every State, it would be difficult, and might even be impossible, to carry into effect the laws of the General Government. The right to establish post offices and post roads is essentially of the same character. For political, commercial, and social purposes, it was important that it should be vested in the General Government. As a mere matter of regulation, and nothing more, I presume, was intended by it, it is a power easily executed, and involving little authority within the States individually. The right to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over the Federal district, and over forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings, with the consent of the State within which the same may be, is a power of a peculiar character, and is sufficient in itself to confirm what has been said of all the other powers of the General Government. Of this particular grant, further notice will hereafter be taken.

I shall conclude my remarks on this part of the subject by observing that the view which has been presented of the powers and character of the two Governments is supported by the marked difference which is observable in the manner of their endowment. The State governments are divided into three branches, a legislative, executive, and judiciary; and the appropriate duties of each assigned to it, without any limitation of power, except such as is necessary to guard against abuse, in the form of bills of right. But, in instituting the National Government, an entire different principle was adopted and pursued. The Government itself is organized, like the State governments, into three branches, but its powers are enumerated and defined in the most precise form. The subject has already been too fully explained to require illustration by a general view of the whole Constitution, every part of which affords proof of what is here advanced. It will be sufficient to advert to the eighth section of the first article, being that more particularly which defines the powers, and fixes the character, of the Government of the United States. By this section, it is declared that Congress shall have power,

1st. To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, &c.

Having shown the origin of the State governments, and their endowments, when first formed; having also shown the origin of the National Government, and the powers vested in it; and having shown, lastly, the powers which are admitted to have remained to the State governments, after those which were taken from them by the National Government, I will now proceed to examine whether the power to adopt and execute a system of internal improvement, by roads and canals, has been vested in the United States.

Before we can determine whether this power has been granted to the General Government, it will be necessary to ascertain, distinctly, the nature and extent of the power requisite to make such improvements. When that is done, we shall be able to decide whether such power is vested in the National Government.

If the power existed, it would, it is presumed, be executed by a board of skilful engineers, on a view of the whole Union, on a plan which would secure complete effect to all the great purposes of our Constitution. It is not my intention, however, to take up the subject here, on this scale. I shall state a case for the purpose of illustration only. Let it be supposed that Congress intended to run a road from the City of Washington to Baltimore, and to connect the Chesapeake Bay with the Delaware, and the Delaware with the Raritan, by a canal—what must be done to carry the project into effect? I make here no question of the existing power. I speak only of the power necessary for the purpose. Commissioners would be appointed to trace a route, in the most direct line, paying due regard to heights, water-courses, and other obstacles, and to acquire the right to the ground over which the road and canal would pass, with sufficient breadth for each. This must be done by voluntary grants, or by purchases from individuals, or, in case they would not sell, or should ask an exorbitant price, by condemning Internal Improvements.

the property and fixing its value by a jury of the vicinage. The next object to be attended to, after the road and canal are laid out and made, is to keep them in repair. We know that there are people in every community capable of committing voluntary injuries; of pulling down walls that are made to sustain the road; of breaking the bridges over water-courses, and breaking the road itself. Some living near it might be disappointed that it did not pass through their lands, and commit these acts of violence and waste, from revenge, or in the hope of giving it that direction, though for a short time. Injuries of this kind have been committed, and are still complained of, on the road from Cumberland to the Ohio. To accomplish this object Congress should have a right to pass laws to punish offenders, wherever they may be found. Jurisdiction over the road would not be sufficient, though it were exclusive. It would seldom happen that the parties would be detected in the act. They would generally commit it in the night, and fly far off before the sun appeared. The power to punish these culprits must, therefore, reach them wherever they go. They must, also, be amenable to competent tribunals, Federal or State. The power must likewise extend to another object, not less essential or important than those already mentioned. Experience has shown that the establishment of turnpikes, with gates and tolls, and persons to collect the tolls, is the best expedient that can be adopted to defray the expense of these improvements, and the repairs which they necessarily require. Congress must, therefore, have power to make such an establishment, and to support it, by such regulations, with fines and penalties, in the case of injuries, as may be competent to the purpose. The right must extend to all those objects, or it will be utterly incompetent. It is possessed and exercised by the States individually, and it must be possessed by the United States, or the pretension must be abandoned.

Let it be further supposed that Congress, believing that they do possess the power, have passed an act for those purposes, under which commissioners have been appointed, who have begun the work. They are met at the first farm on which they enter, by the owner, who forbids them to trespass on his land. They offer to buy it at a fair price, or at twice or thrice its value. He persists in his refusal. Can they, on the principle recognised and acted on by all the State governments, that, in cases of this kind, the obstinacy and perverseness of an individual must yield to the public welfare, summon a jury of upright and discreet men to condemn the land, value it, and compel the owner to receive the amount, and to deliver it up to them? I believe that very few would concur in the opinion that such a power exists.

The next object is, to preserve these improvements from injury. The locks of the canal are broken; the walls which sustained the road are pulled down; the bridges are broken; the road itself is ploughed up; toll is refused to be paid; the gates of the canal or turnpike are forced. The offenders are pursued, caught, and brought to trial. Can they be punished? The question of right must be decided on principle. The culprits will avail themselves of every barrier that may serve to screen them from punishment. They will plead that the law, under which they stand arraigned, is unconstitutional, and that question must be decided by the court, whether Federal or State, on a fair investigation of the powers vested in the General Government by the Constitution. If the judges find that these powers have not been granted to Congress, the prisoners must be acquitted; and, by their acquittal, all claim to the right to establish such a system is at an end.

I have supposed an opposition to be made to the right in Congress, by the owner of the land, and other individuals charged with breaches of laws, made to protect the works from injury, because it is the mildest form in which it can present itself. It is not, however, the only one. A State, also, may contest the right, and then the controversy assumes another character. Government might contend against Government; for, to a certain extent, both the Governments are sovereign and independent of each other, and in that form it is possible, though not probable, that opposition might be made. To each, limitations are prescribed, and should a contest rise between them, respecting their rights, and the people sustain it with any thing like an equal division of numbers, the worst consequences might ensue.

It may be urged that the opposition suggested by the owner of the land, or by the States individually, may be avoided by a satisfactory arrangement with the parties. But a suppression of opposition in that way, is no proof of a right in Congress; nor could it, if confined to that limit, remove all the impediments to the exercise of the power. It is not sufficient that Congress may, by the command and application of the public revenue, purchase the soil, and thus silence that class of individuals; or, by the accommodation afforded to individual States, put down opposition on their part. Congress must be able rightfully to control all opposition, or they cannot carry the system into effect. Cases would inevitably occur to put the right to the test. The work must be preserved from injury; tolls must be collected; offenders must be punished. With these culprits no bargain can be made. When brought to trial, they must deny the validity of the law, and that plea being sustained, all claim to the right ceases.

If the United States possess this power, it must be, either because it has been specifically granted, or that it is incidental, and necessary to carry into effect some specific grant. The advocates for the power derive it from the following sources: 1st. The right to establish post offices and post roads; 2d. To declare war; 3d. To regulate commerce among the several States; 4th. From the power to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; 5th. From the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof; 6th, and lastly. From the power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory and other property of the United States. It is to be observed, that there is but little accord among the advocates for this power, as to the particular source from whence it is derived. They all agree, however, in ascribing it to some one or more of those above mentioned. I will examine the ground of the claim in each instance.

The first of these grants is in the following words: "Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads." What is the just import of these words, and the extent of the grant? The word "establish" is the ruling term; "post offices and post roads" are the subjects on which it acts. The question, therefore, is, what power is granted by that word? The sense in which words are commonly used, is that in which they are to be understood in all transactions between public bodies and individuals. The intention of the parties is to prevail, and there is no better way of ascertaining it, than by giving to the terms used their ordinary import. If we were to ask any number of our most enlightened citizens, who had no connexion with public affairs, and whose minds were unprejudiced, what was the import of the word "establish," and the extent of the grant which it controls, we do not think there would be any difference of opinion among them. We are satisfied that all of them would answer, that a power was thereby given to Congress to fix on the towns, court-houses, and other places, throughout our Union, at which there should be post offices; the routes by which the mails should be carried from one post office to another, so as to diffuse intelligence as extensively, and to make the institution as useful as possible; to fix the postage to be paid on every letter and packet thus carried to support the establishment; and to protect the post office and mails from robbery, by punishing those who should commit the offence. The idea of a right to lay off the roads of the United States on a general scale of improvement; to take the soil from the proprietor by force; to establish turn-pikes and tolls, and to punish offenders in the manner stated above, would never occur to any such person. The use of the existing road by the stage, mail carrier, or post boy, in passing over it, as others do, is all that would be thought of; the jurisdiction and soil remaining to the State, with a right in the State, or those authorized by its Legislature, to change the road at pleasure.

The intention of the parties is supported by other proof, which ought to place it beyond all doubt. In the former act of Government—the Confederation—we find a grant for the same purpose expressed in the following words: "The United States in Congress assembled, shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of establishing and regulating post offices from one State to another, throughout the United States, and of exacting such postage on the papers passing through the same, as may be requisite to defray the expenses of said post office." The term

"establish" was likewise the ruling one in that instrument, and was evidently intended and understood to give a power simply and solely to fix where there should be post offices. By transferring this term from the Confederation into the Constitution, it was doubtless intended that it should be understood in the same sense in the latter that it was in the former instrument, and to be applied alike to post offices and post roads. In whatever sense it is applied to post offices, it must be applied in the same sense to post roads. But it may be asked, if such was the intention, why were not all the other terms of the grant transferred with it? The reason is obvious. The Confederation being a bond of union between independent States, it was necessary, in granting the powers which were to be exercised over them, to be very explicit and minute in defining the powers granted. But the Constitution, to the extent of its powers, having incorporated the States into one government, like the government of the States, individually, fewer words in defining the powers granted by it, were not only adequate, but perhaps better adapted to the purpose. We find that brevity is a characteristic of the instrument. Had it been intended to convey a more enlarged power in the Constitution than had been granted in the Confederation, surely the same controlling term would not have been used; or other words would have been added to show such intention, and to mark the extent to which the power should be carried. It is a liberal construction of the powers granted in the Constitution, by this term, to include in it all the powers that were granted in the Confederation, by terms which specifically defined and (as was supposed) extended their limits. It would be absurd to say that, by omitting from the Constitution any portion of the phraseology which was deemed important in the Confederation, the import of that term was enlarged, and with it the powers of the Constitution, in a proportional degree, beyond what they were in the Confederation. The right to exact postage and to protect the post offices and mails from robbery, by punishing the offenders, may fairly be considered as incidents to the grant, since, without it, the object of the grant might be defeated. Whatever is absolutely necessary to the accomplishment of the object of the grant, though not specified, may fairly be considered as included in it. Beyond this, the doctrine of incidental power cannot be carried.

If we go back to the origin of our settlements and institutions, and trace their progress down to the Revolution, we shall see that it was in this sense, and in none other, that the power was exercised by all our colonial governments. Post offices were made for the country, and not the country for them. They are the offspring of improvement. They never go before it. Settlements are first made; after which the progress is uniform and simple, extending to objects in regular order most necessary to the comfort of man; schools, places of public worship, court-houses, and markets; post offices follow. Roads may, indeed, be said to be coeval with settlements. They lead to all the places mentioned, and to every other which the various and complicated interests of society require.

It is believed that not one example can be given, from the first settlement of our country to the adoption of this Constitution, of a post office being established without a view to existing roads; or of a single road having been made by pavement, turnpike, &c., for the sole purpose of accommodating a post office. Such, too, is the uniform progress of all societies. In granting, then, this power to the United States, it was, undoubtedly, intended by the framers and ratifiers of the Constitution, to convey it in the sense and extent only in which it had been understood and exercised by the previous authorities of the country.

This conclusion is confirmed by the object of the grant, and the manner of its execution. The object is the transportation of the mail throughout the United States, which may be done on horseback, and was so done until lately, since the establishment of stages. Between the great towns, and in other places where the population is dense, stages are preferred, because they afford an additional opportunity to make a profit from passengers. But where the population is sparse, and on cross-roads, it is generally carried on horseback. Unconnected with passengers and other objects, it cannot be doubted that the mail itself may be carried in every part of our Union, with nearly as much economy and greater despatch on horseback than in a stage, and in many parts with much greater. In every part of the Union in which stages can be preferred, the roads are sufficiently good, provided those which serve for every other purpose will accommodate them. In every other part, where horses alone are used, if other people pass them on horseback surely the mail carrier can. For an object so simple, and so easy in its execution, it would, doubtless, excite surprise, if it should be thought proper to appoint commissioners to lay off the country on a great scheme of improvement, with the power to shorten distances, reduce heights, level mountains, and pave surfaces.

If the United States possessed the power contended for under this grant, might they not, in adopting the roads of the individual States for the carriage of the mail, as has been done, assume jurisdiction over them, and preclude a right to interfere with or alter them? Might they not establish turnpikes, and exercise all the other acts of sovereignty above stated, over such roads necessary to protect them from injury, and defray the expense of repairing them? Surely, if the right exists, these consequences necessarily followed, as soon as the road was established. The absurdity of such a pretension must be apparent to all who examine it. In this way a large portion of the territory of every State might be taken from it, for there is scarcely a road in any State which will not be used for the transportation of the mail. A new field for legislation and internal government would thus be opened.

From this view of the subject, I think we may fairly conclude, that the right to adopt and execute a system of internal improvement, or any part of it, has not been granted to Congress under the power to establish post offices and post roads; that the common roads of the country only were contemplated by that grant, and are fully competent to all its purposes.

The next object of inquiry is, whether the right to declare war includes the right to adopt and execute this system of improvement. The objections to it are, I presume, not less conclusive than those which are applicable to the grant which we have just examined.

Under the last mentioned grant, a claim has been set up to as much of that system as relates to roads. Under this, it extends alike to roads and canals.

We must examine this grant by the same rules of construction that were applied to the preceding one. The object was to take this power from the individual States, and to vest it in the General Government. This has been done in clear and explicit terms—first, by granting the power to Congress; and, secondly, by prohibiting the exercise of it by the States. Congress shall have a right to declare war. This is the language of the grant. If the right to adopt and execute this system of improvement is included in it, it must be by way of incident only, since there is nothing in the grant itself which bears any relation to roads and canals. The following considerations, it is presumed, prove, incontestably, that this power has not been granted in that or any other manner:

The United States are exposed to invasion through the whole extent of their Atlantic coast, by any European Power with whom we might be engaged in war; on the northern and northwestern frontier, on the side of Canada by Great Britain, and on the southern by Spain, or any Power in alliance with her. If internal improvements are to be carried to the full extent to which they may be useful for military purposes, the power as it exists must apply to all the roads of the Union, there being no limitation to it. Wherever such improvements may facilitate the march of troops, the transportation of cannon, or otherwise aid the operations or mitigate the calamities of war, along the coast or in any part of the interior, they would be useful for military purposes, and might, therefore, be made. The power following as an incident to another power can be measured, as to its extent, by reference only to the obvious extent of the power to which it is incidental. So great a scope was, it is believed, never given to incidental power.

If it had been intended that the right to declare war should include all the powers necessary to maintain war, it would follow that nothing would have been done to impair the right, or to restrain Congress from the exercise of any power which the exigencies of war might require. The nature and extent of this exigency would mark the extent of the power granted, which should always be construed liberally, so as to be adequate to the end. A right to raise money by taxes, duties, excises, and by loan; to raise and support armies and a navy; to provide for calling forth, arming, disciplining, and governing the militia when in the service of the United States; establishing fortifications, and governing the troops stationed in them, independently of the State authorities, and to perform many other acts, is indispensable to the maintenance of war. No war with any great Power can be prosecuted with success without the command of the resources of the Union in all these respects. These powers, then, would of necessity, and by common consent, have fallen within the right to declare war, had it been intended to convey, by way of incident to that right, the necessary powers to maintain war. But these powers have all been granted specifically, with many others, in great detail, which experience had shown were necessary for the purposes of war. By specifically granting, then, these powers, it is manifest that every power was thus granted which it was intended to grant for military purposes; and that it was also intended that no important power should be included in this grant by way of incident, however useful it might be for some of the purposes of the grant.

By the sixteenth of the enumerated powers, article 1, section 8, Congress are authorized to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatever over such district as may by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, not exceeding ten miles square, become the seat of the government of the United States; and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other useful buildings. If any doubt existed on a view of other parts of the Constitution respecting the decision which ought to be formed on the question under consideration, I should suppose that this clause would completely remove it. It has been shown, after the most liberal construction of all the enumerated powers of the General Government, that the territory within the limits of the respective States belonged to them; that the United States had no right, under the powers granted to them, with the exception specified in this grant, to any the smallest portion of territory within a State, all those powers operating on a different principle, and having their full effect without impairing, in the slightest degree, this right in the States; that those powers were in every instance means to ends, which, being accomplished, left the subject, that is, the property, in which light only, land could be regarded, where it was before—under the jurisdiction and subject to the laws of the State governments.

The second number of the clause, which is applicable to military and naval purposes alone, claims particular attention here. It fully confirms the view taken of the other enumerated powers; for, had it been intended to include in the right to declare war, by way of incident, any right of jurisdiction or legislation over territory within a State, it would have been done as to fortifications, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings. By specifically granting the right, as to such small portions of territory as might be necessary for these purposes, and on certain conditions, minutely and well defined, it is manifest that it was not intended to grant it, as to any other portion, on any condition, for any purpose, or in any manner whatsoever.

It may be said that, although the authority to exercise exclusive legislation in certain cases, within the States, with their consent, may be considered as a prohibition to Congress to exercise like exclusive legislation in any other case, although their consent should be granted, it does not prohibit the exercise of such jurisdiction or power, within a State, as would be competent to all the purposes of internal improvement. I can conceive no ground on which the idea of such a power over any part of the territory of a State can be inferred from the power to declare war. There never can be an occasion for jurisdiction for military purposes, except in fortifications, dock yards, and the like places. If the soldiers are in the field, or are quartered in garrisons without the fortifications, the civil authority must prevail where they are. The government of the troops by martial law is not affected by it. In war, when the forces are increased, and the movement is on a greater scale, consequences follow which are inseparable from the exigencies of the State. More freedom of action, and a wider range of power, in the military commanders, to be exercised on their own responsibility, may be necessary to the public safety; but, even here, the civil authority of the State never ceases to operate. It is also exclusive for all civil purposes.

Whether any power short of that stated, would be adequate to the purposes of internal improvement, is denied. In the case of territory, one government must prevail for all the purposes intended by the grant. The jurisdiction of the United States might be modified in such manner as to admit that of the State in all cases and for all purposes not necessary to the execution of the proposed power. But the right of the General Government must be complete for all the purposes above stated. It must extend to the seizure and condemnation of the property, if necessary; to the punishment of offenders for injuries to the roads and canals; to the establishment and enforcement of tolls, &c. It must be a complete right to the extent above stated, or it will be of no avail. That right does not exist.

The reasons which operate in favor of the right of exclusive legislation in forts, dock yards, &c., do not apply to any other places. The safety of such works, and of the cities which they are intended to defend, and even of whole communities, may sometimes depend on it. If spies are admitted within them in time of war, they might communicate intelligence to the enemy which might be fatal. All nations surround such works with high walls, and keep their gates shut. Even here, however, three important conditions are indispensable to such exclusive legislation: First, the ground must be requisite for, and be applied to, those purposes; second, it must be purchased; third, it must be purchased by the consent of the State in which it may be. When we find that so much care has been taken to protect the sovereignty of the States over the territory within their respective limits, admitting that of the United States over such small portions, and for such special and important purposes only, the conclusion is irresistible, not only that the power necessary for internal improvements has not been granted, but that it has been clearly prohibited.

I come next to the right to regulate commerce, the third source from whence the right to make internal improvements is claimed. It is expressed in the following words: "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." The reasoning applicable to the preceding claims is equally so to this. The mischief complained of was, that this power could not be exercised with advantage by the individual States, and the object was to transfer it to the United States. The sense in which the power was understood and exercised by the States, was doubtless that in which it was transferred to the United States. The policy was the same as to three branches of this grant, and it is scarcely possible to separate the two first from each other, in any view which may be taken of the subject. The last relating to the Indian tribes, is of a nature distinct from the others, for reasons too well known to require explanation. Commerce between independent Powers or communities, is universally regulated by duties and imposts. It was so regulated by the States before the adoption of this Constitution, equally in respect to each other and to foreign Powers. The goods and vessels employed in the trade are the only subjects of regulation. It can act on none other. A power, then, to impose such duties and imposts, in regard to foreign nations, and to prevent any on the trade between the States, was the only power granted.

If we recur to the causes which produced the adoption of this Constitution, we shall find that injuries resulting from the regulation of trade, by the States, respectively, and the advantages anticipated from the transfer of the power to Congress, were among those which had the most weight. Instead of acting as a nation in regard to foreign powers, the States, individually, had commenced a system of restraint on each other, whereby the interests of foreign Powers were promoted at their expense. If one State imposed high duties on the goods or vessels of a foreign Power, to countervail the regulations of such Power, the next adjoining States imposed lighter duties, to invite those articles into their ports, that they might be transferred thence into the other States, securing the duties to themselves. This contracted policy in some of the States was soon counteracted by others. Restraints were immediately laid on such commerce by the suffering States, and thus had grown up a state of affairs, disorderly and unnatural, the tendency of which, was, to destroy the Union itself, and with it, all hope of realizing those blessings, which we had anticipated from the glorious revolution which had been so recently achieved. From this deplorable dilemma, or rather certain ruin, we were happily rescued by the adoption of the Constitution.

Among the first and most important effects of this great revolution, was the complete abolition of this pernicious policy. The States were brought together by the Constitution, as to commerce, into one community, equally, in regard to foreign nations and each other. The regulations that were adopted, regarded us, in both respects, as one people. The duties and imposts that were laid on the vessels and merchandise of foreign nations, were all uniform throughout the United States, and, in the intercourse between the States themselves, no duties of any kind were imposed, other than between different ports and counties within the same State.

This view is supported by a series of measures, all of a marked character, preceding the adoption of the Constitution. As early as the year 1781, Congress recommended it to the States to vest in the United States a power to levy a duty of five per cent. on all goods imported from foreign countries into the United States, for the term of fifteen years. In 1783, this recommendation, with alterations as to the kind of duties, and an extension of this term to twenty-five years, was repeated, and more earnestly urged. In 1784, it was recommended to the States to authorize Congress to prohibit, under certain modifications, the importation of goods from foreign Powers into the United States for fifteen years. In 1785, the consideration of the subject was resumed, and a proposition presented in a new form, with an address to the States, explaining fully the principles on which a grant of the power to regulate trade was deemed indispensable. In 1786, a meeting took place at Annapolis, of delegates from several of the States, on this subject, and, on their report, a convention was formed at Philadelphia the ensuing year, from all the States, to whose deliberations we are indebted for the present Constitution.

In none of these measures was the subject of internal improvement mentioned, or even glanced at. Those of 1784, 5, 6, and 7, leading, step by step, to the adoption of the Constitution, had in view, only, the obtaining of a power to enable Congress to regulate trade with foreign Powers. It is manifest that the regulation of trade with the several States, was altogether a secondary object, suggested by and adopted in connexion with the other. If the power necessary to this system of improvement is included under either branch of this grant, I should suppose that it was the first, rather than the second. The pretension to it, however, under that branch has never been set up. In support of the claim, under the second, no reason has been assigned which appears to have the least weight.

The fourth claim is founded on the right of Congress to "pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare" of the United States. This claim has less reason on its side, than either of those which we have already examined. The power of which this forms a part is expressed in the following words: "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the "United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States."

That the second part of this grant gives a right to appropriate the public money, and nothing more, is evident, from the following considerations:

1. If the right of appropriation is not given by this clause, it is not given at all—there being no other grant in the Constitution which gives it directly, or which has any bearing on the subject, even by implication, except the two following: First, the prohibition which is contained in the eleventh of the enumerated powers not to appropriate money for the support of armies for a longer term than two years; and, second, the declaration of the sixth member or clause of the ninth section of the first article, that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law.

2. This part of the grant has none of the characteristics of a distinct and original power. It is manifestly incidental to the great objects of the first part of the grant, which authorizes Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises—a power of vast extent, not granted by the Confederation—the grant of which formed one of the principal inducements to the adoption of this Constitution. If both parts of the grant are taken together, (as they must be, for the one follows immediately after the other in the same sentence,) it seems to be impossible to give to the latter any other construction than that contended for. Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. For what purpose? To pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States—an arrangement and phraseology which clearly show that the latter part of the clause was intended to enumerate the purposes to which the money thus raised might be appropriated.

3. If this is not the real object and fair construction of the second part of this grant, it follows either that it has no import or operation whatever on one of much greater extent than the first part. This presumption is evidently groundless in both instances—in the first, because no part of the Constitution can be considered useless—no sentence or clause in it without a meaning. In the second, because such a construction as made the second part of the clause an original grant, embracing the same object with the first, but with much greater power than it, would be in the highest degree absurd. The order generally observed in grants—an order founded in common sense, since it promotes a clear understanding of their import—is to grant the power intended to be conveyed in the most full and explicit manner, and then to explain or qualify it, if explanation or qualification should be necessary. This order has, it is believed, been invariably observed, in all the grants contained in the Constitution. In the second, because, if the clause in question is not construed merely as an authority to appropriate the public money, it must be obvious that it conveys a power of indefinite and unlimited extent—that there would have been no use for the special powers to raise and support armies and a navy; to regulate commerce; to call forth the militia; or even to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. An unqualified power to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare, as the second part of this clause would be, if considered as a distinct and separate grant, would extend to every object in which the public could be interested. A power to provide for the common defence would give to Congress the command of the whole force, and of all the resources of the Union. But a right to provide for the general welfare would go much further. It would, in effect, break down all the barriers between the States and the General Government, and consolidate the whole under the latter.

The powers specifically granted to Congress, are what are called the enumerated powers, and are numbered in the order in which they stand, among which, that contained in the first clause, holds the first place in point of importance. If the power created by the latter part of the clause is considered an original grant, unconnected with, and independent of, the first, as in that case it must be, then the first part is entirely done away, as are all the other grants in the Constitution, being completely absorbed in the transcendent power granted in the latter part. But if the clause be construed in the sense contended for, then every part has an important meaning and effect; not a line, a word, in it, is superfluous. A power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, subjects to the call of Congress every branch of the public revenue, internal and external; and the addition to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare, gives the right of applying the money raised, that is, of appropriating it to the purposes specified, according to a proper construction of the terms. Hence, it follows, that it is the first part of the clause only which gives a power which affects in any manner the power remaining to the States; as the power to raise money from the people, whether it be by taxes, duties, imposts, or excises, though concurrent in the States, as to taxes and excises, must necessarily do. But the use or application of the money, after it is raised, is a power altogether of a different character. It imposes no burden on the people, nor can it act on them in a sense to take power from the States, or in any sense in which power can be controverted, or become a question between the two governments. The application of money raised under a lawful power, is a right or grant which may be abused. It may be applied partially among the States, or to improper purposes in our foreign and domestic concerns; but still it is a power not felt in the sense of other power, since the only complaint which any State can make of such partiality and abuse, is, that some other State or States have obtained greater benefit from the application, than by a just rule of apportionment they were entitled to. The right of appropriation is, therefore, from its nature, secondary and incidental to the right of raising money, and it was proper to place it in the same grant and same clause with that right. By finding them, then, in that order, we see a new proof of the sense in which the grant was made, corresponding with the view herein taken of it.

The last part of this grant, which provides that all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States, furnishes another strong proof that it was not intended that the second part should constitute a distinct grant, in the sense above stated, or convey any other right than that of appropriation. This provision operates exclusively on the power granted in the first part of the clause. It recites three branches of that power—duties, imposts, and excises—those only on which it could operate; the rule by which the fourth, that is, taxes, should be laid, being already provided for in another part of the Constitution. The object of this provision is to secure a just equality among the States in the exercise of that power by Congress. By placing it after both the grants, that is, after that to raise and that to appropriate the public money, and making it apply to the first only, it shows that it was not intended that the power granted in the second should be paramount to, and destroy, that granted in the first. It shows, also, that no such formidable power as that suggested had been granted in the second, or any power, against the abuse of which it was thought necessary specially to provide. Surely, if it was deemed proper to guard a specific power of limited extent and well known import, against injustice and abuse, it would have been much more so to have guarded against the abuse of a power of such vast extent, and so indefinite, as would have been granted by the second part of the clause, if considered as a distinct and original grant.

With this construction all the other enumerated grants, and indeed all the grants of power, contained in the Constitution, have their full operation and effect. They all stand well together, fulfilling the great purposes intended by them. Under it we behold a great scheme, consistent in all its parts, a Government instituted for national purposes, vested with adequate powers for those purposes, commencing with the most important of all, that of the revenue, and proceeding, in regular order, to the others, with which it was deemed proper to endow it, all too drawn with the utmost circumspection and care. How much more consistent is this construction, with the great objects of the institution, and with the high character of the enlightened and patriotic citizens who framed it, as well as of those who ratified it, than one which subverts every sound principle and rule of construction and throw every thing into confusion.

I have dwelt thus long on this part of the subject, from an earnest desire to fix, in a clear and satisfactory manner, the import of the second part of this grant, well knowing, from the generality of the terms used, their tendency to lead into error. I indulge a strong hope that the view herein presented will not be without effect, but will tend to satisfy the unprejudiced and impartial that nothing more was granted, by that part, than a power to appropriate the public money raised under the other part. To what extent that power may be carried will be the next object of inquiry.

It is contended, on the one side, that, as the National Government is a Government of limited powers, it has no right to expend money, except in the performance of acts authorized by the other specific grants, according to a strict construction of their powers; that this grant, in neither of its branches, gives to Congress discretionary power of any kind, but is a mere instrument, in its hands, to carry into effect the powers contained in the other grants. To this construction I was inclined in the more early stage of our Government; but, on further reflection and observation, my mind has undergone a change, for reasons which I will frankly unfold.

The grant consists, as heretofore observed, of a two-fold power; the first to raise, the second to appropriate, the public money, and the terms used in both instances are general and unqualified. Each branch was obviously drawn with a view to the other, and the import of each tends to illustrate that of the other. The grant to raise money, gives a power over every subject from which revenue may be drawn, and is made in the same manner with the grants to declare war, to raise and support armies and a navy, to regulate commerce, to establish post offices and post roads, and with all the other specific grants to the General Government. In the discharge of the powers contained in any of these grants, there is no other check, than that which is to be found in the great principles of our system, the responsibility of the Representative to his constituents. If war, for example, is necessary, and Congress declare it for good cause, their constituents will support them in it. A like support will be given them for the faithful discharge of their duties under any and every other power vested in the United States. It affords to the friends of our free governments the most heart-felt consolation to know, and from the best evidence, our own experience, that, in great emergencies, the boldest measures, such as form the strongest appeals to the virtue and patriotism of the people, are sure to obtain the most decided approbation. But should the Representative act corruptly, and betray his trust, or otherwise prove that he was unworthy of the confidence of his constituents, he would be equally sure to lose it, and to be removed and otherwise censured, according to his deserts. The power to raise money by taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, is alike unqualified, nor do I see any check on the exercise of it, other than that which applies to the other powers above recited, the responsibility of the Representative to his constituents. Congress know the extent of the public engagements, and the sums necessary to meet them; they know how much may be derived from each branch of revenue without pressing it too far; and, paying due regard to the interests of the people, they likewise know which branch ought to be resorted to, in the first instance. From the commencement of the Government, two branches of this power, duties and imposts, have been in constant operation, the revenue from which has supported the Government in its various branches, and met its other ordinary engagements. In great emergencies, the other two, taxes and excises, have likewise been resorted to, and neither was the right or the policy ever called in question.

If we look to the second branch of this power, that which authorizes the appropriation of the money thus raised, we find that it is not less general and unqualified than the power to raise it. More comprehensive terms than to "pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare," could not have been used. So intimately connected with and dependent on each other are these two branches of power, that, had either been limited, the limitation would have had the like effect on the other. Had the power to raise money been conditional, or restricted to special purposes, the appropriation must have corresponded with it, for none but the money raised could be appropriated, nor could it be appropriated to other purposes than those which were permitted. On the other hand, if the right of appropriation had been restricted to certain purposes, it would be useless and improper to raise more than would be adequate to those purposes. It may fairly be inferred these restraints or checks have been carefully and intentionally avoided. The power, in each branch, is alike broad and unqualified, and each is drawn with peculiar fitness to the other; the latter requiring terms of great extent and force to accommodate the former, which have been adopted, and both placed in the same clause and sentence. Can it be presumed that all these circumstances were so nicely adjusted by mere accident? Is it not more just to conclude that they were the result of due deliberation and design? Had it been intended that Congress should be restricted in the appropriation of the public money to such expenditures as were authorized by a rigid construction of the other specific grants, how easy would it have been to have provided for it by a declaration to that effect. The omission of such declaration is, therefore, an additional proof that it was not intended that the grant should be so construed.

It was evidently impossible to have subjected this grant, in either branch, to such restriction, without exposing the Government to very serious embarrassment. How carry it into effect? If the grant had been made in any degree dependent upon the States, the Government would have experienced the fate of the Confederation. Like it, it would have withered and soon perished. Had the Supreme Court been authorized, or should any other tribunal, distinct from the Government, be authorized, to impose its veto, and to say that more money had been raised under either branch of this power, that is, by taxes, duties, imposts, or excises, than was necessary; that such a tax or duty was useless; that the appropriation to this or that purpose was unconstitutional—the movement might have been suspended, and the whole system disorganized. It was impossible to have created a power within the Government, or any other power, distinct from Congress and the Executive, which should control the movement of the Government in this respect, and not destroy it. Had it been declared, by a clause in the Constitution, that the expenditures under this grant should be restricted to the construction which might be given of the other grants, such restraint, though the most innocent, could not have failed to have had an injurious effect on the vital principles of the Government, and often on its most important measures. Those who might wish to defeat a measure proposed, might construe the power relied on in support of it in a narrow and contracted manner, and in that way fix a precedent inconsistent with the true import of the grant. At other times, those who favored a measure, might give to the power relied on a forced or strained construction, and, succeeding in the object, fix a precedent in the opposite extreme. Thus it is manifest that, if the right of appropriation be confined to that limit, measures may oftentimes be carried or defeated by considerations and motives altogether independent of, and unconnected with their merits, and the several powers of Congress receive constructions equally inconsistent with their true import. No such declaration, however, has been made, and from the fair import of the grant, and, indeed, its positive terms, the inference that such was intended seems to be precluded.

Many considerations of great weight operate in favor of this construction, while I do not perceive any serious objections to it. If it be established, it follows that the words "to provide for the common defence and general welfare," have a definite, safe, and useful meaning. The idea of their forming an original grant, with unlimited power, superseding every other grant, is abandoned. They will be considered, simply, as conveying a right of appropriation; a right indispensable to that of raising a revenue, and necessary to expenditures under every grant. By it, as already observed, no new power will be taken from the States, the money to be appropriated being raised under a power already granted to Congress. By it, too, the motive for giving a forced or strained construction to any of the other specific grants will, in most instances be diminished, and in many utterly destroyed. The importance of this consideration cannot be too highly estimated, since, in addition to the examples already given, it ought particularly to be recollected that, to whatever extent any specified power may be carried, the right of jurisdiction goes with it, pursuing it through all its incidents. The very important agency which this grant has in carrying into effect every other grant, is a wrong argument in favor of the construction contended for. All the other grants are limited by the nature of the offices which they have severally to perform, each conveying a power to do a certain thing, and that only, whereas this is co-extensive with the great scheme of the Government itself. It is the lever which raises and puts the whole machinery in motion, and continues the movement. Should either of the other grants fail, in consequence of any condition or limitation attached to it, or misconstruction of its powers, much injury might follow, but still it would be the failure of one branch of power, of one item in the system only. All the others might move on. But should the right to raise and appropriate the public money be improperly restricted, the whole system might be sensibly affected, if not disorganized. Each of the other grants is limited by the nature of the grant itself. This, by the nature of the Government only. Hence, it became necessary, that, like the power to declare war, this power should be commensurate with the great scheme of the Government, and with all its purposes.

If then the right to raise and appropriate the public money is not restricted to the expenditures under the other specific grants, according to a strict construction of their powers, respectively, is there no limitation to it? Have Congress a right to raise and appropriate the money to any, and to every purpose, according to their will and pleasure? They certainly have not. The Government of the United States is a limited Government, instituted for great national purposes, and for those only. Other interests are committed to the States, whose duty it is to provide for them. Each Government should look to the great and essential purposes for which it was instituted, and confine itself to those purposes. A State government will rarely, if ever, apply money to national purposes, without making it a charge to the nation. The people of the State would not permit it. Nor will Congress be apt to apply money in aid of the State administrations, for purposes strictly local, in which the nation at large has no interest, although the State should desire it. The people of the other States would condemn it. They would declare that Congress had no right to tax them for such a purpose, and dismiss, at the next election, such of their representatives as had voted for the measure, especially if it should be severely felt. I do not think that in offices of this kind, there is much danger of the two Governments mistaking their interests or their duties. I rather expect that they would soon have a clear and distinct understanding of them, and move on in great harmony.

Good roads and canals will promote many very important national purposes. They will facilitate the operations of war, the movements of troops, the transportation of cannon, of provisions, and every warlike store, much to our advantage, and to the disadvantage of the enemy in time of war. Good roads will facilitate the transportation of the mail, and thereby promote the purposes of commerce and political intelligence among the people. They will, by being properly directed to these objects, enhance the value of our vacant lands, a treasure of vast resource to the nation. To the appropriation of the public money to improvements, having these objects in view, and carried to a certain extent, I do not see any well founded Constitutional objection.

In regard to our foreign concerns, provided they are managed with integrity and ability, great liberality is allowable in the application of the public money. In the management of these concerns, no State interests can be affected, no State rights violated. The complete and exclusive control over them is vested in Congress. The power to form treaties of alliance and commerce with foreign Powers; to regulate by law our commerce with them; to determine on peace or war; to raise armies and a navy; to call forth the militia, and direct their operations, belongs to the General Government. These great powers, embracing the whole scope of our foreign relations, being granted, on what principle can it be said that the minor are withheld? Are not the latter clearly and evidently comprised in the former? Nations are sometimes called upon to perform to each other acts of humanity and kindness, of which we see so many illustrious examples between individuals in private life. Great calamities make appeals to the benevolence of mankind, which ought not to be resisted. Good offices in such emergencies exalt the character of the party rendering them. By exciting grateful feelings they soften the intercourse between nations, and tend to prevent war. Surely, if the United States have a right to make war, they have a right to prevent it. How was it possible to grant to Congress a power for such minor purposes, other than in general terms, comprising it within the scope and policy of that which conveyed it for the greater?

The right of appropriation is nothing more than a right to apply the public money to this or that purpose. It has no incidental power, nor does it draw after it any consequences of that kind. All that Congress could do under it, in the case of internal improvements, would be to appropriate the money necessary to make them. For every act requiring legislative sanction or support, the State authority must be relied on. The condemnation of the land, if the proprietors should refuse to sell it, the establishment of turnpikes and tolls, and the protection of the work, when finished, must be done by the State. To these purposes the powers of the General Government are believed to be utterly incompetent.

To the objection that the United States have no power, in any instance, which is not complete, to all the purposes to which it may be made instrumental, and, in consequence, that they have no right to appropriate any portion of the public money to internal improvements, because they have not the right of sovereignty and jurisdiction over them, when made, a full answer has, it is presumed, been already given. It may, however, be proper to add, that, if this objection was well-founded, it would not be confined to the simple case of internal improvements, but would apply to others of high importance. Congress have a right to regulate commerce. To give effect to this power, it becomes necessary to establish custom-houses in every State along the coast, and in many parts of the interior. The vast amount of goods imported, and the duties to be performed to accommodate the merchants and secure the revenue, make it necessary that spacious buildings should be erected, especially in the great towns, for their reception. This, it is manifest, could best be performed under the direction of the General Government. Have Congress the right to seize the property of individuals, if they should refuse to sell it, in quarters best adapted to the purpose, to have it valued, and to take it at the valuation? Have they a right to exercise jurisdiction within those buildings? Neither of these claims has ever been set up, nor could it, as is presumed, be sustained. They have invariably either rented houses, where such as were suitable could be obtained, or where they could not purchase the ground of individuals, erected the buildings, and held them under the laws of the State. Under the power to establish post offices and post roads, houses are also requisite for the reception of the mails, and the transaction of the business of the several offices. These have always been rented or purchased, and held under the laws of the State, in the same manner as if they had been taken by a citizen. The United States have a right to establish tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court, and such have been established in every State of the Union. It is believed that the houses for these inferior courts have invariably been rented. No right of jurisdiction in them has ever been claimed, nor other right than that of privilege, and that only while the court is in session. A still stronger case may be urged. Should Congress be compelled, by invasion or other cause, to remove the Government to some town within one of the States, would they have a right of jurisdiction over such town, or hold even the house in which they held their session, under other authority than the laws of such State? It is believed that they would not. If they have a right to appropriate money for any of these purposes, to be laid out under the protection of the laws of the State, surely they have an equal right to do it for the purposes of internal improvements.

It is believed that there is not a corporation in the Union which does not exercise great discretion in the application of the money raised by it, to the purposes of its institution. It would be strange if the Government of the United States, which was instituted for such important purposes, and endowed with such extensive powers, should not be allowed, at least, equal discretion and authority. The evil to be particularly avoided is the violation of State rights; shunning that, it seems to be reasonable and proper that the powers of Congress should be so construed as that the General Government, in its intercourse with other nations, and in our internal concerns, should be able to adopt all such measures lying within the fair scope and intended to facilitate the direct objects of its powers as the public welfare may require, and a sound and provident policy dictate.

The measures of Congress have been in strict accord with the view taken of the right of appropriation, both as to its extent and limitation, as will be shown by a reference to the laws, commencing at a very early period. Many roads have been opened, of which the following are the principal: The first, from Cumberland, at the head waters of the Potomac, in the State of Maryland, through Pennsylvania and Virginia, to the State of Ohio, March 29, 1806. See vol. 4th, page 13, of the late edition of the laws. The second, from the frontiers of Georgia, on the route from Athens to New Orleans, to its intersection with the 31st degree of north latitude; April 31, 1806, page 58. The third, from the Mississippi, at a point, and by a route described, to the Ohio; same act. The fourth, from Nashville, in Tennessee, to Natchez; same act. The fifth, from the 31st degree of north latitude, on the route from Athens to New Orleans, under such regulations as might be agreed on between the Executive and the Spanish Government; March 3, 1807, page 117. The sixth, from the foot of the rapids of the river Miami, of Lake Erie, to the western line of the Connecticut Reserve; December 12, 1811, page 364. The seventh, from the Lower Sandusky to the boundary line established by the Treaty of Greenville; same act. The eighth, from a point where the United States road, leading from Vincennes to the Indian boundary line, established by the Treaty of Greenville, strikes the said line, to the North Bend, in the State of Ohio; January 8, 1812, page 367. The ninth, for repairing, and keeping in repair, the road between Columbia, on Duck river, in Tennessee, and Madisonville, in Louisiana; and also the road between Fort Hawkins, in Georgia, and Fort Stoddard; April 27, 1816, page 104, of the acts of that year. The tenth, from the Shawneetown, on the Ohio river, to the Sabine, and to Kaskaskias, in Illinois; April 27, 1816, page 112. The eleventh, from Reynoldsburg, on Tennessee river, in the State of Tennessee, through the Chickasaw nation, to intersect the Natchez road near the Chickasaw old town; March 3, 1817, page 252. The 12th: by this act authority was given to the President to appoint three commissioners, for the purpose of examining the country, and laying out a road from the termination of the Cumberland road, at Wheeling, on the Ohio, through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to a point to be chosen by them, on the left bank of the Mississippi, between St. Louis and the mouth of the Illinois river, and to report an accurate plan of the said road, with an estimate of the expense of making it. It is, however, declared by the act, that nothing was thereby intended to imply an obligation, on the part of the United States, to make, or defray the expense of making the said road, or any part thereof.

In the late war two other roads were made by the troops, for military purposes: one from the Upper Sandusky, in the State of Ohio, through the Black swamp, towards Detroit, and another from Plattsburg, on Lake Champlain, through the Chatauga woods, towards Sackett's Harbor, which have since been repaired and improved by the troops. Of these latter there is no notice in the laws. The extra pay to the soldiers, for repairing and improving those roads, was advanced, in the first instance, from the appropriation to the Quartermaster's department, and afterwards provided for by a specific appropriation by Congress. The necessity of keeping those roads open and in good repair, being on the frontier, to facilitate a communication between our posts, is apparent.

All of these roads, except the first, were formed merely by cutting down the trees, and throwing logs across, so as to make causeways over such parts as were otherwise impassable. The execution was of the coarsest kind. The Cumberland road is the only regular work which has been undertaken by the General Government, or which could give rise to any question, between the two governments respecting its powers. It is a great work, over the highest mountains in our Union, connecting, from the Seat of the General Government, the eastern with the western waters, and more intimately the Atlantic with the western States, in the formation of which $1,800,000 have been expended. The measures pursued in this case require to be particularly noticed, as fixing the opinion of the parties, and particularly of Congress, on the important question of the right. Passing through Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, it was thought necessary and proper to bring the subject before their respective legislatures, to obtain their sanction, which was granted by each State by a legislative act, approving the route and providing for the purchase and condemnation of the land. This road was founded on an article of compact between the United States and the State of Ohio, under which that State came into the Union, and by which the expense attending it was to be defrayed by the application of a certain portion of the money arising from the sale of the public lands within that State. In this instance, which is by far the strongest, in respect to the expense, extent, and nature of the work done, the United States have exercised no act of jurisdiction or sovereignty within either of the States, by taking the land from the proprietors by force; by passing acts for the protection of the road; or to raise a revenue from it by the establishment of turnpikes and tolls, or any other act founded on the principle of jurisdiction or right. Whatever they have done has, on the contrary, been founded on the opposite principle; on the voluntary and unqualified admission that the sovereignty belonged to the State, and not to the United States; and that they could perform no act which should tend to weaken the power of the State, or to assume any to themselves. All that they have done has been to appropriate the public money to the construction of this road, and to cause it to be constructed; for I presume that no distinction can be taken between the appropriation of money raised by the sale of the public lands, and of that which arises from taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; nor can I believe that the power to appropriate derives any sanction from a provision to that effect having been made by an article of compact between the United States and the people of the then Territory of Ohio. This point may, however, be placed in a clearer light by a more particular notice of the article itself.

By an act of April 30, 1802, entitled "An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," after describing the limits of the proposed new State, and authorizing the people thereof to elect a convention to form a constitution, the three following propositions were made to the convention, to be obligatory on the United States, if accepted by it: First, that section number sixteen of every township, or, where such section had been sold, other lands equivalent thereto, should be granted to the inhabitants of such township, for the use of free schools. Second, that the six miles' reservation, including the salt springs commonly called the Sciota salt springs; the salt springs near the Muskingum river, and in the military tract, with the sections which include the same, should be granted to the said State, for the use of the people thereof, under such regulations as the Legislature of the State should prescribe: provided, that it should never sell or lease the same for more than ten years. Third, that one-twentieth part of the proceeds of the public lands lying within the said State, which might be sold by Congress, from and after the 30th June ensuing, should be applied to the laying out and making public roads, from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, and through the State of Ohio; such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which they should pass.

These three propositions were made on the condition that the convention of the State should provide, by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that every tract of land sold by Congress, after the 30th of June ensuing, should remain, for the term of five years, after sale, exempt from every species of tax whatsoever.

It is impossible to read the ordinance of the 23d of April, 1784, or the provisions of the act of April 30th, 1802, which are founded on it, without being profoundly impressed with the enlightened and magnanimous policy which dictated them. Anticipating that the new States would be settled by the inhabitants of the original States and their offspring, no narrow or contracted jealousy was entertained of their admission into the Union, in equal participation in the national sovereignty with the original States. It was foreseen, at the early period at which that ordinance passed, that the expansion of our Union to the Lakes and to the Mississippi and all its waters, would not only make us a greater Power, but cement the Union itself. These three propositions were well calculated to promote these great results. A grant of land to each township, for free schools, and of the salt springs to the State, which were within its limits, for the use of its citizens, with five per cent. of the money to be raised from the sale of lands within the State, for the construction of roads between the original States and the new State, and of other roads within the State, indicated a spirit not to be mistaken, nor could it fail to produce a corresponding effect in the bosoms of those to whom it was addressed. For these considerations the sole return required of the convention was, that the new State should not tax the public lands which might be sold by the United States within it, for the term of five years after they should be sold. As the value of these lands would be enhanced by this exemption from taxes for that term, and from which the new State would derive its proportionable benefit, and as it would also promote the rapid sale of those lands, and with it the augmentation of its own population, it cannot be doubted, had this exemption been suggested, unaccompanied by any propositions of particular advantage, that the convention would, in consideration of the relation which had before existed between the parties, and was about to be so much improved, most willingly have acceded to it, and without regarding it as an onerous condition.

Since, then, it appears that the whole of the money to be employed in making this road, was to be raised from the sale of the public lands, and which would still belong to the United States, although no mention had been made of them in the compact, it follows that the application of the money to that purpose stands upon the same ground as if such compact had not been made, and, in consequence, that the example in favor of the right of appropriation is in no manner affected by it.

The same rule of construction of the right of appropriation has been observed, and the same liberal policy pursued, towards the other new States, with certain modifications adapted to the situation of each, which were adopted with the State of Ohio. As, however, the reasoning which is applicable to the compact with Ohio, in relation to the right of appropriation, in which light only I have adverted to it, is equally applicable to the several compacts with the other new States, I deem it unnecessary to take a particular notice of them.

It is proper to observe, that the money which was employed in the construction of all the other roads, was taken directly from the Treasury. This fact affords an additional proof that, in the contemplation of Congress, no difference existed in the application of money to those roads, between that which was raised by the sale of lands, and that which was derived from taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.

So far, I have confined my remarks to the acts of Congress respecting the right of appropriation to such measures only as operate internally and affect the territory of the individual States. In adverting to those which operate externally and relate to foreign Powers, I find only two which appear to merit particular attention. These were gratuitous grants of money for the relief of foreigners in distress; the first in 1794, to the inhabitants of St. Domingo, who sought an asylum on our coast from the convulsions and calamities of the island; the second in 1812, to the people of Caraccas, reduced to misery by an earthquake. The considerations which were applicable to these grants have already been noticed and need not be repeated.

In this examination of the right of appropriation, I thought it proper to present to view also the practice of the Government under it, and to explore the ground on which each example rested, that the precise nature and extent of the construction thereby given of the right might be clearly understood. The right to raise money would have given, as is presumed, the right to use it, although nothing had been said to that effect in the Constitution. And where the right to raise it is granted, without special limitation, we must look for such limitation to other causes. Our attention is first drawn to the right to appropriate, and not finding it there, we must then look to the general powers of the Government, as designated by the specific grants, and to the purposes contemplated by them, allowing to this, the right to raise money, the first and most important of the enumerated powers, a scope which will be competent to those purposes. The practice of the Government, as illustrated by numerous and strong examples directly applicable, ought surely to have great weight in fixing the construction of each grant. It ought, I presume, to settle it, especially where it is acquiesced in by the nation, and produces a manifest and positive good. A practical construction, thus supported, shows that it has reason on its side, and is called for by the interests of the Union. Hence, too, the presumption that it will be persevered in. It will, surely, be better to admit, that the construction given by these examples has been just and proper, than to deny that construction, and still to practice on it—to say one thing, and to do another.

Wherein consists the danger of giving a liberal construction to the right of Congress to raise and appropriate the public money? It has been shown that its obvious effect is to secure the rights of the States from encroachment and greater harmony in the political movement between the two Governments, while it enlarges, to a certain extent, in the most harmless way, the useful agency of the General Government for all the purposes of its institution. Is not the responsibility of the representative to his constituent, in every branch of the General Government, equally strong, and as sensibly felt, as in the State governments, and is not the security against abuse as effectual in the one as in the other Government? The history of the General Government, in all its measures, fully demonstrates that Congress will never venture to impose unnecessary burdens on the people, or any that can be avoided. Duties and imposts have always been light, not greater perhaps than would have been imposed for the encouragement of our manufactures, had there been no occasion for the revenue arising from them; and taxes and excises have never been laid, except in cases of necessity, and repealed as soon as the necessity ceased. Under this mild process, and the sale of some hundreds of millions of acres of good land, the Government will be possessed of money, which may be applied with great advantage to national purposes. Within the States only will it be applied, and, of course, for their benefit, it not being presumable that such appeals as were made to the benevolence of the country, in the instances of the inhabitants of St. Domingo and Caraccas, will often occur. How, then, shall this revenue be applied? Should it be idle in the Treasury? That our resources will be equal to such useful purposes, I have no doubt, especially if, by completing our fortifications, and raising and maintaining our Navy at the point provided for, immediately after the war, we sustain our present altitude, and preserve, by means thereof, for any length of time, the peace of the Union.

When we hear charges raised against other Governments of breaches of their constitutions, or rather of their charters, we always anticipate the most serious consequences: communities deprived of privileges which they have long enjoyed, or individuals oppressed and punished, in violation of the ordinary forms and guards of trial to which they were accustomed and entitled. How different is the situation of the United States! Nor can any thing mark more strongly the great characteristics of that difference, than the grounds on which like charges are raised against this Government. It is not alleged that any portion of the community, or any individual, has been oppressed, or that money has been raised under a doubtful title. The principal charges are, that a work of great utility to the Union, and affecting, immediately, and with like advantage, many of the States, has been constructed; that pensions to the surviving patriots of our Revolution, to patriots who fought the battles and promoted the independence of their country, have been granted, by money, too, raised not only without oppression, but almost without being felt, and under an acknowledged Constitutional power.

From this view of the right to appropriate, and of the practice under it, I think that I am authorized to conclude, that the right to make internal improvements has not been granted by the power "to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare," included in the first of the enumerated powers; that that grant conveys nothing more than a right to appropriate the public money, and stands on the same ground with the right to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, conveyed by the first branch of that power; that the Government itself being limited, both branches of the power to raise and appropriate the public money are also limited; the extent of the Government, as designated by the specific grants, marking the extent of the power in both branches, extending, however, to every object embraced by the fair scope of those grants, and not confined to a strict construction of their respective powers, it being safer to aid the purposes of those grants by the appropriation of money, than to extend, by a forced construction, the grant itself. That, although the right to appropriate the public money to such improvements, affords a resource, indispensably necessary to such a scheme, it is, nevertheless, deficient as a power in the great characteristics on which its execution depends:

The substance of what has been urged on this subject may be expressed in a few words. My idea is, that Congress have an unlimited power to raise money, and that, in its appropriation, they have a discretionary power, restricted only by the duty to appropriate it to purposes of common defence, and of general, not local, national, not State, benefit.

I will now proceed to the fifth source from which the power is said to be derived, viz: The power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. This is the seventeenth and last of the enumerated powers granted to Congress.

I have always considered this power as having been granted on a principle of greater caution to secure the complete execution of all the powers which had been vested in the General Government. It contains no distinct and specific power, as every other grant does, such as to lay and collect taxes, to declare war, to regulate commerce, and the like. Looking to the whole scheme of the General Government, it gives to Congress authority to make all laws which should be deemed necessary and proper for carrying all its powers into effect. My impression has been, invariably, that this power would have existed, substantially, if this grant had not been made; for why is any power granted, unless it be to be executed when required, and how can it be executed under our Government, unless it be by laws necessary and proper for the purpose, that is, well adapted to the end? It is a principle universally admitted, that a grant of a power conveys, as a necessary consequence or incident to it, the means of carrying it into effect, by a fair construction of its import. In the formation, however, of the Constitution which was to act directly upon the people, and be paramount, to the extent of its powers, to the constitutions of the States, it was wise in its framers to leave nothing to implication which might be reduced to certainty. It is known that all power which rests solely on that ground has been systematically and zealously opposed under all Governments with which we have any acquaintance; and it was reasonable to presume, that, under our system, where there was a division of the sovereignty between the two independent Governments, the measures of the General Government would excite equal jealousy, and produce an opposition not less systematic, though, perhaps, less violent. Hence the policy, by the framers of our Government, of securing, by a fundamental declaration in the Constitution, a principle which, in all other Governments, had been left to implication only. The terms, necessary and proper, secure to the powers of all the grants, to which the authority given in this is applicable, a fair and sound construction, which is equally binding, as a rule, on both Governments, and on all their departments.

In examining the right of the General Government to adopt and execute, under this grant, a system of internal improvement, the sole question to be decided is, whether the power has been granted under any of the other grants. If it has, this power is applicable to it, to the extent stated. If it has not, it does not exist at all, for it has not been hereby granted. I have already examined all the other grants, (one only excepted, which will next claim attention,) and shown, as I presume, on the most liberal construction of their powers, that the right has not been granted by any of them. Hence it follows, that, in regard to them, it has not been granted by this.

I come now to the last source from which this power is said to be derived, viz: the power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States, which is contained in the second clause of the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution.

To form a just opinion of the nature and extent of this power, it will be necessary to bring into view the provisions contained the first clause of the section of the article referred to, which makes an essential part of the policy in question. By this it is declared, that new States shall be admitted into the Union, but that no new States shall be formed or erected, within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any States be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the United States.

If we recur to the condition of our country, at the commencement of the Revolution, we shall see the origin and cause of these provisions. By the charters of the several colonies, limits by latitude and other descriptions, were assigned to each. In commencing the Revolution, the colonies, as has already been observed, claimed by those limits, although their population extended, in many instances, to a small portion of the territory lying within them. It was contended, by some of the States, after the declaration of independence, that the vacant lands, lying within any of the States, should become the property of the Union, as by a common exertion, they would be acquired. This claim was resisted by the others, on the principle that all the States entered into the contest in the full extent of their chartered rights, and that they ought to have the full benefit of those rights in the event of success. Happily, this controversy was settled, as all interfering claims and pretensions, between the members of our Union, and between the General Government, and any of these members, have been, in the most amicable manner, and to the satisfaction of all parties. On the recommendation of Congress, the individual States, having such territory within their chartered limits, ceded large portions thereof to the United States, on condition that it should be laid off into districts of proper dimensions, the lands to be sold for the benefit of the United States; and that the districts be admitted into the Union, when they should obtain such a population as it might be thought proper and reasonable to prescribe. This is the territory, and this the property, referred to in the second clause of the fourth article of the Constitution.

All the States which had made cessions of vacant territory, except Georgia, had made them before the adoption of the Constitution, and that State had made a proposition to Congress to that effect, which was under consideration at the time the Constitution was adopted. The cession was completed after the adoption of the Constitution. It was made on the same principle, and on similar conditions with those which had been already made by the other States. As differences might arise respecting the right or the policy in Congress to admit new States into the Union, under the new government, or to make regulations for the government of the territory ceded in the intermediate state, or for the improvement and sale of the public lands, or to accept other cessions, it was thought proper to make special provisions for these objects, which was accordingly done by the above recited clause in the Constitution.

Thus the power of Congress over the ceded territory was not only limited to these special objects, but was also temporary. As soon as the Territory became a State, the jurisdiction over it, as it had before existed, ceased. It extended afterwards only to the unsold lands, and as soon as the whole were sold, it ceased in that sense, also, altogether. From that moment, the United States have no jurisdiction or power in the new States, other than in the old, nor can it be obtained except by an amendment of the Constitution.

Since then it is manifest that the power granted to Congress to dispose of, and make all needful regulations respecting, the territory and other property of the United States, relates solely to the territory and property which had been ceded by individual States, and which, after such cession, lay without their respective limits, and for which special provision was deemed necessary, the main power of the Constitution operating internally, not being applicable or adequate thereto, it follows that this power gives no authority, and has even no bearing on the question of internal improvement. The authority to admit new States and to dispose of the property and regulate the territory, is not among the enumerated powers granted to Congress, because the duties to be performed under it are not among the ordinary duties of that body, like the imposition of taxes, the regulation of commerce, and the like. They are objects in their nature special, and for which special provision was more suitable and proper.

Having now examined all the powers of Congress, under which the right to adopt and execute a system of internal improvement is claimed, and the reasons in support of it, in each instance, I think that it may fairly be concluded that such a right has not been granted. It appears, and is admitted, that much may be done in aid of such a system, by the right which is derived from several of the existing grants, and more especially from that to appropriate the public money. But still it is manifest, that, as a system for the United States, it can never be carried into effect, under that grant, nor under all of them united, the great and essential power being deficient; consisting of a right to take up the subject on principle; to cause our Union to be examined by men of science, with a view to such improvements; to authorize commissioners to lay off the roads and canals in all proper directions; to take the land at a valuation if necessary, and to construct the works; to pass laws, with suitable penalties for their protection; and to raise a revenue from them; to keep them in repair, and make further improvement, by the establishment of turnpikes, and tolls, with gates to be placed at the proper distances.

It need scarcely be remarked that this power will operate, like many others now existing, without affecting the sovereignty of the States, except in the particular offices to be performed. The jurisdiction of the several States may still exist over the roads and canals within their respective limits, extending alike to persons and property, as if the right to make and protect such improvements had not been vested in Congress. The right being made commensurate simply with the purposes indispensable to the system, may be strictly confined to them. The right of Congress to protect the works, by laws, imposing penalties, would operate on the same principles as the right to protect the mail. The act being punishable only, a jurisdiction over the place would be altogether unnecessary and even absurd.

In the preceding inquiry, little has been said of the advantages which would attend the exercise of such a power by the General Government. I have made the inquiry under a deep conviction that they are almost incalculable, and that there was a general concurrence of opinion among our fellow-citizens to that effect. Still it may not be improper for me to state the grounds upon which my own impression is founded. If it sheds no additional light on this interesting part of the subject, it will, at least, show that I have had more than one powerful motive for making the inquiry. A general idea is all that I shall attempt.

The advantages of such a system must depend upon the interests to be affected by it, and the extent to which they may be affected, and those must depend on the capacity of our country for improvement, and the means at its command applicable to that object.

I think that I may venture to affirm that there is no part of our globe comprehending so many degrees of latitude on the main ocean, and so many degrees of longitude into the interior, that admits of such great improvement, and at so little expense. The Atlantic, on the one side, and the lakes, forming almost inland seas, on the other, separated by high mountains which rise in the valley of the St. Lawrence, and determine in that of the Mississippi, traversing from North to South, almost the whole interior; with innumerable rivers on every side of those mountains, some of vast extent, many of which take their sources near to each other, give the great outline; the details are to be seen on the valuable maps of our country.

It appears, by the light already before the public, that it is practicable and easy to connect, by canals, the whole coast, from its southern to its northern extremity, in one continued inland navigation; and to connect, in like manner, in many parts, the western lakes and rivers with each other. It is equally practicable and easy to facilitate the intercourse between the Atlantic and the Western country, by improving the navigation of many of the rivers, which have their sources near to each other in the mountains, on each side, and by good roads across the mountains, between the highest navigable points of those rivers. In addition to the example of the Cumberland road, already noticed, another of this kind is now in train, from the head waters of the river James to those of the Kanawa; and in like manner may the Savannah be connected with the Tennessee. In some instances it is understood that the eastern and western waters may be connected together directly, by canals. One great work of this kind is now in its progress and far advanced in the State of New York, and there is good reason to believe that two others may be formed, one at each extremity of the high mountains above mentioned, connecting in the one instance the waters of the St. Lawrence with Lake Champlain, and in the other, some of the most important of the western rivers with those emptying into the Gulf of Mexico; the advantage of which will be seen at the first glance, by an enlightened observer.

Great improvements may also be made by good roads, in proper directions, through the interior of the country. As these roads would be laid out on principle, on a full view of the country, its mountains, rivers, &c., it would be useless, if I had the knowledge, to go into detail respecting them. Much has been done by some of the States, but yet much remains to be done with a view to the Union.

Under the colonial governments, improvements of this kind were not thought of. There was, it is believed, not one canal, and little communication from colony to colony. It was their policy to encourage the intercourse between each colony and the parent country only. The roads which were attended to, were those which led from the interior of each colony to its principal towns on the navigable waters. By those routes the produce of the country was carried to the coast, and shipped thence to the mercantile house in London, Liverpool, Glasgow, or other towns to which the trade was carried on. It is believed that there was but one connected route from north to south at the commencement of the Revolution, and that a very imperfect one. The existence and principle of our Union point out the necessity of a very different policy.

The advantages which would be derived from such improvements are incalculable. The facility which would thereby be afforded to the transportation of the whole of the rich productions of our country to market, would alone more than amply compensate for all the labor and expense attending them. Great however as is that advantage, it is one only of many, and by no means the most important. Every power of the General Government and of the State governments, connected with the strength and resources of the country, would be made more efficient for the purposes intended by them. In war, they would facilitate the transportation of men, ordnance, and provisions, and munitions of war, of every kind, to every part of our extensive coast and interior, on which an attack might be made or threatened. Those who have any knowledge of the occurrences of the late war, must know the good effect which would result, in the event of another war, from the command of an interior navigation alone, along the coast, for all the purposes of war, as well as of commerce, between the different parts of our Union. The impediments to all military operations which proceeded from the want of such a navigation, and the reliance which was placed, notwithstanding those impediments, on such a commerce, cannot be forgotten. In every other line their good effect would be most sensibly felt. Intelligence by means of the Post Office Department would be more easily, extensively, and rapidly diffused. Parts the most remote from each other would be brought more closely together. Distant lands would be made more valuable, and the industry of our fellow-citizens on every portion of our soil be better rewarded.

It is natural, in so great a variety of climate, that there should be a corresponding difference in the produce of the soil—that one part should raise what the other might want. It is equally natural that the pursuits of industry should vary in like manner; that labor should be cheaper, and manufactures succeed better, in one part than in another; that, were the climate the most severe and the soil less productive, navigation, the fisheries, and commerce, should be most relied on. Hence the motive for an exchange, for mutual accommodation and active intercourse between them. Each part would thus find for the surplus of its labor, in whatever article it consisted, an extensive market at home, which would be the most profitable because free from duty.

There is another view in which these improvements are of still more vital importance. The effect which they would have on the bond of Union itself affords an inducement for them more powerful than any which have been urged, or than all of them united. The only danger to which our system is exposed arises from its expansion over a vast territory. Our Union is not held together by standing armies, or by any ties, other than the positive interests and powerful attractions of its parts towards each other. Ambitious men may hereafter grow up among us, who may promise to themselves advancement from a change, and by practising upon the sectional interests, feelings, and prejudices, endeavor under various pretexts to promote it. The history of the world is replete with examples of this kind—of military commanders and demagogues becoming usurpers and tyrants, and of their fellow-citizens becoming their instruments and slaves. I have little fear of this danger, knowing well how strong the bond which holds us together is, and who the people are who are thus held together. But still it is proper to look at and to provide against it, and it is not within the compass of human wisdom to make a more effectual provision than would be made by the proposed improvements. With their aid, and the intercourse which would grow out of them, the parts would soon become so compacted and bound together that nothing could break it.

The expansion of our Union over a vast territory cannot operate unfavorably to the States individually. On the contrary, it is believed that the greater the expansion, within practicable limits, and it is not easy to say what are not so, the greater the advantage which the States individually will derive from it. With governments separate, vigorous, and efficient for all local purposes, their distance from each other can have no injurious effect upon their respective interests. It has already been shown, that, in some important circumstances, especially with the aid of these improvements, they must derive great advantage from that cause alone, that is, from their distance from each other. In every other way, the expansion of our system must operate favorably for every State, in proportion as it operates favorably for the Union. It is in that sense only that it can become a question with the States, or rather with the people who compose them. As States, they can be affected by it only by their relation to each other through the General Government, and by its effect on the operations of that Government. Manifest it is, that to any extent to which the General Government can sustain and execute its functions with complete effect, will the States, that is, the people who compose them, be benefited. It is only when the expansion shall be carried beyond the faculties of the General Government, so as to enfeeble its operations, to the injury of the whole, that any of the parts can be injured. The tendency, in that stage, will be to dismemberment, and not to consolidation. This danger should, therefore, be looked at with profound attention, as one of a very serious character. I will remark here, that, as the operations of the National Government are of a general nature, the States having complete power for internal and local purposes, the expansion may be carried to very great extent, and with perfect safety. It must be obvious to all, that the further the expansion is carried, provided it be not beyond the just limit, the greater will be the freedom of action to both Governments, and the more perfect their security; and, in all other respects, the better the effect will be to the whole American people. Extent of territory, whether it be great or small, gives to a nation many of its characteristics. It marks the extent of its resources, of its population, of its physical force. It marks, in short, the difference between a great and a small power.

To what extent it may be proper to expand our system of Government, is a question which does not press for a decision at this time. At the end of the Revolutionary war, in 1783, we had, as we contended and believed, a right to the free navigation of the Mississippi; but it was not until after the expiration of twelve years, in 1795, that that right was acknowledged and enjoyed. Further difficulties occurred, in the bustling of a contentious world, when, at the expiration of eight years more, the United States, sustaining the strength and energy of their character, acquired the province of Louisiana, with the free navigation of the river, from its source to the ocean, and a liberal boundary on the western side. To this, Florida has since been added, so that we now possess all the territory in which the original States had any interest, or in which the existing

States can be said, either in a national or local point of view, to be in any way interested. A range of States, on the western side of the Mississippi, which already is provided for, puts us essentially at ease. Whether it will be wise to go further, will turn on other considerations than those which have dictated the course heretofore pursued. At whatever point we may stop, whether it be at a single range of States beyond the Mississippi, or by taking a greater scope, the advantage of such improvements is deemed of the highest importance. It is so, on the present scale. The further we go, the greater will be the necessity for them.

It cannot be doubted, that improvements for great national purposes would be better made by the National Government, than by the governments of the several States. Our experience prior to the adoption of the Constitution, demonstrated, that, in the exercise by the individual States of most of the powers granted to the United States, a contracted rivalry of interest, and misapplied jealousy of each other, had an important influence on all their measures, to the great injury of the whole. This was particularly exemplified by the regulations which they severally made, of their commerce with foreign nations, and with each other. It was this utter incapacity in the State governments, proceeding from these and other causes, to act as a nation, and to perform all the duties which the nation owed to itself, under any system which left the General Government dependent on the States, which produced the transfer of these powers to the United States, by the establishment of the present Constitution. The reasoning which was applicable to the grant of any of the powers now vested in Congress, is likewise so, at least to a certain extent, to that in question. It is natural that the States, individually, in making improvements, should look to their particular and local interests. The members composing their respective Legislatures represent the people of each State, only, and might not feel themselves at liberty to look to objects, in these respects, beyond that limit. If the resources of the Union were to be brought into operation under the direction of the State Assemblies, or in concert with them, it may be apprehended that every measure would become the object of negotiation, of bargain and barter, much to the disadvantage of the system, as well as discredit to both Governments. But Congress would look to the whole, and make improvements to promote the welfare of the whole. It is the peculiar felicity of the proposed amendment, that, while it will enable the United States to accomplish every national object, the improvements made with that view will eminently promote the welfare of the individual States, who may also add such others as their own particular interests may require.

The situation of the Cumberland road requires the particular and early attention of Congress. Being formed over very lofty mountains, and in many instances over deep and wide streams, across which valuable bridges have been erected which are sustained by stone walls, as are many other parts of the road, all these works are subject to decay, have decayed, and will decay rapidly, unless timely and effectual measures are adopted to prevent it.

The declivities from the mountains, and all the heights, must suffer from the frequent and heavy falls of water, and its descent to the valleys, as also from the deep congelations during our severe Winters. Other injuries have also been experienced on this road, such as the displacing the capping of the walls, and other works, committed by worthless people, either from a desire to render the road impassable, or to have the transportation in another direction, or from a spirit of wantonness to create employment for idlers. These considerations show, that an active and strict police ought to be established over the whole road, with power to make repairs when necessary; to establish turnpikes and tolls, as the means of raising money to make them; and to prosecute and punish those who commit waste and other injuries.

Should the United States be willing to abandon this road to the States through which it passes, would they take charge of it, each of that portion within its limits, and keep it in repair? It is not to be presumed that they would, since the advantages attending it are exclusively national, by connecting, as it does, the Atlantic with the Western States, and in a line with the seat of the National Government. The most expensive parts of this road lie within Pennsylvania and Virginia, very near the confines of each State, and in a route not essentially connected with the commerce of either.

If it is thought proper to vest this power in the United States, the only mode in which it can be done, is, by an amendment of the Constitution. The States, individually, cannot transfer the power to the United States, nor can the United States receive it. The Constitution forms an equal and the sole relation between the General Government and the several States; and it recognises no change in it, which shall not, in like manner, apply to all. If it is once admitted, that the General Government may form compacts with individual States, not common to the others, and which the others might even disapprove, into what pernicious consequences might it not lead? Such compacts are utterly repugnant to the principles of the Constitution, and of the most dangerous tendency. The States, through which this road passes, have given their sanction only to the route, and to the acquisition of the soil by the United States—a right very different from that of jurisdiction, which cannot be granted without an amendment to the Constitution, and which need not be granted for the purposes of this system, except in the limited manner heretofore stated. On full consideration, therefore, of the whole subject, I am of opinion that such an amendment ought to be recommended to the several States for their adoption.

I have now essentially executed that part of the task, which I imposed on myself, of examining the right of Congress to adopt and execute a system of internal improvement, and I presume have shown that it does not exist. It is, I think, equally manifest, that such a power vested in Congress, and wisely executed, would have the happiest effect on all the great interests of our Union. It is, however, my opinion, that the power should be confined to great national works only, since, if it were admitted, it would be liable to abuse, and might be productive of evil. For all minor improvements, the resources of the States individually, would be fully adequate, and by the States such improvements might be made with greater advantage than by the Union; as they would understand better such as their more immediate and local interests required.

In the view above presented, I have thought it proper to trace the origin of our institutions, and particularly of the State and National Governments, for, although they have a common origin, in the people, yet, as the point at issue turned on what were the powers granted to the one government, and what were those which remained to the other, I was persuaded that an analysis which should mark distinctly the source of power in both Governments, with its progress in each, would afford the best means for obtaining a sound result. In our political career, there are, obviously, three great epochs. The colonial state forms the first; the revolutionary movement, from its commencement to the adoption of the Articles of Confederation, the second; and the intervening space, from that event to the present day, the third. The first may be considered the infant state. It was the school of morality, of political science, and just principles. The equality of rights enjoyed by the people of every colony, under their original charters, forms the basis of every existing institution, and it was owing to the creation by those charters of distinct communities that the power, when wrested from the Crown, passed directly and exclusively to the people of each colony. The Revolutionary struggle gave activity to those principles, and its success secured to them a permanent existence in the governments of our Union, State and National. The third epoch comprises the administration under the Articles of Confederation, with the adoption of the Constitution, and administration under it. On the first and last of these epochs, it is not necessary to enlarge for any purpose connected with the object of this inquiry. To the second, in which we were transferred by a heroic exertion, from the first to the third stage, and whose events give the true character to every institution, some further attention is due. In tracing in greater detail the prominent acts of a movement to which we owe so much, I shall perform an office, which, if not useful, will be gratifying to my own feelings, and I hope not unacceptable to my readers.

Of the revolutionary movement itself, sentiments too respectful, too exalted, cannot be entertained. It is impossible for any citizen, having a just idea of the dangers which we had to encounter, to read the record of our early proceedings, and to see the firmness with which they were met, and the wisdom and patriotism which were displayed in every stage, without being deeply affected by it. An attack on Massachusetts was considered an attack on every colony, and the people of each moved in her defence, as in their own cause. The meeting of the General Congress in Philadelphia, on the 6th of September, 1774, appears to have been the result of a spontaneous impulse in every quarter at the same time. The first public act proposing it, according to the journals of the first Congress, was passed by the House of Representatives of Connecticut, on the third of June, of that year; but it is presumed that the first suggestion came from Massachusetts, the colony most oppressed, and in whose favor the general sympathy was much excited. The exposition which that Congress made of grievances, in the petition to the King, in the address to the people of Great Britain, and in that to the people of the several colonies, evinced a knowledge so profound of the English constitution and of the general principles of free government and of liberty; of our rights founded on that constitution, and on the charters of the several colonies, and of the numerous and egregious violations which had been committed of them, as must have convinced all impartial minds, that the talent on this side of the Atlantic was at least equal to that on the other. The spirit in which those papers were drawn, which was known to be in strict accord with the public sentiment, proved that, although the whole people cherished a connexion with the parent country, and were desirous of preserving it on just principles, they nevertheless stood embodied at the parting line, ready to separate for ever, if a redress of grievances, the alternative offered, was not promptly rendered. That alternative was rejected, and, in consequence, war and dismemberment followed.

The powers granted to the delegates of each colony who composed the first Congress looked primarily to the support of rights, and to a redress of grievances, and in consequence to the restoration of harmony, which was ardently desired. They justified, however, any extremity in case of necessity. They were ample for such purposes, and were executed in every circumstance with the utmost fidelity. It was not until after the meeting of the second Congress, which took place on the 10th May, 1775, when full proof was laid before it of the commencement of hostilities in the preceding month, by a deliberate attack of the British troops, on the militia and inhabitants of Lexington and Concord, in Massachusetts, that war might be said to be decided on, and measures were taken to support it. The progress even then was slow and reluctant, as will be seen by their second petition to the King, and their second address to the people of Great Britain, which were prepared and forwarded after that event. The arrival, however, of large bodies of troops, and the pressure of war in every direction, soon dispelled all hope of accommodation.

On the 15th of June, 1775, a commander-in-chief of the forces raised, and to be raised, for the defence of American liberty, was appointed by the unanimous vote of Congress, and his conduct in the discharge of the duties of that high trust, which he held through the whole of the war, has given an example to the world for talents as a military commander; for integrity, fortitude, and firmness, under the severest trials; for respect to the civil authority, and devotion to the rights and liberties of his country, of which neither Rome nor Greece have exhibited the equal. I saw him in my earliest youth, in the retreat through Jersey, at the head of a small band, or rather in its rear, for he was always next the enemy, and his countenance and manner made an impression on me, which time can never efface. A lieutenant then in the third Virginia regiment, I happened to be on the rear guard at Newark, and I counted the force under his immediate command by platoons as it passed me, which amounted to less than three thousand men. A deportment so firm, so dignified, so exalted, but yet so modest, and composed, I have never seen in any other person.

On the 6th July, 1775, Congress published a declaration of the causes which compelled them to take up arms, and immediately afterwards took measures for augmenting the army and raising a navy; for organizing the militia and providing cannon, and small arms, and military stores of every kind; for raising a revenue, and pushing the war offensively, with all the means in their power. Nothing escaped the attention of that enlightened body. The people of Canada were invited to join the Union, and a force sent into the province to favor the revolutionary party, which, however, was not capable of affording any essential aid. The people of Ireland were addressed in terms manifesting due respect for the sufferings, the talents, and patriotism, of that portion of the British empire; and a suitable acknowledgment was made to the Assembly of Jamaica, for the approbation it had expressed of our cause, and the part it had taken in support of it with the British Government.

On the 2d of June, 1775, the Convention of Massachusetts, by a letter signed by their President, of May the 10th, stated to Congress "that they labored under difficulties for the want of a regular form of government, and requested to be favored with 'explicit advice respecting the taking up and exercising the powers of civil government,' and declaring their readiness 'to submit to such a general plan as the Congress might direct for the colonies, or that they would make it their great study to establish such a form of government there, as should not only promote their own advantage, but the union and interest of all America.'" To this application an answer was given on the 9th by which it was recommended to the Convention, "to write letters to the inhabitants of the several places entitled to representation in assembly, requesting them to choose such representatives, and that the assembly, when chosen, should elect councillors, and that said assembly or council should exercise the powers of government, until a governor of His Majesty's appointment will consent to govern the colony according to its charter."

On the 18th October of the same year, the delegates from New Hampshire laid before Congress an instruction from their convention "to use their 'utmost endeavors to obtain the advice and direc'tion of Congress, with respect to a method for 'administering justice, and regulating their civil 'police.'" To this a reply was given on the 3d November, by which it was recommended to the convention "to call a full and free representation 'of the people, and that the representatives, if 'they thought it necessary, should establish such 'a form of government as, in their judgment, 'would best promote the happiness of the people, 'and most effectually secure peace and good order 'in the province, during the continuance of the 'present dispute between Great Britain and the 'colonies."

On the 4th November it was resolved by Congress "that if the convention of South Carolina 'shall find it necessary to establish a form of gov- 'ernment in that colony, it be recommended to 'that convention to call a full and free represent- 'ation of the people, and the said representatives, 'if they think it necessary, shall establish such a 'form of government as, in their judgment, will 'best promote the happiness of the people, and 'most effectually secure peace and good order in 'the colony, during the continuance of the pres- 'ent dispute between Great Britain and the colo- 'nies."

On the 4th December following, a resolution passed recommending the same measure, and precisely in the same words, to the convention of Virginia.

On the 10th May, 1776, "it was recommended 'to the respective assemblies and conventions of 'the united colonies, where no government suffi- 'cient to the exigencies of their affairs had been 'established, to adopt such government as should, 'in the opinion of the representatives of the peo- 'ple best conduce to the happiness and safety of 'their constituents in particular, and America in 'general."

On the 7th June, resolutions respecting independence were moved and seconded, which were referred to a Committee of the Whole on the 8th and 10th, on which latter day it was resolved to postpone a decision on the first resolution, or main question, until the 1st July, but that no time might be lost in case the Congress agree thereto, that a committee be appointed to prepare a declaration to the effect of that resolution.

On the 11th June, 1776, Congress appointed a committee to prepare and digest a plan of confederation for the colonies. On the 12th July the committee reported a draught of articles, which were severally afterwards debated and amended, until the 15th November, 1777, when they were adopted. These articles were then proposed to the legislatures of the several States, with a request that, if approved by them, they would authorize their delegates to ratify the same in Congress, and which, being done, to become conclusive. It was not until the 21st of March, 1781, as already observed, that they were ratified by the last State, and carried into effect.

On the 4th July, 1776, independence was declared, by an act which arrested the attention of the civilized world, and will bear the test of time. For force and condensation of matter, strength of reason, sublimity of sentiment and expression, it is believed that no document of equal merit exists. It looked to every thing, and with a reach, perspicuity, and energy of mind, which seemed to be master of every thing.

Thus it appears, in addition to the very important charge of managing the war, that Congress had under consideration at the same time, the Declaration of Independence, the adoption of a confederation for the States, and the propriety of instituting State governments, with the nature of those governments, respecting which it had been consulted by the conventions of several of the colonies. So great a trust was never reposed before in a body thus constituted, and I am authorized to add, looking to the great result, that never were duties more ably or faithfully performed.

The distinguishing characteristic of this movement is, that, although the connexion which had existed between the people of the several colonies, before their dismemberment from the parent country, was not only not dissolved, but increased by that event, even before the adoption of the Articles of Confederation, yet the preservation and augmentation of that tie were the result of a new creation, and proceeded altogether from the people of each colony, into whose hands the whole power passed, exclusively, when wrested from the Crown. To the same cause the greater change which has since occurred, by the adoption of the Constitution, is to be traced.

The establishment of our institutions forms the most important epoch that history hath recorded. They extend unexampled felicity to the whole body of our fellow-citizens, and are the admiration of other nations. To preserve and hand them down in their utmost purity to the remotest ages will require the existence and practice of virtues and talents equal to those which were displayed in acquiring them. It is ardently hoped and confidently believed that these will not be wanted.

MONDAY, May 6.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Alexander Humphrey and Sylvester Humphrey," reported it with a recommendation that the House do not pass the same; and the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. WOOD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Architect of the Public Buildings be authorized, in conjunction with the Clerk of this House, to make such necessary repairs for the improvement of the Hall of the House of Representatives as they may deem necessary to facilitate the means of speaking and hearing.

In support of this motion Mr. W. stated that it was believed by the Architect, that by filling up the hollow space under the raised floor of the Hall, and a different arrangement of the drapery, the hearing would be greatly improved. The cost of these alterations would not be great, but they could not be made without authority of the House.

Mr. KEYES remarked that he did not perceive the necessity of these alterations. The Hall was well, enough, he said. If members would but be still, and not move about so much, they could hear one another well enough.

The question was then put on agreeing to the resolution, and decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, the Committee on Roads and Canals were discharged from the further consideration of such subjects referred to them which have not been already acted upon.

Mr. FLOYD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause a report to be made to this House, at an early period of the next session of Congress, showing the number and local position of each of the armories, arsenals, and magazines of the United States, the time at which each was established, and the total expense of constructing and repairing the same, up to the end of the year 1821; also, the whole number of cannon and other arms made annually at each armory and arsenal, from its establishment to the end of the said year; also, an exhibit in detail of the expense of each armory and arsenal for each year from 1816 to 1821, inclusive; showing, First, the gross amount of money expended at each within each year: Second, the separate object to which the expenditure was applied: Third, the contracts and purchases made at each within each year; by whom and with whom; whether publicly or privately; with or without public notice; for what articles or materials; the amount of each contract; for all purchased, and the amount given therefor; the names of all concerned as principals, agents, and securities; their place of residence, and the failures which may have occurred in any contract: Fourth, the whole number of arms and equipments transmitted to each State and Territory in the Union, under the act of Congress for arming the whole body of the militia of the United States: Fifth, the whole number of cannon, arms, equipments, and munitions of war of every kind, distinguishing the different kinds, now belonging to the United States, and where placed: Sixth, the annual expense of transporting ordnance and ordnance stores from the places at which they were made or purchased, in the Atlantic States; to the places at which they were to be delivered, or used, in the Western States or Territories, specifying the several descriptions of arms and munitions so transported, and the cost thereof when purchased. The whole so arranged as to exhibit clearly the annual expenditure of the annual appropriation for each specific object.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table one day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of State on the petition of Lucy Lamb; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Leave was given to withdraw the several petitions and memorials presented at the present session, upon which the House have not acted definitively, with their accompanying documents.

POTOMAC NAVIGATION.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution for consideration, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the sale of the whole or a part of the public lots and grounds in the City of Washington, and vesting the proceeds of such sale or stock in a company incorporated within the District of Columbia, to co-operate with Virginia and Maryland in the improvement of the navigation of the Potomac river, from tide-water, in this city, to Cumberland, in the State of Maryland.

Mr. STEWART said he did not wish the House, at this late period of the session, to pass upon the resolution which he had just submitted; but, as it would be brought before Congress at an early period of the next session, he thought it but fair to give gentlemen an opportunity to examine it, for he felt persuaded that a candid and deliberate examination of the subject was alone wanting to secure its success. It was a measure, he said, of no ordinary importance—one to which the anxious attention of General WASHINGTON had been directed as early as the establishment of the Seat of Government, which he had pursued with zeal during his lifetime, and, had he lived to complete it, this city would now enjoy the high and proud rank which, as the capital of a great nation, it ought to occupy.

But, he said, he would not trouble the House, at this time, with a general view of the subject. He would confine himself to a few of the most prominent facts connected with it.

The proprietors of the city, he said, had granted to the Government, without any pecuniary equivalent, one-half of all the building lots, which, together with the public reservations, (part of which had been sold for an average of fifty cents per foot,) amounted to about 9,629 lots, which, at fifteen cents per foot, would produce $7,220,750.

Suppose this estimate (which he read from the National Calendar of 1820) be reduced an half, it would leave $3,610,875.

The sale of one-half (allowing nothing for the increase of value produced by this measure) would be $1,805,437.

A sum more than sufficient, with the aid of Virginia and Maryland, the old company, and individuals, to accomplish the work. Thus, instead of near a thousand vacant and unproductive lots, (which can never be sold until something is done by Government to promote the prosperity and growth of the city,) you have a profitable stock, which, even at six per cent., would put into your Treasury $108,326 per annum, and make the balance of your lots worth more than four times as much as the whole are now worth.

This, Mr. S. said, might, to some gentlemen, seem extravagant; but every doubt would vanish when it is considered that, by this measure, you place this city, for all the purposes of commerce, trade, and intercourse, within five or six miles of Cumberland, and within seventy-four miles, by land, of the western navigable waters at Brownsville. Is this fact denied? It is susceptible of the clearest proof. Mr. S. said he had been informed this morning, by an intelligent member from New York, who was acquainted with the operations on the canal lately constructed in that State, that a boat, with two horses, two men, and a boy, would carry fifty tons thirty-five miles in one day, at an expense of between four and five dollars, exclusive of tolls. To carry the same quantity the same distance, would require at least twenty-five wagons, with five horses each, two days, at five dollars each per day, would amount to $250, (exclusive of tolls on a turnpike,) requiring a capital of near $13,000, besides the wear and tear of 25 wagons and 125 horses. The result, Mr. S. said, was a difference of as 5 to 250, or 1 to 50. The distance from Washington City to Cumberland was 188 miles by water—not equal to four by land. If the facts, as he received them, were true, and he could not doubt it, the result was inevitable. Thus you remove the capital to the centre of the Union; it is made to follow the march of power to the West; you place it in the midst of a rich and productive country; you carry the supply of goods into the neighborhood of the consumer, for which he can easily exchange his produce—you place the market near his door. It has been ascertained that a few western counties have produced 400,000 barrels of flour and whiskey in one year; by this improvement they would save at least one dollar per barrel in transportation; and even Kentucky sends her tobacco in wagons, across the mountains, to this District. It might also be remarked, that the city of Baltimore, by carrying into effect the proposed cross-cut from Frederick, would enjoy the same advantages with this city.

Independent of the numerous advantages to result from this measure, in a political, military, and commercial point of view, Mr. S. begged leave to advert to one which he thought alone would compensate for the whole expense in a few years. It was the coal trade. Many of the mountains through which this river passes, Mr. S. said, were constituted of coal, which could be deposited in boats for four or five cents per bushel, and the carriage by water to this city being equal to only four miles by land, they could not cost more than ten or twelve cents—superior to what now cost thirty-seven cents; but suppose they cost seventeen cents per bushel, still you have a saving of twenty cents, which, upon the amount consumed in the District alone, would produce, from a calculation made, $320,000 per annum. Besides, by reducing the price of fuel and of every species of marketing, by affording an easy access to the rich and productive countries bordering on the Potomac, you reduce the price of living in this city, as well to foreigners and strangers who visit the Seat of Government, as to the members of this body. By placing this city near two hundred miles in advance of other seaports, you give it commercial advantages which will add to your revenue, payable at the door of the Treasury; you increase the growth and prosperity of the national city, and enable its inhabitants to live without looking to the offall of the public Treasury for their daily bread. The foreigner who visits you, with high expectations, will no longer go away disappointed; he will find something to delight him, to edify him, and to praise when he shall return to his own country. No great nation has ever been indifferent to the growth and prosperity of its capital; and why should we? This District is placed, by the Constitution, under the exclusive care and patronage of Congress; and it is our duty to attend to its interest. Here our powers are plenary; we cannot be met with Constitutional objections, which have lately become fashionable on subjects of this sort.

Mr. S. apologized for having so long trespassed on the patience of the House, and said he would only add, that if, in a political point of view, it was of no importance to connect the Eastern and Western sections of the Union, by the ties of interest and intercourse; if it were of no importance to facilitate the transportation of the military means of the country in times of danger or of war; if it afforded no advantages to the people of the East and West, in a commercial point of view—still, with a single eye to speculation and to revenue, it was the interest and the duty of the Government to adopt this measure; by it you make this a great commercial city, and bring your revenue to the door of your Treasury; by it you reduce the price of living, and increase your comforts here; by it you enhance the value of the public property in the District, six or eight fold, you bring it into market, and out of the proceeds of a part of it, you acquire a productive stock, adding, perhaps, one or two hundred thousand dollars per annum to your revenue. No wonder, then, he said, that this had been a favorite object with the illustrious WASHINGTON; no wonder it had been near and dear to his heart, as was every thing connected with the good and glory of his country. It was a measure, he said, worthy the approbation of every statesman of liberal and enlightened views, and he hoped the day was not far distant when it would be adopted.

The question being taken on the consideration of the resolution, it was determined in the negative.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on bills from the Senate for the relief of the legal representatives of Joseph Hodgson, deceased; a bill for the relief of the sureties of Joseph Pettypool; and a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Greenberry H. Murphy; which were respectively reported to the House, concurred in, and ordered for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of John Coffee (making an allowance for extra services rendered as Surveyor General) was read the third time, and was opposed by Mr. COCKE; on whose motion, after some opposition from Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, the bill was laid on the table.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Joseph Hodgson, was read the third time, and, after some remarks adverse to its passage by Mr. COCKE, and an unsuccessful motion by him to lay it on the table, the bill was passed without a division.

The House again went into a Committee of the Whole, on a bill for the relief of John Coffee; a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Donnelson, Thomas Carr, and others; and a bill explanatory of the act for the relief of James Leander Cathcart; which were gone through with and reported to the House.

The bill for the relief of John Donnelson gave rise to some debate. It was advocated by Messrs. REID, of Georgia, and RANKIN, and opposed by Messrs. TRACY and COCKE; and, on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, it was laid on the table.

The following bills from the Senate, heretofore considered in Committee of the Whole and ordered to a third reading, were severally read a third time, passed, and returned to the Senate.

The bill for the relief of Joseph Pettypool; the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Greenberry H. Murphy; the bill explanatory of the act for the relief of James L. Cathcart.

The House then, on motion of Mr. FLOYD, took up, and read the third time, the bill from the Senate to repeal the fourteenth section of the act of last session reducing the army; and, after an explanatory remark from Mr. F. as to the practical operation of the rules and regulations adopted by the said fourteenth section, the bill was passed.

The bill granting a tract of land to William Conner and his wife and their children, being under consideration in Committee of the Whole—

Mr. HENDRICKS briefly explained the nature of the claim, which originated in an indirect assurance, on the part of our agents in the treaty held at St. Mary's, of granting him the said land in consideration of his having used his influence to induce the Indians to agree to the treaty.

Mr. COCKE opposed the claim, on the ground that it was unjust to hold out a lure to those who have been adopted by the Indians to betray their nation. The sanction of the Government ought not to be given to such conduct. It tarnished the honor, and derogated from the dignity of this people, to bribe individuals to betray the nation that had given them protection.

The said bill, as also a bill for the relief of Richard Matson, and a bill for the relief of Thomas Shields, were gone through with, and reported to the House; where the two latter bills were concurred in, and on the former, a debate arose similar in its character and principle to that which took place in Committee, in which Messrs. RANKIN, COCKE, ROSS, COOK, HENDRICKS, WRIGHT, and VANCE, participated; and, after an ineffectual motion by Mr. COCKE to lay it on the table, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which, with the accompanying documents, was ordered to be laid on the table.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress translations of two letters from Don Joaquin d'Anduaga to the Secretary of State, which have been received at the Department of State, since my last Message, communicating copies of his correspondence with this Government.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES, &c.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage in Florida, and for other purposes; a bill to authorize the building of lighthouses therein mentioned, and for other purposes; and a bill further to establish the compensation of the collectors of the customs, and to alter certain collection districts, and for other purposes.

Mr. BASSETT moved an amendment to the second section of the bill, the purport of which was to leave Hampton, in Virginia, a port of entry. The motion was advocated by the mover, and Mr. H. NELSON, and opposed by Mr. NEWTON, and Mr. HILL, and negatived—ayes 28, noes 66.

Mr. KENT moved to strike out the words "by Nottingham, to the district of Annapolis;" and after a few remarks thereon by Mr. KENT, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, the question was taken thereon, and lost.

Mr. H. NELSON observed that this was an important bill in relation to the revenue of the country—that it was difficult to retain a quorum in the House on the several questions proposed—and he therefore moved that the Committee rise and report progress, which was agreed to—ayes 52, noes 50. The two former bills were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and the Committee were refused leave to sit again on the latter bill.

Mr. BASSETT moved that the said bill be laid on the table, on which motion Mr. HILL called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered, and the question was decided in the negative—yeas 39, nays 92. So the motion to lay the bill on the table did not prevail.

Mr. A. SMYTH called for the previous question, but the call was not sustained by the House—yeas 52, nays 54.

The House then took into consideration the various amendments proposed by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALWORTH moved to erase from those amendments the word Vermont, and Mr. TAYLOR proposed to strike out Champlain, from the operation of the said amendments, as recommended to the 8th section.

The motion to strike out was opposed by Mr. TOMLINSON, and negatived.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to strike out of the 9th section the words "New York." Mr. C. remarked, that he considered any attempt to amend the bill hopeless; but he thought there were some very strong circumstances in favor of excepting the revenue officers of the port of New York from the general reduction now about to be made. No gentleman would accuse him (Mr. C.) of a disposition to oppose any bill tending judiciously and justly to retrench the expenses of Government. He regretted that this bill had been kept back so long as to preclude debate. He would only detain the House a few moments. The salaries of these officers were regulated in 1790, and they have never been augmented or diminished since; in 1802 they were limited as they now are;

it would be recollected that this was during Mr. Jefferson's Administration. Mr. C. was not the eulogist of that or any other Administration, but he believed it had been properly deemed an economical Administration. By looking to the history of the revenue of the port of New York, it appeared that in 1790, the amount of the revenue collected was $470,000; at that time in the whole United States, the revenue collected was little more than three millions. The revenue collected at the port of New York last year, was $7,200,000, and he presumed that during the present year the revenue would be between nine and ten millions, or equal to the half of the whole revenue of the United States. He asked whether, under these circumstances, it was proper or just to reduce the salaries of these officers. There were no officers under the Government who more faithfully earned their salaries—there was no department of the Government, Treasury, War, Navy, or State, with all their auditors and clerks, which performed as much labor as was executed at the custom-house at New York. As we had a few days since virtually rejected the bill reducing our own compensation, he hoped the House would, for this session, at least, forbear to touch the salaries of officers whose labors and responsibility had been so much increased in thirty years. It was a mistaken policy to change the salaries of revenue offices.

Mr. CHAMBERS again moved the previous question, which was sustained by the House—yeas 67, nays 46.

Mr. SERGEANT called for the yeas and nays; which were thereupon ordered.

Mr. H. NELSON called for the reading of the bill; but the SPEAKER decided that the reading, under the circumstances of the case, (it having been read a first and second time,) could not be required.

Mr. NELSON appealed from the decision of the Chair; which was affirmed—ayes 103, noes 9.

The question, "Shall the main question be now put?" was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 51, as follows:

The main question, Shall the bill, with the amendments, be ordered for a third reading? was then put, and it was carried in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. WALWORTH, a recess was ordered until 6 o'clock.

Evening Session.

Mr. FULLER moved a resolution calling for a copy of the letter of Mr. RUSSELL, referred to in the Message of the President of the United States of yesterday, together with such communications as may have been received on the subject from any other of the persons composing the mission of Ghent; which resolution, according to the rules of the House, lies on the table one day of course.

Mr. SANDERS, from the committee appointed to inquire into certain alterations said to have been made in the rules and regulations for the government of the Army of the United States, delivered in a report of some length, which concludes with a resolution directing the committee to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which report was ordered to lie on the table.

The following bills from the Senate, viz: a bill for the relief of Richard Matson; a bill granting a tract of land to William Conner, his wife, and their children; a bill authorizing the payment of a sum of money to Thomas Shields; were read a third time, passed, and returned to the Senate.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill of this House, entitled "An act making further appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1822, and for other purposes;" with amendments; in which amendments they ask the concurrence of this House.

OFFICERS OF CUSTOMS, &c.

The bill further to establish the compensation of officers of the customs, and to alter and establish certain collection districts, was read a third time as amended in this House.

On the passage of this bill there arose a debate, in which Messrs. NELSON of Virginia, CAMBRELENG, SERGEANT, and WOOD, opposed the bill, and Messrs. NEWTON, TOMLINSON, SAWYER, and WALWORTH, supported the bill.

The question was determined finally in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 35, as follows:

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

On motion of Mr. TRIMBLE, the several orders of the day were postponed for the purpose; and the House proceeded to the reconsideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road," which was returned to this House by the President of the United States on the 4th instant, with the objections which appear upon the Journal of the 4th instant, and which said bill is in the words following, to wit:

An Act for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be erected, on the national road leading from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the river Ohio, so many toll houses, gates, and turnpikes, as, in his opinion, will be necessary and sufficient to collect the duties and tolls hereinafter mentioned, from all persons travelling on the same, to be erected at such places as he may determine: Provided, That the number of such gates and turnpikes shall not exceed twelve, nor be less than six; and that such gates and turnpikes shall be erected at a distance not less than ten miles from each other.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, as soon as the said gates and turnpikes shall be erected, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint, or cause to be appointed, toll-gatherers, to demand and receive, for passing the said turnpikes, the tolls and rates hereinafter mentioned, who may stop any person riding, leading, or driving, any horses, cattle, hogs, sheep, sulkey, chair, chaise, phaeton, cart, wagon, sleigh, sled, or other carriage of burden or pleasure, from passing through the said gates or turnpikes, until they shall respectively have paid the same, that is to say: For every space of twenty miles in length of the said road, the following sums of money, and so in proportion for any greater or lesser distance, to wit: For every score of sheep or hogs, six and a quarter cents; for every score of cattle, twelve and a half cents; for every led or drove horse, one cent; for every horse and rider, six and a quarter cents; for every sleigh or sled, for each horse or ox drawing the same, three cents; for every dearborn, sulkey, chair, or chaise, with one horse, twelve and a half cents; for every chariot, coach, coachee, stage wagon, phaeton, chaise, or dearborn, with two horses and four wheels, eighteen and three-quarter cents; for either of the carriages last mentioned, with four horses, twenty-five cents. For every other carriage of pleasure, under whatever name it may go, the like sum, according to the number of wheels and horses drawing the same. For every cart or wagon, whose wheels do not exceed the breadth of four inches, six and one fourth cents for each horse or ox drawing the same. For every cart or wagon, whose wheels shall exceed in breadth four inches, and not exceeding six inches, three cents for every horse or ox drawing the same; and every other cart or wagon, whose wheels shall exceed six inches, shall pass the said gates free and clear of toll: Provided, That the President of the United States may authorize the superintendent of the road to commute the rates of toll with any person, or persons, by taking of him or them a certain sum annually, in lieu of the tolls aforesaid: And provided, also, That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to authorize any tolls to be received or collected from any person passing to or from public worship, or to or from his common business on his farm or woodland, or to or from a funeral, or to or from a mill: And provided further, That no toll shall be received or collected for the passage of any wagon or carriage laden with the property of the United States, or any cannon or military stores belonging to the United States, to any of the States composing this Union, or any person or persons on duty in the military service of the United States, or the militia of any of the States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said toll gatherers shall settle their accounts quarterly with the superintendent of the road, and at all other times when thereunto required, and shall, at all times, pay over to him, on demand, the amount of tolls by them collected; and it shall be his duty to account for the same with the Secretary of the Treasury, once in each year, and quarterly, if required. And the said superintendent and toll gatherers shall govern themselves by the rules and regulations which the President of the United States may from time to time prescribe.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the amount of tolls, after deducting therefrom the expenses and charges of collection, shall be applied, under the direction of the President of the United States, to the repairs and preservation of said road, in such manner, and under such regulations, as he may from time to time prescribe, and to no other purpose whatever.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That directors shall be erected at proper and convenient situations, to caution all conductors or drivers of carriages on the road aforesaid, that they shall at all times pass on the left of each other, under the penalty of three dollars for every offence.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to increase or diminish the tolls established by this act, in case it should be found upon trial that the sums collected is more, or less, than is necessary to keep the said road in repair; and to increase or lessen the tolls from time to time, on any particular kind of travelling or transportation, so as to preserve an equitable scale of rates, and to increase or diminish the tolls at such seasons of the year as he may direct: Provided, however, That the items of tolls shall not, at any time, be increased to more than double the rates herein established and allowed.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That if any of the toll gatherers shall unreasonably delay or hinder any passenger or traveller, at any of the gates, or shall demand or receive more toll than is by this act established, he shall, for each and every such offence, forfeit and pay, to the party so aggrieved, the sum of ten dollars.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That if any person who shall use the said road, shall, with a view to evade the payment of the tolls required by this act, leave the said road, and go round the said gates, every such person shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay to, and for the use of, the United States, the sum of twelve dollars.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the toll gatherers on the said road shall, respectively, receive compensation for their services at the rate of twelve per cent. on the amount of tolls by them respectively collected: Provided, That the annual compensation of any toll gatherer shall never exceed the sum of three hundred and fifty dollars, nor shall the same be less in any one year than one hundred and twenty dollars; and, in case of any deficiency in the amount collected by any toll gatherer, below the sum of one hundred and twenty dollars, the residue shall be paid out of the tolls collected at the other gates on the said road.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That, for repairing the Cumberland road, the sum of nine thousand one hundred and ninety-four dollars and twenty-five cents, (being an unexpended balance of money appropriated by act of third March, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, for completing the same,) be, and is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, however, That all expenditures arising under this act, or connected with the support or repair of said road, beyond the sum herein appropriated, shall be defrayed out of the tolls collected under said acts, and from no other fund.

Mr. BASSETT, with a view to such a consideration of the subject as its importance appeared to him to require, moved to refer the bill and objections to a Committee of the Whole; but the House refused to commit the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT expressed in strong terms his approbation of the Message of the President, particularly on the ground that, to impose a toll on this particular road, while other roads were free, would be an unequal and oppressive tax, &c. He was, however, in favor of keeping this road in repair at the expense of the United States.

The question was then taken, "Shall this bill pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States?" and the vote was as follows:

Two-thirds of all the members being required to carry this question, and a majority having voted against it, it was of course not carried; and the bill was rejected.

A bill from the Senate to authorize the building of lighthouses therein named, and for other purposes, was read a third time, and sent to the Senate for concurrence in the amendments made thereto in this House.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making further appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1822, and for other purposes:" the first whereof proposes to add to the appropriation of $50,000 for Fort Calhoun, these words: "This appropriation not to be regarded as a confirmation of the contract made with Elijah Mix in regard to this fort."

A motion was made by Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, to amend the said amendment, by inserting therein, after the word "confirmation," the words "or disaffirmance." And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

And debate having thereupon arisen on the question to agree to the amendment of the Senate as aforesaid—

Mr. SAWYER called for the previous question, and the same being demanded by a majority of the members present, it was put in the form prescribed by the rules and orders of the House, to wit: Shall the main question be now put? And passed in the affirmative.

The said main question was then put, to wit: Will the House agree to the amendment of the Senate as aforesaid? And was determined in the negative—yeas 40, nays 80, as follows:

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Upham, Walworth, Whipple, Williams of North Carolina, Williamson, Wilson, Wood, Woodcock, and Worman.
And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, May 7.

Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of all such matters and things to them referred at the present session upon which they have not reported.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill from the Senate to relieve the people of Florida from certain ordinances, reported the same without amendment; which was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the Senate's bills for the relief of Clarence Mulford and Joseph D. Boyd, with a recommendation that they be postponed; and, on motion of Mr. E., they were ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution concerning loans of powder and lead, made a report thereon rather unfavorable to the officers who made the loans; which report, on motion of Mr. E., was ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. EUSTIS moved for the printing of the report and documents.

This motion gave rise to a conversation, in which it appeared, from the statements of Mr. WALWORTH and Mr. MATTOCKS, that a majority of the whole number of the committee (that is, 4 out of 7) were opposed to this report, although a majority of the members present this morning (that is, 3 out of 5) had agreed to it. Mr. COCKE suggested that a majority of all the members present of the committee were certainly competent to report on any subject referred to a committee.

The House refused to print the report and documents; and Mr. MATTOCKS then moved to proceed to the consideration of the report, but the House refused to consider it.

The Committee on Military Affairs, and the Committee on the Public Lands, were discharged respectively from all petitions and other matters before them, which have not been heretofore disposed of.

The resolution laid upon the table yesterday by Mr. FULLER, calling for information from the President of the United States in relation to a letter from Jonathan Russell, Esq., late a commissioner to conclude the Treaty of Ghent, referred to in a late Message from the President, was then taken up.

After some conversation between Mr. FLOYD, Mr. FULLER, and Mr. COCKE, as to the propriety of again asking of the Executive a paper which he had already once declined furnishing, the question on adopting Mr. FULLER's motion was finally agreed to without a division.

Mr. COCKE then moved that the House now proceed to the consideration of the resolution proposing the appointment of a committee to sit during the recess of Congress, to examine into the different departments of the Government; but the House refused to consider the same.

Mr. SAWYER again moved to take up the joint resolution proposing an earlier day for the commencement of the next session of Congress, but the House refused to consider the same.

Mr. Cook submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to prepare and lay before this House, as early in the next session as may be practicable, a statement showing the amount of money which appears to have stood to the credit of the United States, or its Treasurer, in every bank in which the public money has been deposited at the end of each quarter, since the first day of January, 1817; distinguishing between special and general deposits. A particular and minute account of each transfer of the public money from one bank to another, which has been made within the aforesaid period, and the reasons and motives for making the same. A detailed account of the special deposits that have been made in any of the banks; the time when made; the description of the notes so deposited, and the reasons for making the same; together with any contract or contracts under which these deposits were made. The precise amount and an exact description of the unavailable funds of the Treasury; what part thereof was unavailable at the time of deposit; how long any part thereof remained on deposit before it became unavailable, and why it became so. Showing the respective accounts and relations of the United States with each bank; together with all correspondence in possession of the Department with each of those banks in relation to any of the foregoing objects.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table one day.

Mr. BUTLER, from the committee appointed on the 22d of April last, to inquire into the contract between the War Department and Elijah Mix, of the 25th July, 1818, and report whether the same was made in pursuance of law; and whether the said Mix has performed his covenant; and such other facts as they may deem proper relative to said contract,—made a report thereon, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A Message, was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 23d of April, requesting the President of the United States to cause to be communicated to that House certain information respecting the lead mines in the State of Missouri, I herewith transmit a report of the Secretary of War.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, May 7, 1822.

The Message and documents were laid on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House, of the following titles, to wit: "An act for the benefit of Reuben Hickman, Fielding Hickman, and Joshua Cannon;" "An act further to amend these several acts relative to the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments;" "An act confirming the claims to lots in the town of Mobile, and to land in the former province of West Florida, which claims have been reported favorably on by the commissioners appointed by the United States;" "An act to establish certain roads, and to discontinue others"—with amendments to each; in which amendments they ask the concurrence of this House.

NAVIGATION OF THE POTOMAC.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which have been referred at the present session sundry memorials from inhabitants of the State of Pennsylvania, soliciting the aid and patronage of Congress in the improvement of the navigation of the Potomac river, made a report thereon, which was ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

The Committee of the District of Columbia, to whom was referred sundry memorials from the inhabitants of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, praying the aid of the Federal Government towards the improvement of the navigation of the river Potomac, have, according to order, attentively considered the object of the memorialists, and beg leave to submit to the House of Representatives, in relation thereto, the following report:

That, by the concurrent acts of the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia, a company were incorporated in the year seventeen hundred and eighty-four, on the recommendation of General George Washington, for the improvement of the navigation of the river Potomac, and its principal branches, above tide water. The seventeenth and eighteenth sections of this act prescribed the conditions upon which the tolls granted to the company should be exacted, and a limitation to the duration of their charter. By a supplementary act those conditions were modified, and the period limited for the completion of the navigation of the river, in the mode prescribed, has been, from time to time, extended by subsequent laws of Maryland and Virginia.

No legal inquiry has ever been regularly executed, so far as your committee are informed, in order to ascertain whether the "Potomac Company have complied with the terms of their charter." After the expenditure of their subscribed stock, to the amount of $311,555; of the tolls of more than twenty years' collection; and of the farther sum of $174,000, borrowed by the company of the State of Maryland, of the banks of the District of Columbia, and of private individuals, it is universally acknowledged that the navigation of the river is most defective.

In all this period the stockholders have received but one inconsiderable dividend; and their stock will not command in the market, where, however it is seldom found, a moiety of its nominal value.

It is, in fine, now ascertained, that, without further and very considerable aid from the States immediately interested in the navigation of the Potomac, or from the General Government, the great object sought to be attained by the improvement of that navigation—a commercial intercourse, through this channel, between the Western and Atlantic States, will be entirely defeated.

Will the Congress of the United States interpose, and have they the power to prevent a result so deplorable?

A hasty survey of the general map of the United States, and a brief recurrence to the theory and policy of the Federal Government, with their practical illustration by the structure of the Cumberland road, would seem almost to supersede the necessity of any comment from your committee on the importance of the navigation of the Potomac, or the power of Congress to provide for its improvement.

One of its southern branches, itself a considerable river, rises to the southwest of Staunton, in Virginia, and is capable of connecting, by a navigable canal, the geographical centre of that State, in territory the largest of the Union, with the market towns of the District of Columbia. Emptying into the Potomac above the chief obstructions of its navigation, the Shenandoah, like those navigable streams which descend from the northwest, through the limestone valleys of Maryland and Pennsylvania, depends, for an outlet to the ocean, on the improvement of the navigation of the main river to a considerable distance above tide water. These branches, when the stem shall have been improved, are capable of affording, with the Potomac, an internal water communication, exceeding, in extent, six hundred and fifty miles.

The value of this navigation to the ample and fruitful territory washed by the tide, or drained by the tributary streams of this noble river—a territory comprehending four counties of Pennsylvania, seven of Maryland, and eighteen of Virginia—exceeding, in extent and population, some of the largest States of the Union, should not be disregarded. It sinks, however, into comparative insignificance, when this river is contemplated as a necessary link of the shortest chain of communication between the Atlantic and Western States. The enlightened policy which seated the Federal Government on the banks of the Potomac, indicates its peculiar adaptation to this purpose; and nature has facilitated its accomplishment by a rupture of the many ranges of lofty mountains, including even the great ridge of the Alleghany, in the direction which such a purpose requires. It is no longer questionable but that the head waters of the Ohio may be mingled with those of the Potomac, by a tunnel or subterranean canal, not exceeding two miles in extent; and the produce of the soil and industry of the West, after ascending the Youghiogany, find a safe and commodious channel; thence to the valley of Savage creek, and through it, the north branch, and the main river, to the Chesapeake and the Atlantic.

The patriotism which exults in the approaching connexion of the Hudson with the northern lakes; in the efforts of the Carolinas and Virginia, to unite, by short portages, the sources of the Santee and Pedee with those of the Tennessee and of the Roanoke and James rivers with the Great Kanawha, cannot but regard this central river of the Union with peculiar interest.

Notwithstanding all its claims to general favor, the Potomac is, however, exposed to the serious disadvantage of being, throughout its whole course, the common boundary of States, whose enterprise and resources are attracted to other objects of internal improvement, some or all of which are rivals of this; and all its markets, once the property of those States, are, by the cession of the District of Columbia to the General Government, confided to the exclusive guardianship of Congress.

With an almost boundless authority over the District of Columbia, the Government of the United States acquired new, urgent, and daily increasing interests in the navigation of the Potomac.

MAY, 1822.

Navigation of the Potomac.

H. OF R.

In the rapid improvement and consequent security of the seat of the Federal Government from foreign danger, are involved, not only the preservation of the property and lives of its inhabitants, the accommodation and comfort of its numerous public functionaries, but, in no small degree, the national character and honor. The most deplorable calamity of the late war would, doubtless, have been averted, had the Capitol of the United States been encompassed by the dense population of a large city—by such a population as would unquestionably succeed the contemplated improvement of the navigation of the Potomac. And if sordid views may be allowed to mingle with considerations of such inestimable consequence, it may be added that, with the growth of the numbers and opulence of a great commercial emporium, would, of necessity, arise a corresponding appreciation of the value of all the disposable public lands in the city of Washington; consisting of more than five thousand vacant lots, and now computed at near two millions of dollars; it is not unreasonable to suppose that their value would be quadrupled by a prospect of their early occupation and improvement.

Your Committee are aware that this calculation may be, indeed has been impugned, by referring to the value of the commodities which have hitherto descended the Potomac. The very origin of this report, in the present imperfect and hazardous navigation of the river, suggests an answer to this objection. It may be corroborated by another; the tolls of a single turnpike, in length but thirty-four miles, leading to the town of Alexandria, have exceeded in one year twenty-five thousand dollars, or very near a fourth of the annual interest of a sum sufficient to complete the navigation of the Potomac, from its tide-water to the Cumberland road. This great and costly work, itself, so honorable to the wisdom and beneficence of the United States, awaits this improvement to yield all that it has promised to the Union.

If the relative expense of transportation, by land and by water, be properly estimated, the completion of a canal, from the tide to Cumberland, would have the effect of approximating the Seat of Government to within a few miles of the Allegany; while the extension of this canal, at some future period, would occasion that formidable barrier to disappear, in the intercourse of the Eastern and Western States. It is by such a canal that your committee propose to supply the place of the present defective navigation of the Potomac. As this river affords the shortest water line of communication between the tide of the sea and the eastern base of the Allegany, so is its current the most rapid, when compared with that of the other great rivers which have their sources in this chain of mountains. Wherever the science of civil engineering has been long and successfully applied to inland navigation, your committee are assured that the use of the natural beds of wide and rapid rivers has been superseded by a resort to navigable canals, extending along their margin, and fed by their currents until met by the tide. Without a recourse to this expedient, the ascent of the Potomac by a loaded boat cannot be overcome, it is believed, at an expense less than that which attends the transportation of equal burdens over like distances, along the ordinary roads of the adjacent country. The consequence must be, that every downward cargo is chargeable with double freight, exclusive of insurance against the repeated hazard to the boat, and the lives of those who guide it, of total destruction.

From a navigation so impeded and so dangerous, all bulky commodities are, of necessity, excluded, and yet it is from the transportation of such articles that the chief part of the revenue of any canal is derived. In the table of tolls, annexed to this report, it is apparent that the entire estimate of the commodities which ascend the Potomac, although they comprise a greater value in less bulk, bears but a very small proportion to the amount of those which descend the river; while these must be regarded as of very inconsiderable value, when compared with the numerous and diversified productions of the extensive and fertile country which should find its market on the banks of this river.

Can it be owing to any other cause than the defective navigation of the Potomac, that the buildings of Washington are cemented with the lime of Rhode Island, and warmed in winter with the mineral coal of James river? The last is dug and raised, at much cost, transported twelve miles over land to the port of shipment, and thence conveyed by a circuitous navigation of five hundred more to the District of Columbia. The former is calcined by fuel of a value, enhanced by its scarcity, and its vicinity to a market, in which it is applied to various uses, and it is afterwards transported, even farther than the latter, with the superior hazard of the sea, augmented not a little by the peculiar character of the commodity itself. What would be the tolls upon the transportation of these necessary and bulky commodities, beds of which, inexhaustible in quantity, and excellent in quality, are found in the vicinity of each other, near the surface of the earth, and on the very margin of the Potomac, if a navigable canal connected Cumberland with Washington; and how rapidly would the demand for them increase with the progress of the population and wealth of the markets of the Chesapeake? The consumption of salt, by which the East would pay, in part, for these valuable minerals of the West, in the extensive grazing country of the Alleghany and its parallel ridges, would give increased activity and profit to this intercourse. In the channel of communication between the works of Onondaga and the waters of the Ohio, this heavy commodity is now subjected to a most circuitous water conveyance, by vessels of different capacities and draughts, and that transportation itself is interrupted by several portages.

Iron everywhere abounds, and copper has already been found in the mountains drained by the Potomac. Their valleys yield luxuriant crops of hemp and flax, and the forests of oak and pine which climb their summits, are destined, it is to be hoped, to supply future navies with the means of raising the blockade of the Chesapeake.

It was by this channel of intercourse, imperfect as it now is, that, during the late war, Louisiana supplied the Atlantic States with sugar; Tennessee with cotton; and Kentucky with saltpetre, that necessary material of defence. Were this communication as perfect as it can be rendered, an enemy, who succeeded in closing the mouth of the Mississippi, in order to paralyze the industry of the West, would have, also, to win from the fleets of the Union, the possession of the Chesapeake. Through this channel, in case of war with a formidable naval Power, the West would not only supply the East with the valuable products of the Mississippi, but make its return for the wines of Africa and the various manufactures of Europe and Asia, in the cloths of Steubenville and the cutlery and glass of Pittsburg. Should such a war be as extensively conducted on land as on the ocean, the cost of the contemplated canal would be saved by the United States in a single campaign.

Your committee are aware that other channels of communication across the Alleghany may be greatly improved, and rendered tributary to the general welfare of the United States, both in peace and war; in the latter, by the additional security which they would afford to the commerce of the interior, and by the vigor which they would impart to all the operations of the Federal Government for the common defence. On the other hand, it will readily be conceded, notwithstanding the preference which may be given, by local interests, to other objects of internal improvement, that whatever facilities the commercial, social, and political connexion between the remote extremes, and the Seat of the General Government of so vast a Republic as the United States, must have the same propitious influence, as would result, were it otherwise practicable, from contracting the extent of its territory, without reducing the number, impairing the wealth, or abridging the comfort and happiness of its people. To all the friends of liberty in America, who regard the State governments as essential parts of the republican system, erected on a scale so broad as to create alarm for its duration, or who, with no less truth, regard the Union of those States as the bond alike of their freedom and independence, every measure which has the effect of diminishing the extent of the one, while it multiplies and strengthens the ties of the other, must be viewed with earnest solicitude. But another inquiry remains—Has Congress the power to insure its success?

So numerous and so various are the benefits accruing to every nation from inland navigation, so urgently have the United States been invoked, by the character and genius of their institutions, to diffuse their advantages over a territory, which nature has eminently fitted to receive them, that a former Congress sanctioned by their voice, a system of internal improvement coextensive with the wants of the nation.

Your committee are not unmindful of the impediment which arrested the progress of that system, and could not expect success in their present effort, in behalf of one of its objects, if the proposition which they are about to submit to the House of Representatives were liable to similar objections. The committee have studiously sought to guard against their application, and confidently hope that they will be found to have succeeded.

Two proposals have already been offered to the House, in the course of the present session of Congress, by the Committee on Roads and Canals, in relation to the Potomac. Neither of them interferes with the plan for the improvement of the navigation of that river, which this committee have presumed to recommend. One of them, embraced by a resolution for the appointment of commissioners to survey the route and estimate the expense of a navigable canal, seems to your committee to be, in a great degree, superseded by the annexed report of the Principal Engineer of Virginia, to the Board of Public Works of that State; and as an incorporated company already exists, with ample authority to make the contemplated improvement, there does not remain any apparent necessity of waiting for the prosecution of this work, until a more extensive system of internal improvement be devised by Congress.

The committee simply recommend the combination of the proceeds of sales of the public property in the city of Washington, which, according to the original plan of the city, was designed to be sold, with such sums of money as the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia and the citizens of those and of the adjacent States may voluntarily subscribe, for the purpose of extending a navigable canal from the foot of the Little Falls of the Potomac, to the commencement of the Cumberland road. They propose to annex to this public and private subscription, the condition, that the Potomac company shall previously assent, with the approbation of the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia, to such alterations of their present charter, as will admit the United States, those States, themselves, already interested in the stock of the company, and the new subscribers, to participate, on fair and equitable principles, in their future revenue. These alterations would, among other obvious effects, provide for the payment of the debts of the company, and for the reduction of the nominal, by some liberal reference to the actual value of their present stock.

In order to obviate the necessity of selling the public lots in the City of Washington, before the contemplated improvement of the navigation and commerce of the District of Columbia shall have caused the anticipated appreciation of their value, as well as to complete the canal in the shortest possible time; without drawing immediately for large sums upon the public Treasury, the States of Maryland and Virginia, and the individual subscribers of new stock, your committee propose, that the United States shall borrow, on the public faith, and a specific pledge of all the public lots reserved for sale, a sum, receivable in semi-annual instalments, sufficient to complete the entire work in three years, from the date of the first instalment.

Referring to the annexed report of the Chief Engineer of Virginia, and computing the total cost of the contemplated canal at two millions and a half of dollars, your committee recommend that an amount of stock, in the capital of the company, not exceeding half a million, be reserved to pay the debts of the Potomac Company, and to reimburse the present stockholders, including the States of Maryland and Virginia; and that the above loan be limited to two millions of dollars, and applied to defray the expense of the additional works required to complete the canal.

Your committee have reason to believe that two millions of United States stock, bearing an interest of four per cent, payable semi-annually, and irredeemable for twenty-eight years, could be sold, in Europe or America, at par. To provide for the payment of the interest, and the final reimbursement of the principal of this debt, it is proposed, that the United States shall subscribe one million of dollars to the stock of the Potomac Company, on the conditions already suggested; the States of Maryland and Virginia six hundred thousand dollars, and individuals the remaining four hundred thousand; that, on the stock thus subscribed, there shall be charged an annuity for twenty-eight years, of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually; four per cent. of which shall be applicable to the payment of the interest on the two million loan, and two per cent. to the creation of a sinking fund, to be invested, from time to time, as received, in productive stock, in order to provide for the redemption of the principal of the loan, at the expiration of twenty-eight years.

Such is the scheme which the committee presume to recommend for extricating the Potomac Company

MAY, 1822.

Public Armories, &c.

H. OF R.

from their present embarrassments, and accomplishing a work which, unassisted, they cannot effect, although of inestimable importance to the public.

Complicated as this scheme may, at first, appear, it involves, in its prosecution, the exercise of no other powers on the part of Congress, than, 1st, the power of selling the public lots in the City of Washington, which were acquired expressly for sale. 2dly, That of borrowing money on the public faith, and a specific pledge for its repayment; and, lastly, the application of the public treasure to an object of general welfare; or the investment of it in the stock of an incorporated company, expected to yield an annual income.

The committee will not swell this report, already too far extended, by arguments to demonstrate, that all these powers are vested, by the Constitution, in the Congress of the United States, either expressly, or by natural implication. They involve neither the incorporation of a private company, nor the condemnation of the lands of individuals, within the territory of any State, for national purposes. They do not extend the jurisdiction of the General Government over the persons or property of the citizen, nor purpose to derive, from the assent of any one or more States, any power which has not been granted to the Federal Government by the people of the United States.

Your committee forbear to answer all the objections which this, like any other plan of internal improvement, may be expected to encounter. They are contented to set against such objections some of its peculiar advantages; that, connected with the Cumberland road, it will complete a great national object, calculated to perpetuate the Union, and to promote the prosperity and glory of the United States; that, while it accomplishes this object in the short compass of three years, its cost will be distributed over the revenue of eight and twenty; that this cost will be greatly reduced by the credit which enables the American Government to negotiate its loans at so low a rate of interest as four per cent.; that, by the completion of the entire work in so short a period, that loss of interest on unproductive stock, which most canal companies have encountered, and which, in some similar enterprises, has exceeded the principal of their stock, will be prevented; that if the dividends of the Potomac Company shall, after the completion of the canal, yield six per cent. per annum to the stockholders, they will, from that moment, have nothing further to pay for their stock; and after the lapse of twenty-eight years, or possibly a shorter period, they will be found to have paid but nine per cent. of its par value, for a property which, in all human probability, will have more than doubled that value. One of the most prominent and best features, perhaps, of this plan, for accomplishing an object of general welfare, is, that it combines in its execution private with public wealth, and thus effects such a co-operation of individual interest with public good, as will insure, in the original construction as well as the subsequent repairs of the canal, vigilance, economy, and fidelity, in all the disbursements of money, qualities so often required in vain, in the expenditure of public money, on public account.

Should the loan, on which this plan eventually depends, be negotiated abroad, it will be, because it leaves for more profitable application, in America, the sum which it is designed to withdraw from other channels of wealth and enterprise. If it charge a debt upon posterity, it must be again repeated, that it is to complete a work, as durable as that Union to which the people of America must look, now and hereafter, for the security of all their political and social happiness. Your committee submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to report a bill in conformity with the principles contained in the preceding report.

PUBLIC ARMORIES, &c.

The resolution laid upon the table yesterday by Mr. FLOYD, calling for information from the President of the United States respecting the condition of the public armories, arsenals, their cost, &c., was taken up.

Mr. FLOYD observed that this was an important subject, with the nature and extent of which, neither himself, nor, he believed, he might add, the House, was well acquainted. From the year 1816 about $200,000 had been annually appropriated for our armories; but how it was applied, or whether and how far the militia had been armed in consequence of it, he was not prepared to say, and wished to be informed. The largest army on earth, he observed, of men, women, children, and sutlers, might have been armed from the appropriations that had been made for this object.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made some explanation of the subject, in which he expressed his entire conviction that the armories of the United States had been managed with fidelity, ability, and economy. Yet, for the satisfaction of gentlemen, he had no objection to the resolution.

Mr. FLOYD observed, in reply, that he had no objection to the arms. They were the best, in point of skill, and strength, and workmanship, he ever saw; but he thought it expedient and necessary to obtain further information on this important subject.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, moved that when the House adjourns, to-day, it adjourn to meet at six o'clock to-morrow. This motion was opposed by Mr. TAYLOR, but was carried—yeas 68, nays 33.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, a resolution was passed, instructing the Clerk of the House to pay an assistant, (Mr. Fletcher,) employed in his office, and to continue his services.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, submitted resolutions for making certain allowances to the messengers of this House, for extra services, and also to the youths employed in the service of the House, on the floor of the House; which, after some conversation, and amendment, were agreed to.

Mr. REED, of Maryland, called for the consideration of the resolutions submitted by him some days ago, calling on the Secretaries of the Departments, and the Postmaster General, for an account of the situation of their respective offices, &c., to be reported at the next session of Congress; but the House refused to consider the same.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, called for the consideration of the resolutions heretofore submitted by him: 1st, for an increase of the number of the Committee on the Military Expenditures; and 2d, to direct the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the expediency of enlarging the powers of the Attorney General, but the House refused to consider the same.

Mr. F. JOHNSON called for the consideration of the resolutions some time ago submitted by him; and the House agreed to consider the same—60 to 44.

The first resolution was read in the following words:

Resolved, That the practice which has obtained in the public offices in this city, (of not attending to business until nine or ten o'clock in the morning, and closing the offices at three o'clock, in the evening,) is inconvenient to those who have business to transact in them, is not such reasonable attention to the public service as should be given, nor such attention as the salaries allowed by law are entitled to command, and that the said practice ought to be abolished.

The question on this resolution was taken without debate, and decided in the affirmative by a majority of 20 or 30 votes.

The second resolution was read in the following words:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the respective Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, and of the Navy, and the Postmaster General, to report to this House, on the second day of the next session of Congress, the number of active and well qualified Clerks, and Accountants, that will be necessary to perform the duties of their respective offices and departments, by requiring a reasonably constant, and diligent attention to business.

This resolution was agreed to by about the same majority as the first.

The third and fourth resolutions were modified by the mover so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the number of officers and seamen of the Navy of the United States ought to be limited by law.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, on the second day of the next session of Congress, a plan for a Peace Establishment of the Navy of the United States, and also of the Marine Corps.

These resolves were also agreed to by about the same majority.

Mr. TAYLOR submitted the following order, which was adopted:

Ordered, That the Clerk of the House cause to be prepared and printed, for the use of the members, a list of all business remaining undetermined, which, by the existing rule, is to be resumed and acted upon at the next session of Congress, designating bills, reports, and resolutions, committed, from those laid upon the table.

Mr. CHAMBERS called for the consideration of a bill from the Senate to authorize the selection of a suitable site for a National Armory on the Western waters; but the House refused to consider the same.

Mr. KENT called for the consideration of a bill from the Senate authorizing the Corporation of the City of Washington, to drain the low grounds in the vicinity of the Capitol, and to ornament the said city; and the House agreed to take it up—and the question being put on its third reading, thereupon arose a debate of an hour's length.

The bill was supported with considerable animation by Messrs. TAYLOR, NEALE, WOODCOCK, KENT, WHIPPLE, STEWART, and LITTLE, and opposed by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, and MALLARY.

Mr. MALLARY moved to amend the bill by striking out the four last sections, which provide for determining in chancery the equity of the claim, or pretended claim, of any of the original proprietors to the lots proposed to be laid out, and in lieu thereof requiring a relinquishment, prior to the execution of the work, of all claims to the lots on the part of the original proprietors.

The debate was ended, and this proposed amendment put aside, by the previous question, moved by Mr. COOK, (who was favorable to the bill,) and sustained by the House.

The main question on ordering the bill to a third reading, was then taken, and decided in the affirmative by a considerable majority.

A bill from the Senate for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage in the Territory of Florida, and for other purposes, was read a third time; but, before the question was taken, it was suggested by Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, that there was not a quorum present in the House.

After a short time, Mr. WHITE moved for a call of the House, but the call was negatived; and, a quorum appearing, the bill was passed.

A bill to relieve the people of the Territory of Florida from the operation of certain ordinances, was read a third time, and passed.

A bill to authorize the Corporation of the City of Washington to drain the low grounds in the vicinity of the Capitol, and to ornament certain parts of the said city, &c., was read a third time, and, on the question of its passage,

Mr. NELSON, of Maryland, moved to recommit the bill, with instructions so to amend it as to obtain the assent of the original proprietors, or their legal representatives, and all persons claiming under them.

After a few remarks, by Mr. HARDIN and Mr. NEALE,

The motion to recommit was lost, and the bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTLER, from the select committee, to whom was referred the resolution in relation to the Rip Rap contract, made a report thereon, concluding with the following resolve:

Resolved, That further appropriations to be expended under the contract made by the Engineer department with Elijah Mix, ought not to be made.

The report, with the documents, was ordered to be laid on the table, and printed.

The following bills passed through a Committee of the Whole, viz: A bill for the relief of Matthew McNair; and a bill for the relief of Samuel Walker.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on a bill from the Senate to try the validity of the title of the Marquis de Maison Rouge; a bill for the relief of Josiah Hook, jr.; and a bill for the relief of John Holmes.

MAY, 1822.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Some discussion ensued upon the first-mentioned bill, in which Mr. COCKE moved to strike out the enacting clause, on the ground that the House was thin and the claim important, and of such a description as ought not to be hurried through at this late period of the session. After some discussion, in which Messrs. RANKIN, COCKE, J. S. JOHNSTON, and SERGEANT, took part, the motion was withdrawn; and the Committee rose and reported the bills to the House.

The report of the Committee of the Whole in the case of John Holmes was concurred in; and that for the relief of Josiah Hook, jr., on motion of Mr. RICH, was ordered to be laid on the table. A further discussion ensued upon the passage of the bill to authorize a mode of trying the validity of the title of the Marquis de Maison Rouge. The bill was opposed by Mr. HARDIN, and supported by Mr. F. JONES; when Mr. COCKE moved that the bill be laid on the table, which was agreed to—ayes 50, noes 39.

The following bills passed through a Committee of the Whole, viz: A bill for the relief of Jacob Babbitt; a bill for the relief of James H. Clarke; a bill for the relief of Samuel H. Walley and Henry D. Foster; and a bill for the relief of Andrew Mitchell; all which were reported to the House.

The bill for the relief of Samuel H. Walley and Henry D. Foster, was ordered to be laid on the table; and that for the relief of James H. Clarke was concurred in, and ordered for a third reading. The question of concurrence in the case of Andrew Mitchell being under consideration, Mr. McSHERRY moved that the House again go into Committee of the Whole thereon, for the purpose of granting similar relief to Nathaniel White. The motion prevailed, and, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. McSHERRY proposed the said amendment, but it was negatived; and the Committee rose, and again reported the bill for the relief of the original petitioners only. On the question of ordering the said bill to a third reading, some debate ensued, in which Messrs. MCCOY, SERGEANT, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, and A. SMITH, took part; but, before any decision thereon, the House, on motion of M. WOODCOCK, ordered a recess until 6 o'clock.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. VANCE, RHEA, FLOYD, EDWARDS of North Carolina, ROSS, and McNEILL, &c.; and was negatived.
